On Wednesday morning, July 5, an important meeting of the "alumni" of the College was held in the Memorial Hall to hear reports as to what had already been done in the Jubilee scheme, and to recommend to the Jubilee Committee suggestions as to the means of raising the remaining portion of the £20,000 needed to complete the scheme. Circulars for the meeting had been sent to 109 past and present students, of whom 100 had sent replies. Sixty accepted the invitation, and the other forty, for various reasons, had to decline, but sent their hearty good wishes for a successful gathering. The chair was taken by the Rev. J. C. Street, who gave a stirring address, full of optimism. Mr. Street testified to the self-sacrificing spirit of the "alumni" in already raising over £1,100 towards the Jubilee scheme, and to the common purpose and brotherhood exhibited by the students everywhere. He then made reference to the olden days—of struggling but of enthusiasm—and tracing the history of the College down to the present day, showed that the enthusiasm had not diminished, but, if anything, had increased, with the increasing advantages offered to the students. "If this be so with fifty years' history, what cannot we look forward to in the future, with the glorious advantages offered by the Hall of Residence?" The spirit of missionary enterprise and the moving forward which has always characterised those trained in the College, would, he believed, be even more greatly in evidence in future years. Mr. Street then made the suggestion that though he knew the "alumni" of the College had had to make many sacrifices in raising the £1,100 among themselves, yet he felt that this had encouraged the laity in great numbers also to make sacrifices, and he was sure that if the "alumni" would go a step further in self-sacrifice, and promise a further sum towards the £5,000 yet to be raised, the earnestness and sincerity displayed could not but tell for good in the members of the various congregations, who without doubt would come forward, so that the whole sum of £20,000 could be assured before the end of the present year.

Before proceeding to the consideration of suggestions the following resolution, moved by the Rev. J. E. Stronge, seconded by the Rev. D. Matts, was passed with acclamation :—"That the past and present students of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, in general assembly, place on record their indebtedness to the great body of subscribers who have contributed to the fund for carrying out the proposals made in the Students' Memorial for the establishment of collegiate and residential premises, and rejoice in the prospect of the occupancy of Summerville in the near future."

A general discussion then took place as to proposed methods to be recommended to the Jubilee Committee for raising the remaining £5,000, the fund at present having realised £14,500, with a few more promises to increase it. All throughout there was the note of buoyancy and hope that, misapprehensions and fears having been cleared away, subscriptions which had thereby been delayed would now be forwarded, because the Jubilee scheme must make the College of greater service to our churches, in addition to providing "suitable" accommodation for the students.

Among the resolutions passed a very significant one was "That the students in general assembly gathered pledge themselves to raise £250 towards the last £5,000 as a further contribution from themselves."

Suggestions were also made that tickets —1d., 3d., 6d.—be printed, so that the already wide number of small subscribers might be further increased by giving these tickets as receipts to Sunday-school scholars, teachers, members of congregations, and friends who were willing to give help in this way. Another suggestion was that districts be marked out with a local sub-committee for each. Personal canvas and visitation of the churches were both emphasised as effective means of raising money, and of benefiting the churches at the same time, and Principal Gordon, with the two secretaries, undertook that any congregation desiring such a visit should have it. Already 50 churches have been visited. Some very pleasing announcements were made in the course of the general discussion.

The committee had been fortunate enough to secure a customer for the land lying outside the wall at Summerville. Several present promised further donations as part of the £250, and the last £1,000 was guaranteed by a generous anonymous friend.

The Chairman and practically every speaker gave expression to the deep appreciation which all concerned felt of the giant-work of Principal Gordon, who has spared himself in nothing for the forwarding of the scheme, and of the hard labours of the two Jubilee Secretaries, Revs. C. Peach and T. P. Spedding.

The meeting separated with a deepened feeling that there was in this effort something worth striving for with might and main, and that friends everywhere would come forward to place the College in its new habitation, "Summerville," in the best possible circumstances, that it may be a credit and may render the greatest service to our community.

GARDEN PARTY.

In the afternoon a Garden Party was held at Summerville. About a thousand guests assembled there at the invitation of the College Committee. The ladies of the Upper Brook-street Free Church admirably managed the tea arrangements, and music was provided by the Manchester Professional Band.

During the proceedings the Chairman of the College Committee, Lieut.-Colonel Pilcher, offered a hearty welcome to the visitors, and in a vigorous and telling speech spoke of the advantages of Summerville for the students and for the churches, and forcibly pleaded the help of each and every one towards completing the £20,000 required—a pleading that was emphasised by Principal Gordon and Rev. C. Peach.

MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

THE annual meeting of the Missionary Conference was held on Thursday, July 6th, in the Memorial Hall. As usual the proceedings were opened by two half-hour services, the Communion Service being conducted by Rev. John Ellis and another service by Rev. H. J. Rossington. The President of the Conference, Rev. John Ellis, in his address kept very closely to what he laid down as the President's duty to the annual meeting. "Keep your eyes open to the 'Signs of the Times,' for the next twelve months, and then come and report to us what you have seen." That, he considered, was what the members practically said to him on his election to the office in 1904. Dealing in turn with the Scotch Church crisis; Principal Forsyth's resolution of sympathy with the United Free Church, at the autumnal meetings of the Congregational Union; the Rev. J. H. Shakespeare's motion on the same subject at the Free Church Council meeting last April; the President said "These bold expressions, these fearless demands for freedom to alter their theological statements so as to harmonise them with newer truth (coming as they do from the liberal wing of Nonconformity, and even from the Free Church Council which contains strongly conservative elements) should be peculiarly gratifying to us who have all along gloried in the principle of "the open door." Mr. Ellis referred to the correspondence on "Do we Believe?" and on "Faith and Reason," as being distinctly encouraging, as on the whole the writers showed themselves in deadly earnest, and proved that there were inquirers for "a faith that is at once sane, enlightened, free and real." Reference was also made to the Bishop Gore and Mr. Beeby case, and to the manifesto signed by 101 influential clergymen of the Church of England in favour of an "authoritative encouragement" to the Clergy "to face the critical problems of the New Testament with entire candour, reverence for God and His Truth, and loyalty to the Church of Christ." Mr. Ellis summed up what he had observed in these directions during the past twelve months, as

(1) A determination on the part of creed-bound churches to revise their standards, and to remove, if possible, the doctrinal limitations from the trust deeds on which their property is held.

(2) The persistence and power of the religious instinct in the people, notwithstanding changes in the doctrinal expression and indifference to religious worship, and the demand on the part of the people for sincerity, life, and reality.

(3) The changed and changing attitude towards the Bible, to regard it no longer as an oracle, but as literature, and to separate in it the permanent from the passing.

The address closed with an earnest appeal to the members ever to remember the missionary aspect of the work, and to go forward boldly, believing that we have a living Gospel which the present age needs.

The annual report, which showed work done at Douglas and Windermere, and the earnest consideration of the Committee towards other centres, was adopted, after which twenty-one new members were duly elected to the Conference. Rev. Principal Gordon was elected president; Rev. John Ellis, vice-president; Rev. T. P. Spedding, treasurer; Rev. W. R. Shanks, secretary; and Revs. J. A. Pearson, J. M. Bass, C. Roper, H. J. Rossington, H. B. Smith, as committee for the next twelve months.

The Rev. J. C. STREET then moved the following resolution :—The members of this Conference put on record the deep sense of loss which this Conference, and our Free Churches generally, have sustained in the death of the Rev. Arthur Harvie—a brave, devoted, and God-fearing worker for righteousness, who gave himself, body and soul, to the work of his life, and died like a brave spiritual soldier at his post of duty, and the members of this Conference sympathise deeply with his widow and children in their bereavement, and with the congregation of which he was the faithful minister.

The resolution was seconded by Rev. H. Bodell Smith, supported by other members, and passed—all standing.

At the Open Conference a Report was given that it had been decided to have another course of services at Windermere. This season they will be held at the "Institute."

With reference to Douglas a resolution was passed unanimously that the policy of the Conference be to establish a congregation at Douglas.

At the afternoon Session a most interesting paper on "A Unitarian Van Mission" was read by Rev. T. P. Spedding. It will be found on pp. 444-6.

A useful discussion ensued, in which, though difficulties were not underrated, the dominant note was that a Van Mission could and should be part of our work, and the matter was left to the Committee with power to act.

The annual Students' Dinner (U.H.M.C.) took place on Thursday evening. The Rev. Charles Peach, as President of the Students' Union, presided, and there was a large attendance. A buoyant spirit characterised the proceedings, and some excellent addresses were given.

The College week was brought to a close by the annual Cricket Match on the Friday, in which the opposing sides were Ministers and Students of Manchester District versus Visitors from other quarters. The former won by the narrow margin of one run.

BEDFORD COLLEGE FOR WOMEN.

SIR,—May I thank you for having inserted an article about Bedford College for Women in your last issue, and so drawing the attention of the descendants of those who were most instrumental in founding the College to the present crisis in its history.

I should like to add a few words by way of explanation, for in your "Note" you seem to think that the sum asked for is excessive, and too much to expect from private benefaction. We trust that this is not so, and that we shall find friends who, when they understand the present difficulties of the College, and the scheme proposed by the Council to meet them, will enable the whole to be carried out.

It must be remembered that for 56 years the College has very quietly been doing a great and pioneer work, and that it has had no endowment, either for general or special chairs, to help it, such as almost all colleges for men have. Further, like other women's Colleges, it provides only for very few resident students, so that the income arising from that source has not done much more than pay for its own expenses.

The result of this state of things has been that much honorary work has been done for the College by devoted friends like Mrs. Reid, Miss Jane Martineau, Mrs. Bostock, and others, and the payments to Professors have had to depend on the amount of fees received.

Even with these untoward circumstances the College has done excellent work, has developed in many directions as the demand arose for higher and more varied education for women, and during the last 6 or 8 years the number of students has doubled, so that there are now about 280 students attending the various departments, 240 of whom are day students living at home, and yet receiving the benefits of collegiate life. Parliament has recognised the excellence of the work of Bedford College by giving it a grant as a University College towards its maintenance, and it is the only college for women that receives such a grant. When the University of London was reconstituted Bedford College was at once made one of its "Schools" in the Faculties of Arts and Science. The College contains a department for the Training of Secondary Teachers, and provides a scientific course of hygiene, which prepares women for the posts of factory and sanitary inspectors and teachers of hygiene.

Thus Bedford College takes its academic place amongst University Colleges, and yet retains its character of being a college for women where their needs and interests are the first consideration. The authorities of the University itself desire that such a college for women should be maintained, and it is evident from the increased and steadily increasing number of students that the advantages offered by such a College are appreciated, and it is almost certain that a large number of parents will always prefer that their daughters should attend a college for women.

Bedford College has never yet been placed in such a position as to have a special building of its own, and therefore has now to suffer, for the second time in its history, from the ground landlord refusing either to sell the premises to the College, or to grant any appreciable extension to the leases, one of which falls in in March, 1909.

The Council feel that with such a record of past work and so much present usefulness and still more hope for the future development of its work they may fairly ask those who care to help women to enable the College to be put on a more permanent foundation with a building of its own on freehold ground.

The education of the women of any nation is of the utmost importance, and it is time that the English people should realise that nothing adequate has yet been done to give women equal advantages with men in preparing for any professional career they may take up. It is also greatly to the advantage of the nation that all women who are at all fitted for it should be able to have a college education, because the few years thus spent gives a wider outlook, and shows the way to a more useful life to those women who have no need to work for their livelihood, but yet wish to lead lives which should be helpful to themselves and to the community, or who, by marrying, can train their children into better citizens.

May I add that the sum asked for has been based on a very careful calculation after lengthened inquiries about any sites in central or easily accessible parts of London, which are conditions necessary for a day college. It has been calculated that the amount of land required could not be obtained for less than £80,000 to £85,000, and a building adequate for the work to be done in it could not be erected for less than £60,000 to £65,000. When the building and ground have been provided it is hoped that an endowment fund may be started, and even if this were accomplished, the amount divided between the 500 students it is proposed to prepare for would only be providing in perpetuity a very small proportion of the expense of each student.

The Council must look to private generosity to provide the required sum, because, while so many deficiencies have to be supplied, and while so much work has to be done for elementary, technical, and secondary education, it is not possible that the L.C.C. will be in a position to assist University education more than is done at present. Further, although Parliament has, during the last few years, made grants towards the maintenance of University Colleges, it has not yet assisted in either building or endowing any University Colleges. I fear, therefore, that we cannot hope for any help from the national exchequer as you suggest.

The need is urgent, as the time is short before some of the present premises must be surrendered, and it would be a national disaster if the work of this College could not be carried on, and therefore we plead for generous assistance, although we are well aware that your readers are always being asked to give to various good causes. We plead that if a great effort is now made and the proposed scheme for Bedford College is realised it would be an accomplished fact, and would provide a permanent benefit for women's education because it would raise the College from the constant financial difficulties it has had and has to encounter, and would enable the Council to carry on the work even more efficiently and without the present pressing anxieties.

I fear I have trespassed too largely on your space, but there is much more that might be said in support of the scheme; and I shall be very happy to give any more information or answer any questions if anyone will kindly write to me.

HENRIETTA BUSK,
Hon. Sec. of Bedford College Building and Endowment Scheme.

STATE INTERFERENCE.

SIR,—A short letter is amply sufficient to give expression to an aphorism, a truism, or a prejudice that will pass with the world for the profoundest of practical wisdom, but it is not sufficient to permit of any convincing argument on complicated social matters.

Mr. Simon may, I think, be assured that nobody whose opinions are worth discussing is at all disposed to undervalue character, or to invoke State miracles for the reform of society. We are, I believe, none of us more disposed to do so now than we ever were; but somewhat more clearly than we used to do, we do I think recognise that circumstances and environment hav a good deal to do with character. It i one evidence of growing enlightenment, and the broadening of Christian charity, and I am sorry indeed to see that Mr. Simon appears to have no sympathy with it. Nobody "ignores the old-time cult of character"; on the contrary, it is just because we have a more profound conception of the absolutely paramount importance of character that we deprecate so earnestly our collective indifference to social conditions which destroy character and degrade human beings wholesale.

Mr. Simon's conception of society appears to be almost purely artificial, though he calls it a "living organism" and evidently believes it to be natural. The really natural social system—using the word in its highest sense—would be a system not organised with a view to making profit out of each other, but with a view to permitting and enabling and requiring every man directly or indirectly to produce all that is necessary for his own living. Wherever there is a man who is not doing that there is something to be remedied, and if it can be shown—as undoubtedly it can always be shown—that there are tens and hundreds of thousands of good, honest, hard-working people who cannot do that, it surely must be the clear duty of a Christian State to ascertain the cause and to apply the remedy. There is no need for miracles, either State or municipal, but for close and careful consideration and for the honest and ungrudging application of the ample powers and resources that the progress of time has placed at our command.

Nothing is more discouraging and mischievous than for good and conscientious and able men like Mr. Simon to be sneering in public prints at "miracle-working States," when all that is proposed is that the community as a whole shall recognise its common responsibility for some of the worst forms of human suffering, and shall do all that its accumulated wealth and experience can do for its mitigation and remedy.

GEORGE F. MILLIN.

Brixton, July 9, 1905.

IMMORTALITY.

SIR,—I have been reading again some chapters of Martineau's "Study of Religion," especially those on Death and Future Life, and have been charmed as usual with the fairness of argument, the clearness of thought, and the grace of diction. In discussing the possibility of a future life for mankind it seems to be generally assumed that there are only two alternatives—annihilation or immortality. The possibility of life continued beyond the grave, but terminating at some more distant epoch, is rarely suggested. Yet if the individual man is a finite being can he be actually immortal? If he has a beginning must he not also have an end? Is it not possible that his destiny may be to pass through a series of changes occupying millenniums of time, and yet fall short of absolute immortality? If human mind should ever reach the limit of its capacity for development the prospect of annihilation might cause no regret, nor would it entail any loss to the universe. All organic life seems to be controlled by waves of energy, and a wave is that which has a beginning, a climax, and an ending. Is man subject to the same law?

F. T. MOTT.

Birstal Hill House, near Leicester.

[The grounds of belief in immortality, we should say, belong to an entirely different realm from that of an organic form of life such as the mortal body. God alone has absolute immortality, but the human spirit, though it have beginning, need have no end, if so God will. The confidence of personal immortality, and a yet more perfect communion of spirit, human and divine, must grow more, and not less, after the first stage of progress in spiritual life; what is a reason now for life after death would not cease to be a reason when that life was more fully realised. The individual man is, no doubt, a finite being, but our faith is that he is called to participate in the life of the Eternal as a child of God. So we read the Divine purpose, and to suggest that after millenniums that Divine purpose might die away, and the purified and strengthened spirit cease to be, appears to us an idle speculation.—ED. INQ.]

A VAN MISSION.

SIR,—I had the pleasure some months ago of laying proposals for a Van Mission before the Committee of the Missionary Conference. Since that time further information has been obtained, and at its annual meeting last week, the Conference very enthusiastically adopted a scheme. Some details are contained in the Paper which has been forwarded to you on the suggestion of the committee. The Mission idea was commended by every speaker, including some of our most experienced and sagacious ministers, as well as others who have taken part in open-air meetings. Nothing was said in the nature of a request for missioners, but there were spontaneous offers of assistance sufficient to ensure the efficient manning of the Mission for its first season. We have expressions of sympathy from the Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the missionary agent of one of our northern societies, members of the Postal Mission, and also from individual friends. An anonymous donor has promised £100 through Mr. Bowie towards the cost of purchasing and equipping a car, and on behalf of the Conference I am appealing now for at least another £100 to meet initial expenses, and the estimated charges for the first season of three months in next year. If we get more than £100 we shall be able to run the car for a longer period. Eventually, I hope there may be more than one van engaged in this new work, and that in addition to summer campaigns, we may be able to hold winter lantern campaigns for the villages. During the first season we shall use the van in Lancashire and Cheshire so that the work may be under the observation of the committee, with a view to its perfect equipment, &c., before it is sent further afield. Subscriptions will be duly acknowledged in your columns; and I shall be glad to hear directly also from either individuals or societies who may be interested in the venture.

MEETINGS OF THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL AT GENEVA.

SIR,—Will you allow me to inform any of your readers who may be thinking of attending the meetings of the International Council at Geneva, that the party organised from Essex Hall will leave London on Friday morning, August 25, at 10 a.m., proceeding to Geneva by way of Newhaven, Dieppe, and Paris. The tickets are available to return any time within twenty-five days, but all the party must proceed together on the outward journey.

Several people are making their own private arrangements, through Messrs. Thomas Cook & Sons, for dates other than August 25. It is only necessary that they should obtain membership tickets, and if they desire hotel or pension accommodation to be provided at Geneva, I should be informed of their requirements without delay.

In answer to inquirers, I may say that evening dress will be worn at the Conversazione and the banquet. but it is not obligatory. Care should be taken by those who wish to be economical not to burden themselves with much luggage.

There is every prospect of a large attendance from Great Britain and Ireland. The Committee at Geneva are doing everything in their power to make the gatherings attractive and inspiring. Never before in its history did the city of Calvin entertain so many representative "heretics." Many leading citizens have joined the Reception Committee, and the liberal religious thinkers and workers from both sides of the Atlantic, and from India and other countries, are assurred of a warm welcome.

Applications for travel or membership tickets, with the necessary cheque or money order, should reach me, if possible, during the coming week.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

London: Bell-street Mission.—The Rev. Sydney H. Street writes from 4, Avenue Villas, Cricklewood-lane, N.W.:—"May I make an appeal through your columns on behalf of our Bell-street Children's Holiday Fund. I have over 70 children on my list that I should like to send away for a country holiday, but I have not sufficient money available for the purpose, and unless I can obtain a further £12 or £15 I shall be reluctantly compelled to curtail the list. I may mention that the children themselves in all cases pay from 3s. 6d. to 4s. 6d. towards their expenses, and that our men's club has voted £2 to help in this matter."

Blackpool: North Shore.—The annual Flower Services were held on Sunday last, the preacher being the Rev. R. McGee, who took as his subject in the morning "The Parable of Beauty," and in the evening "Lessons from Flowers." The service in the afternoon was conducted by the Rev. G. O. Bainton, Congregationalist. The attendance at the services was very good, especially in the evening. Special anthems and solos were sung by the choir, and selections were rendered on the violin and 'cello by two professional musicians, who kindly gave their services.

Bury Sunday School Union.—A party of 120 joined in a most successful ramble on Saturday, July 8, the direction being Birtle Dene, Ashworth Valley, and Simpson Clough. Mr. Jno. Clegg conducted the party, and Mr. W. W. Midgley acted as nomenclator. After tea, at the Heywood Unitarian School, Mr. W. Yates (president of the Union) took the chair, and Mr. Midgley gave a short lecture on "Nature's arrangements for vegetables dispersing their seed." Votes of thanks, the singing of the Doxology and Benediction, brought the pleasant proceedings to a close.

Leicester: Great Meeting (Resignation).—The Rev. E. W. Lummis, on account of continued ill-health, has been obliged to resign the pulpit of the Great Meeting. The congregation granted their minister a three months' leave of absence in the spring, but this has not proved sufficient, and the London specialist who has been consulted advises that to effect a cure a further prolonged rest will be necessary, with residence for the remaining summer months in some high and bracing country place, and during the winter, from October to March, at Davos or some similar Swiss health resort. Mr. Lummis's letter of resignation was read after morning service last Sunday, and on the motion of Mr. A. H. Paget, chairman of the Vestry, seconded by Mr. Alfred Hopps, the resignation was accepted, with an expression of the deepest sympathy for its cause, and the most sincere grief for the severance of a connection that had gained for the minister the esteem and affection of every member of the congregation.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—The summer gathering of the teachers in the district was held at Liscard on Saturday, the 8th inst. The afternoon was spent in rambles about the parks and shore, and at five o'clock the party, about ninety in number, assembled in the Church Hall, Manor-road, where tea was very kindly provided by the Liscard congregation. A hearty vote of thanks was proposed by the president (Rev. J. Morley Mills) expressing the gratitude of the members for the cordial way in which they had been received. Rev. J. L. Haigh seconded the motion, which was responded to by the Rev. A. E. Parry. A service was afterwards held in the chapel, conducted by the Rev. A. E. Parry, the address being given by the Rev. J. Morley Mills, who took for his subject the important place the children of to-day will occupy in the future, and the consequent importance of the Sunday-school teacher's work.

London: Peckham.—On Saturday, July 8, the Avondale Band of Hope had their annual excursion, and journed by tram to Addington Hills, Surrey, where they were joined by the members of the Wandsworth Cycling Club, among whom were the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, and several old members and friends of Avondale. Before starting for home short encouraging addresses were given by Mr. Cottarell, of the Croydon Band of Hope Union, the minister, Rev. A. F. G. Fletcher, and Mr. J. Bredall, who took a photograph of the group.

London: Stamford-street. — A very successful flower show and industrial exhibition, in connection with the Blackfriars Mission, was held in Stamford-street Chapel on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, opened on the first day by Lady Durning-Lawrence, and on the second day by Mr. C. F. Pearson, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. There was a good show of plants, some of which, including a beautiful aspidistra, were singled out for special commendation, and in front of the platform there was a bright row of plants sent by Mr. F. Nettlefold, to be given away as prizes on Wednesday evening. The industrial exhibition contained a most interesting and varied collection of articles, a few simply for exhibition, but most the work of members competing for the prizes. Among these was a fire screen with a glass centre, set in a frame of wrought iron, with a beautiful design including some natural foliage. Four original hymn tunes by workers in the Mission were the result of another competition. Mr. S. S. Tayler took the chair on Tuesday evening, and after an opening glee and song, spoke of the great value of such an exhibition, as leading their young people to pleasant and useful occupations for long winter evenings. Mrs. Tucker then read the report on the section for needlework, &c., which praised the care, patience, and artistic skill of much of the work. Elder women had sent in specimens both of laundry work and cooking, but she regretted that the girls under eighteen had not competed in either of those departments, and hoped it would not be so next year. Mr. W. H. Ballantyne read the report as to drawings, photography, shorthand, and various kinds of wood and metal work, in which a number of prizes were awarded, and the Rev. W. L. Tucker followed with the report on the flowers, and the awards of Mr. Nettlefold's gardener, who had again acted as judge. The report said he had never seen so large and varied an exhibition of plants at that Mission before. The chairman then called on Lady Durning-Lawrence, who expressed her great pleasure at being present, and interest in their work, and declared the exhibition open. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, in proposing a vote of thanks to Lady Durning-Lawrence, said it must be twenty-four years since he had started the first little window gardening exhibition in that place, and it was pleasant to see how common such exhibitions had now become, and how much was done for window gardening in the poor quarters of the city. The care and love for flowers was a most excellent and refining influence in the life of the people. The resolution was seconded by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, in a humorous speech, and carried by acclamation, followed by a similar vote to the chairman, moved by the Rev. W. L. Tucker, and seconded by Mr. J. Welch. An exhibition of musical drill and a dramatic performance in the schoolroom over the chapel followed. In the vestry there was also a picture exhibition, containing 64 examples of ingenious joking. The singing of the choir added greatly to the pleasure of the evenings.

Mossley (Welcome Meeting).—On Sunday, July 2, the Rev. James E. Stead commenced his ministry at Mossley, the day being set apart for the annual flower service, and there were good congregations at each service. Special music was rendered by the choir and scholars. The collection amounted to over £9. On Tuesday evening a reception was held in the school to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Stead to Mossley. The congregation had made a great effort and over 260 people were present. On the platform were the Revs. W. Harrison, H. S. Tayler, H. R. White, Chas. Peach, W. F. Turland, H. B. Smith, W. G. Price, the Rev John Davies, Vicar of St. John's, Mossley, and other gentlemen. The oldest officer of the school and church, Mr. John Gledhill, presided, and bid a hearty welcome to the Rev. J. E. and Mrs. Stead, on behalf of the church and school. Addresses were given by the Revs. W. Harrison, Chas. Peach, H. S. Tayler, Mr. Chas. Bell (Redcar), and the Rev. John Davies, vicar of St. John's, who was pleased to welcome Mr. Stead as a fellow worker in the cause of Christ. He said they perhaps would not agree in belief, but they surely could agree to differ. Mr. Stead returned thanks for the kind expressions and good wishes. In doing so he said mention had been made of their late esteemed minister, the Rev. T. R. Elliott, and Mrs. Elliott, who were held in affectionate esteem by the congregation. There need be no sundering of old ties, but he hoped that Mrs. Stead and himself would by hard work win a place in their hearts. One of the most successful gatherings held at Mossley Church was closed with the Benediction.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual picnic was held on Saturday July 1, at Mossley. About 130 persons partook of tea in the schoolroom, after which, by electric tram and road, the party went towards Roaches. Thence, a delightful ramble was taken by way of Nutbottom to Chew Valley, at the entrance of which a halt was made, and a meeting held on the grassy slope. Mr. A. Slater presided, and a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the Mossley friends for their arrangements, to Rev. J. E. and Mrs. Stead, the newly-appointed minister at Mossley, and his wife, and to Mr. Radcliffe Firth, who in an excellent manner acted as guide to the party. The resolution was moved by Rev. H. B. Smith, and seconded by Rev. B. C. Constable. The other ministers present included Revs. J. A. Pearson, W. G. Price, and W. F. Turland. Several Whitsuntide hymns were sung, and the ramble was enjoyed by all.

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH,

NARBOROUGH ROAD, LEICESTER.

Minister: Rev. GERTRUD VON PETZOLD, M.A.

The Committee of this Church now appeal with confidence to Unitarian and Liberal Christian friends throughout the country and ask their assistance in removing the balance of the debt that has weighed upon them heavily for the last four years. It was incurred by the building of the Church and Hall, consequent on the removal of the congregation from Wellington-street to a new suburban district, where a vigorous new life has been infused into their work.

At the present time large congregations are being attracted under the ministry of the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, M.A., and the principles of Liberal Christianity are being brought prominently before the whole town of Leicester, great interest being aroused thereby generally.

The cost of the buildings, £4,360, has been attacked with great vigour by the congregation and friends, the result of their efforts being the substantial reduction of £3,466, which is, however, inclusive of £1,476 realised by the sale of the old property. The most recent effort has been a subscription, amounting to £238, by members of the Church, who, having thus made all the sacrifice within their power, feel justified in asking for a practical expression of sympathy from supporters of the general cause.

Towards the remaining balance the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have promised the last £100.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A SERIES of Sunday morning services for visitors and residents in the Windermere and Ambleside districts will be held in the Institute, Windermere, beginning to-morrow (Sunday), July 23, and continuing to September 10. Various ministers will conduct the services, which will begin each morning at 11 o'clock. The services have been arranged by the Missionary Conference.

UP to Wednesday, July 19, 143 applications for membership tickets for the meetings of the International Council at Geneva had been received at Essex Hall, and of these 90 will travel together from London on Friday, Aug. 25. Among the ministers, in addition to Mr. Carpenter, Mr. Bowie, and Mr. Tarrant, who are readers of papers, we observe the names of the Revs. Dendy Agate, F. K. Freeston, Alfred Hall, Charles Hargrove, James Harwood, Richard Lyttle, J. McDowell, J. J. Marten, T. P. Spedding, C. J. Street, F. H. Vaughan, Joseph Wood, and W. Wooding. Among the laymen are the names of Mr. W. B. Bowring, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mr. W. A. Sharpe, and Mr. T. F. Ward. Among the ladies the list also includes such well-known names as Miss C. Gittins, Miss Herford, Miss M. Pritchard, and Miss Tagart.

THE Geneva Committee have issued a four-page Bulletin of the "Congrès International du Christianisme Libéral et Progressif," which opens with a clear statement of the principles of liberal Christianity, referring to Professor Jean Réville's book "Le Protestantisme libéral, ses origines, sa nature, sa mission" (now published in an English translation in Williams & Norgate's Crown Library), and then gives an account of the two former meetings of the International Council at London in 1901, and at Amsterdam in 1903. Among further announcements as to the Geneva meetings we find that Professor Pfleiderer is to contribute a paper on "Die Quellen des Christlichen Erlösungsglauben," "The Sources of the Christian Doctrine of Redemption"; Rabbi Louis Lévy, of Dijon, a paper on "Exposition théorique du Judaïsme libéral; and Principal Franklin Southworth, of Meadville, on "The Condition and Prospects of Liberal Christianity in the United States."

THE Baptist World Congress in London was brought to a close on Tuesday evening by a demonstration in the Albert Hall after a most successful series of meetings. It was decided on the previous day to form a Baptist World Alliance, and Dr. Clifford is the first president, Dr. Prestridge, a distinguished American delegate, and the Rev. J. H. Shakespeare, the secretaries. The papers read before the Congress on questions of Biblical criticism, which were broad minded in tone, are published, together with Dr. A. H. Strong's sermon, in this week's Christian World Pulpit. One of the papers read last week was on "The Trend of Modern Thought," by Dr. Mullins, President of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky. It contained a summary in six axioms of what Dr. Mullins held would be the Baptist theology of the future :—

1. The theological axiom: The holy and living God has a right to be sovereign.
2. The religious axiom: All men have an equal right to direct access to God.
3. The ecclesiastical axiom: All believers have equal privileges in the Church.
4. The moral axiom: To be responsible men must be free.
5. The social axiom: Love your neighbour as yourself.
6. The religio-civic axiom: A free Church in a free State.

THE annual meeting of the International Arbitration and Peace Association was held on Wednesday afternoon at the Caxton Hall. A report of the year's proceedings was presented by Mr. I. Green, and was sufficient to show the necessity for and the value of this society, which is animated by what Mr. Birrell described as a pure idealism, and which has a practical plan of action. Among the influential supporters of the work who have been removed by death we find the name of Rev. Arthur Harvie, who founded the Tyneside branch of the Association. It was matter of regret that the veteran president, Mr. Hodgson Pratt, was prevented by ill-health from being present, but the stirring message from him shows that his devotion to the cause is still fresh and unwearied.

THE chair was taken by Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, who struck the keynote of the meeting: In one direction the cause of peace has advanced, in another it has suffered retrogression. There is more talk of arbitration; indeed, there is more arbitration. On the other hand, the preparations for war continue with accelerating momentum. Our own country is one of the chief offenders in this respect. The figures for recent years show what a serious menace our armaments are to the national life. Within five years the cost of the army has risen from £22,000,000 to £34,000,000; that of the Navy from £27,000,000 to £39,000,000. An increase in all of £24,000,000, or more than the total cost of the Army in 1899-1900. Among the speakers were Rev. W. Jephson, Mr. A. E. Fletcher, Mr. A. Birrell, Mr. Geo. Barnes, who had been asked to speak on behalf of organised labour, and Mr. Felix Moscheles.

ONE feature of Mr. Jephson's speech is of particular importance, since what he had to say about the public schools might with great advantage be taken to heart by the managers of our Sunday-schools. It is worth considering whether it were not possible to persuade some men and women among us to start a teaching campaign in the schools and the Young People's Guilds for definite advocacy of principles of international peace. Mr. Jephson spoke from his experience on the late School Board and on the London Education Committee. At frequent intervals, he said, Lord Meath or some like-minded person petitioned for the introduction of guns or flags or some other instrument of mischief into the schools. The Arbitration Association had not yet approached them with a petition to praise and explain the value of peace, a real peace and not an armed truce. There has been a considerable change in American sentiment on this question, which Mr. Jephson attributes largely to the changed tone of the elementary teaching and the substitution of friendly for unfriendly text-books. In another respect we many anticipate a lead from the United States where it is proposed to establish a Minister of Peace.

A MINISTRY of war is accepted as a normal and necessary condition. A ministry of peace seems a Utopian proposal. And this very fact serves to show what a tremendous task awaits us in our endeavour. It should rouse our gratitude to the International Arbitration and Peace Association which offers a rallying point to those who wish the nations to live together in amity, to substitute for the old bad system of predatory war the new era of peace and friendship among the peoples.

THE twelfth summer meeting for University Extension students at Oxford is to be held from Aug. 4 to 28. The lectures in the historical section are to deal with the period of the Renaissance and the Reformation. They include three lectures by the Rev. W. Hudson Shaw on the Oxford Reformers—Colet, Erasmus, and More; a lecture by Father Gasquet on the "Dissolution of the Monasteries," one by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers on "The Lollard Element in the English Reformation," and one by Dr. Horton on Calvin. The literature section, dealing with the sixteenth century, includes another lecture on Erasmus by Mr. Hudson Shaw, one on Shakespeare's stage by Professor A. C. Bradley, and four on "Aspects of Shakespeare" by Professor Walter Raleigh. Other sections deal with arts, natural science, and social economics. The inaugural address is to be given by Professor James Stuart at half-past eight on Friday evening, Aug. 4.

IN the section on social economics, the Earl of Crewe is to lecture on the "Housing Problem," the Earl of Lytton on the "Temperance Problem," and Mr. C. F. G. Masterman on the "Problem of the Unemployed." It is also proposed to organise a conference to discuss methods for solving this last problem. Among the announcements of non-official lectures to be given during the session are those of Manchester College. The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter will lecture on "The Revival of Learning in its Relation to Biblical Study," the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers on "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," and the Rev. W. Addis on "The Theology of the Old Testament, with special reference to the Priestly Legislation." There will be three lectures on each subject.

THE Time-Table of Lectures, &c., for the summer meeting announces for the first Sunday, August 6, the following preachers:—11 a.m., the Rev. W. Hudson Shaw at St. Mary's (the University Church); 11.30, the Rev. Dr. Odgers at Manchester College; 7 p.m., the Rev. D. H. S. Cranage, at St. Mary's; 8.15, the Rev. Dr. Horton at Mansfield College; the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter at Manchester College. Mr. Carpenter is announced to give three Sunday evening lectures on "The Book of Revelation." He will also preach at the morning service on August 13, when Canon Hensley Henson will be at St. Mary's.

XXIV.

GALLIO, who is reading for a medical degree, discoursed to me at some length lately on the gain which had come to medical science through the practice of vivisection. This I did not venture to deny. He then went on to speak of the future gain to humanity. That will depend, I said, on what you mean by humanity. By humanity he meant man. If by man you mean the flesh upon his bones, I continued, then there is a possibility of gain; if you mean anything deeper, then there is certainty of loss. In matter of life or death, he thought, the flesh would always come first. If that were so, I replied, martyrdom would have no meaning and would have had no history. But Gallio said he could not see it, and left me.

That confession of his—that he could not see it—gave me a clue. Was it, after all, a question of sight? Was Gallio, without knowing it, simply and honestly unable to distinguish between utility and morality, between humanity as a body to be healed and humanity as a soul to be saved?

And what of cruelty in the past? Was that also pure shortsightedness? A Spartan father left it to the public authorities to decide whether his new-born child should be allowed to live; allowed to live he might be so severely trained as to die under the lash. When a Roman general entered the city in triumph, distinguished captives graced his train, and, when a certain point in the ascent to the Capitol had been reached, some of these were led aside and murdered in cold blood. In two or three of his letters Cicero hints that gladiatorial shows were little to his taste, but the shame of them does not seem to have entered his mind, and in one of his Disputations he argues that to see criminals fight is the best possible way of learning to face pain and death. Seneca is quick enough to see the fallacy of the plea that the sufferers were only criminals, and he denounces all such sights as hurtful to the beholder; but when, in another place, he speaks of pity, pity, he says, is for women, not for men. Latin writers, as a rule, narrate the barbarities of their time without comment, regarding them apparently as blunders rather than as crimes. Certainly a people trained in this way would be little shocked by the spectacle of living bodies turned into burning torches to light up Cæsar's gardens.

Nor was Christian Europe quick to see suffering as suffering. Forced conflicts between man and man were abhorred, but the forcing of confession by torture was excused. The pity shown to the widow and the orphan was refused to the captive and the slave. The leper might claim compassion, but not the heretic. A loathsome dungeon was as much part of the furnishing of a castle as a rich banqueting hall, and the sighing of the prisoners beneath did not spoil the happiness of those who feasted overhead. The effect of religion was rather in some respects to deaden the sense of sight. In the name of religion revolting atrocities might even become holy deeds. The old Beatitude might almost have been read as: Blessed are the merciless. Later on, the brutalities of the amphitheatre repeated themselves on a smaller scale in the bull-ring and the bear-garden. We can explain it all only by saying that the prophecy was fulfilled which said: Seeing they shall see, and shall not perceive.

Callousness seems, then, to have been due, not so much to want of feeling as to lack of visualising power. Thus a Puritan might abstain from hawking and hunting without a glance of consideration for animal suffering, just as, after the Restoration, a godly divine might send his boys to see the Shrove-tide cock-throwing, and pray heaven to protect them on the way, without for a moment suspecting his own piety. Yet why rail at old-world inconsistency, when the treatment of animals to-day is full of anomalies and contradictions as hard to explain?

The quickening of sight will come, no doubt, with education. On education legislation must always wait, for wrong cannot be prevented until it has been recognised. Gallio, I fear, is unteachable, but his children, I believe, will think differently. They will think not only of man the sufferer, but also, and not less gravely, of man the tormentor. They will talk less about cruelty in nature, and shrink more from cruelty out of nature, unnatural. The cruelty in nature, if it be cruelty, lies within limits; the cruelty in man is unlimited. Nature does not invent new pains, nor craftily stimulate them, nor needlessly prolong them, nor wantonly repeat them. Man does all these things. He can be more brutal than any brute has ever been. He may of the savage wolf make an obedient hound, and of the obedient hound a loyal friend, and then be worse than a wolf to the dog that was his friend. It is given to him to check, if he will, the ruthlessness of nature, to soften the hard grip of natural law, to infuse tenderness into the natural struggle for life, to witness to a providence overruling the natural order of things, to be himself as a god to the animal creation. When man ceases to be the minister and interpreter of divine pity, the sole evidence of such pity, so far as this world is concerned, will cease also. Rather let him die of uncured disease than lose this high prerogative. That life is no longer human which is preserved by inhuman means. This, of course, Gallio does not see—not at present.

I think I can understand why in the Litany there is prayer for deliverance not only from "hardness," but also from "blindness," of heart.

A WARNING.—Will friends who receive visits from certain men—one a young man and the other an elderly man—who profess to belong to Cairo-street Chapel, Warrington, and who use the names of prominent members, kindly be on their guard? No recommendation is given to either cases, nor has any letter of introduction been written by members or minister.

LITERATURE.

PLAIN LIVING AND HIGH THINKING.

Is there any connection in the nature of things between plain living and high thinking, or did the poet couple such companions together merely because he was poor? Some other reason than poverty he might have had, as, for instance, a just regard for temperance. It is quite conceivable that temperance was in his mind—indeed most readers will have no doubt upon the subject—but, after all, the poet could not think of temperance as we think of her to-day. Temperance is a virtue equally well worshipped by experience, by superstition, by fanaticism, by asceticism—equally well, did we say? Not so, for there is a temperance even in temperance itself, to which golden mean practical experience has shown itself hitherto the safest guide. It is a treasured perception of practical experience that intemperance brings a cloud over the faculties, and puts high thinking out of the question, or any dignified conversation of life. It has been known always that an evil lurks in intemperance, but never until to-day has it been known precisely what intemperance or folly in diet is, precisely what are its ruinous effects upon the body, and never until to-day has it been possible to give a scientific account of temperance. We regard this increase of knowledge as so much unquestionable gain, bringing an ancient virtue nearer to us, and affording a fresh proof of the beneficence that lies in science. Not that the world has ever lacked sign-posts of temperance and intemperance, both physical and moral, nor danger-signals stationed here and there for the warning of all prudent passengers along the highway; but now we have something better than these. Temperance in eating and drinking that was formerly judged of less by what she is than by what she is not, has now lifted the veil from her face to be discerned in her native feature. The control of our life in respect to its diet need depend no longer upon the fear of evil consequences, nor upon the melancholy wisdom taught by unhappy examples, nor even upon friendly counsels; we may rest it if we please upon the one right law, the physiological fact, the ascertained verity that is the best support of intelligence.

What, then, are these new discoveries concerning what we should eat and what we should drink, and who has made them? For the most recent word that science has to say upon the matter, readers may be referred to the studious and painstaking volume that now lies before us.* What manner of book is this? It may be considered as somewhat of a novelty in literature. A comparative history of the dietetic customs of a very great number of the nations of the world, both ancient and mediæval, and contemporary, is as much of a novelty as Teufelsdröckh's celebrated treatise concerning clothes. And, like Teufelsdröckh's again, this history is philosophical as well as narrative. The author suggests conclusions from the large mass of information that he has collected together. If we come to think about it, it will stike us with surprise that there has never been a work of this kind undertaken before. What is the best food of man? This is by no means a settled question. We all eat as we have been brought up to eat, but what ground have we more reasonable than custom for supposing that we eat the perfectly right things to eat in the perfectly right way? What do other people live upon, and how does their diet seem to suit them? Such a question as this has been asked long ago, but Mr. Russell asks it in the manner of a strict scientific inquiry, and has ranged far and wide in search of the facts that supply the answer. These facts having been assembled and arranged in order, the next business is to inquire of medicine and chemistry and physiology what light they have to throw upon the grand problem of the perfect diet of man. Mr. Russell amasses the views of doctors and naturalists and other scientific investigators. But stay, cries the reader, is all this trouble worth while? Can I afford to attend to such a tangle as this when here I am, hale and hearty, and busy also, far too busy, in fact, to waste time in unnecessary thoughts about my dinner? In reply we must refer the reader to Mr. Russell's introduction to his volume. That prefatory chapter contains the justification for the scientific handling of the subject. It is of nothing less than national importance. "Education," says Mr. Russell, meaning particularly elementary education as at present it exists in England, "Education has neglected the training of each child, each future parent, in the most important elements of its sound growth as a member of the common wealth." What is wanting? A sound and sufficient system of instruction in the principles of diet. Mr. Russell points to the statistics of infant mortality, of drunkenness, and of disease, in proof of his contention that the strength of England runs to waste yearly through faults of feeding, faults for which sheer ignorance in some part is responsible. But if children and other persons are to be cured of ignorance there must be teachers in possession of knowledge, and custom is no sufficient basis for instruction, the subject must be founded on science. Therefore it is well worth while that Mr. Russell should have written, and that his book should find readers. We regard his treatise as assured of usefulness, even should its particular conclusions as to the comparative excellence of this or that form of diet fail to be accepted. It has the grand merit of insisting upon the fact that the strength of a nation, moral as well as physical, is very closely related indeed to the diet of its people. It is upon facts such as this that the conscience of civilised nations is being re-moulded.

Upon public grounds, therefore, Mr. Russell and the school of thinking that he represents have an unimpeachable claim to attention. And no less, we think, upon grounds more within the sphere of the individual. The following paragraph is of weight in this connection:—

"The needless wrecking of health is not confined to the poor and uneducated, but extends to the rich, and very conspicuously to the highest in intellect, for their sufferings and loss of efficiency are most severe. Many of the greatest brain-workers have undergone inexpressible trials from lack of adjustment in the matter of diet. De Quincey was utterly prostrated with 'nervous horror,' 'deranged liver,' 'incapacity for food,' and lost 'all power of thinking at all.' Carlyle had 'nameless struggles and miseries,' 'dyspepsia like a rat gnawing,' mood 'tragical, gloomy, weary, dispirited, 'sick'; he was 'all palpitation, fluttered with sleeplessness'; these attacks were long-continued, and terribly spoilt a great part of his life. Darwin spoke of 'not one whole day without my stomach 'greatly disordered, and most days great 'prostration of health,' 'wretched digestive organs,' 'life a burden,' and for the greatest part of his life he was obliged to remain much in retirement, owing to such troubles. Huxley endured great depression and want of energy, and described himself as 'in for life-long 'dyspepsia.' After being 'worried almost to death,' at last, by greatly reducing his diet, and cutting off alcohol and tobacco, freeing himself, as he expresses it, from 'gross intemperance,' he became as vigorous as ever he was in his life. Robert Browning suffered at one time 'from a state of nervous prostration and 'physical apathy.' Herbert Spencer was perforce an invalid during a large part of his life, painfully sensitive, and subject to disorders of digestion and nerves.

"Such heavy troubles of original workers did not, I think, much affect the great men of early times, or those who lived with unusual frugality, like Benjamin Franklin. They belong to the time of excitant foods and drinks, the time of flesh, strong tea, sedentary pursuits, and many distractions, of which, perhaps, news and business letters coming daily are not the least."

Having presented the apology for his treatise under many lights in his introduction, Mr. Russell proceeds to assemble the opinions of great naturalists, physiologists, and chemists concerning the proper diet of man, whether animal or vegetable.

The next chapter contains a table of the relative values of foods, with a consideration of their cost. In the chapter on the food of animals considered in relation to the strength and size of the animals there is much interesting information. The flesh-eating animals, Mr. Russell thinks, may be as strong as the plant-eaters for occasions, but the lion, the tiger, and the polar bear are not so well fitted for a steady and constant strain as the elephant, the camel, or the horse. The following paragraph has a value of its own:—

"..... The plant-eaters are more enduring as tribes than the carnivora. The battle is not always to the fierce nor the race to the swift. The gentleness of the antelope prevails against the ferocity of the lion, the stag outclasses the wolf, the bull beats the bear, and the rabbit beats the weasel. The social creatures are the happiest, the best-fitted to survive and replenish the earth. The carnivora are retiring and decreasing, the plant-eaters have multiplied. Small birds are always multitudinous, while the eagle kind remain scarce and solitary."

* Strength and Diet: A Practical Treatise, with special regard to the Life of Nations. By the Hon. R. Russell. Longmans, 12s. 6d. net.

Sections of the book, discussing the diet of ancient peoples, the diet of the Middle Ages and later times, lead up to the hundred and fifty pages of laborious compilation touching the diet of races and nations. It is possible here only to quote rather nakedly Mr. Russell's conclusion :— "that the very large majority of the "world's best examples of physical develop- "ment have been practically vegetarian." "Any set of healthy persons in a locality "living on a rightly chosen vegetable diet "surpasses in strength and well-being a set "in equal conditions living largely on flesh. "Rather copious testimony to the same "effect from athletics [is] adduced later."

The remainder of the book quotes the personal experiences and observations of many people, known or unknown, who have experimented with diet, discusses the medical testimony to the point, and there are chapters devoted to "stimulants and narcotics," and "the relation of diet to disease." An appendix contains suggestions for an improved dietary.

In conclusion, let us say that here is a laborious work, carried out with great tenacity of purpose and with a desire to be of use that must be respected. This book is a real book, because its author and compiler is in such close touch with what may be called the scientific conscientiousness of his time, that contemporary spirit so full of foresight and so noble which is facing questions of social welfare with a larger sagacity than the world has ever known before.

THE WARS OF RELIGION.*

THE descriptive title, usually given to one phase of the post-Reformation movement in France, has been used in this volume with justice to cover the strange welter of theological and political forces through which Europe passed into the modern phase. The conflict between Catholic and Huguenot in France, the Revolt of the Netherlands, the intrigues of Mary Stuart, the English war with Spain, the struggles in Ireland and the Plantation of Ulster, they are all due to the clashing of two contrary ideals, aspects of the war of religions; and to the modern secular mind the remarkable thing is the completeness with which religion still dominated the situation. As in previous volumes of the Cambridge History, we have a group of elaborate monographs, which are placed together rather than worked into a single scheme; and the scientific dryness and precision of statement make us regret once more the divorce between truth and beauty, a divorce which we believe can be only temporary in the writing of history. Among the notable contributions we may mention "The Wars of Religion in France," by Professor A. J. Butler; "The Empire under Ferdinand I. and Maximilian II.," and "The Empire under Rudolph II.," by Dr. A. W. Ward; "Mary Stuart," by the late Thomas Graves Law; "Spain under Philip II.," by Martin Hume; and "Britain under James," by the late Professor S. R. Gardiner, the last an unexpected after-math of the labours of the great historian. In addition to these more severely historical essays, there are chapters dealing with "French Humanism and Montaigne," by Mr. A. A. Tilley; "The Elizabethan Age of English Literature," by Sidney Lee; and "The End of the Italian Renaissance," by Professor A. J. Butler. The closing chapter, on "Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century," by the Rev. J. N. Figgis, should be studied carefully by those who want to understand the slow emergence of the modern idea of the state and of political and religious liberty under the pressure of practical necessities. "Those who wanted "government to be efficient, and desired "to carry on an energetic foreign policy," says Mr. Figgis, "would not wait on "the long task of educating public "opinion. Illustrations of this may be "found in the opinions of Wolsey and "Cromwell in England, and later in the "views of Cecil and Bacon, and again in "those of Strafford and Laud. All these "men wanted something done—order "introduced into the chaos of adminis- "tration; a single authority everywhere "recognised; the tangle of competing "and confused governmental agencies "reduced to a simple and smoothly work- "ing system, which would enable ideas "to be realised at once without regard "to average stupidity. They were all "quite honestly on the side of the one "power which on principles of natural "selection had proved its necessity to "the public welfare." This tendency was distinctly favourable to the Papal reaction and the growth of national despotism.

It is a great mistake to regard the Reformation movement as necessarily favourable to the principles of civil liberty. Luther, as Mr. Figgis points out, never cared for political freedom. The Anabaptists forced him to take refuge in the idea of the State as a divine institution, the exact counterpart of the mediæval theory of the Church. Indeed, the belief in the Divine Right of Kings, so repugnant to the modern liberal creed, was a form of claiming the independence of politics from ecclesiastical control. The differences of religion, however, acted as a check upon the growth of absolutism and contributed directly to a theory of popular rights. "For the true con- "ception of the State it is needed first to "realise the idea of sovereignty, and "afterwards to realise its practical limita- "tions. Religious liberty arose, not "because the sects believed in it, but out "of their passionate determination not to "be extinguished, either by political or "religious persecution." In these few sentences we have attempted to summarise some of the salient positions in Mr. Figgis' striking article. It sets a good many historical prejudices and a priori judgments in a new light. We are all inclined to believe that abstract principles and our favourite theories of liberty and right have been the chief factors in the growth of freedom, and to allow for too little influence to the logic of life. There are practical necessities which impose upon political societies and competing sects limiting conditions, not as a matter of abstract justice or philosophical theory, but because minorities have effective means of making good their right to exist.

PARADOX AND MR. CHESTERTON.

"IT may be a paradox, but that is because paradoxes are true." So writes Mr. Chesterton in one of the essays of his latest volume, "Heretics." It is a statement which most of his readers must have been expecting to fall at some time into his writings, an inevitable conclusion. His earlier work, that represented by his "Twelve Types," impressed us with the idea that from his tacit recognition that "all truth is paradox" would eventually issue the startling inference, "Therefore, all paradox is truth, Q. E. D." And here we have it, the illogical demonstration which has resulted in a perfectly logical order. For this we know now somewhat better the character of the mind of Mr. Chesterton, and may henceforward expect such revelations as these: "The only intellectual stability is on the horns of a dilemma;" "Things are not what they seem, therefore they seem not to be what they are, and ergo, what is, cannot seem to be." We have long believed that statistics and the Bible can prove anything; Mr. Chesterton gives us an additional creed, that logic has nothing to do with reasoning, but is only a sort of academic function for making interesting statements in paradox. All this is because he has come to the opinion that the world is upside down, which we are disposed to share with him. and that to cognise it, as the Theosophists say, we must stand on our heads, a position we do not elect to assume.

The paradoxical character of Mr. Chesterton's phaseology is a little too brilliant, and has more than once involved him in expressions which startle us as much by their extravagance as by their originality. It compels us to wonder whether the man who thinks that "the most practical thing about a man is still his view of the universe" has himself any other view than one kaleidoscopic, and whether so far he has given to the public that quite rightly admires him anything except miscellaneous views which will not cohere in the "cosmic truth" over which he appears to be fundamentally exercised. Indeed, we are inclined to suppose that his views of the universe are not derived from any definite point of vantage, but are rather views, opinions, even dogmas, which he "ventures" before readers who have come to be fascinated by his lively outlook upon affairs generally and his remarkable facility of suggestive expression. We imagine he, as much as his readers, wondered what "The Napoleon of Notting Hill" was all about, and whether his brilliantly audacious chapter on "Browning as a Literary Artist" in his book in the English Men of Letters Series was a really durable contribution to the study of the poet. Truth may be in the antithesis of common opinion, may be at the heart of a paradox, as a holy thing enshrouded, but the difficulty is the knowing whether we, and Mr. Chesterton, have closed upon the truth or have only embraced the vague form of the paradox which we may turn about, and upside down, without being any stronger or wiser for our exercise. Of course, one only sees himself in a looking-glass, and normal earth is a land of wonders—a fact which itself may justify Mr. Chesterton's inveterate use of paradox; but it does not justify our standing on our heads to obtain a view of the universe.

But if we may be a little sceptical of the "cosmic truth" which Mr. Chesterton has "up his sleeve," so to speak, "truth" which the editor of the Daily News is disposed to correct by means of a selection of sermons, it would be less than gracious not to confess our admiration of his literary genius and, amid all his laughter, his serious argument on our human manners and principles. His latest book "Heretics," is "smart," just as he intended it should be; it is the work of a man with a style wholly his own; it is a collection of papers which for literary workmanship and deliberate deliberateness of treatment must rank high in the order of the rediscovered "short essay"; but, more than all this, it is a splendid corrective of half our accepted common opinions. How far shall we adjust ourselves to Mr. Chesterton's views of his "heretics" is quite a secondary consideration, but for the reading of his suggestive pages we shall certainly adjust ourselves to ourselves and take many a new view of "the universe." For the virtue of these papers lies in the fact that while they endeavour to deal with men in particular, and fail—as we think—they do succeed in presenting the hidden side of half the world, in revealing many things in general, which, because they are things in general, we have been steadfastly overlooking. While Mr. Chesterton professes to deal definitely with Rudyard Kipling, George Bernard Shaw, H. G. Wells, and the rest, he really deals with them all indirectly, using them as so many pegs whereon to hang impressionist pictures by Mr. Chesterton, from which, at various angles of vision, we may catch what we throw into them. He helps us to add to our view of the universe, that is, to look at something, anything, from new points. We may question, as no doubt we shall, many of his reflections on Christianity, wherewith his subjects are interlarded; but we shall find, nevertheless, in the substratum of his criticisms, much truth which we had not apprehended as such. Beneath all his playfulness over "the simple life" and kindred topics, a trifle too boisterous and Bacchanalian, we may find it perfectly true that in all these matters "our main conclusion is that it is a fundamental point of view, a philosophy of religion which is needed, and not any change in social habit or routine." And such a discovery may be useful to many of us who are unusually prone to the fascination of fads and common originalities.

Of the twenty essays collected into this volume that on "Omar and the Sacred Vine" strikes us as the most illuminative of its subject, and many a bewildered reader of the Rubáiyát will be thankful for it. It is the sort of essay which will no more satisfy the "cult" of Omar than the author's "Browning" can please the more pretentious Browning Societies; but this is of Mr. Chesterton's best sort, and will both please and satisfy the man who prefers to grapple with a meaning rather than to grope about a problem.

"Heretics," all the personæ of these discussions are, but only in relation to Mr. Chesterton. What the underlying "orthodoxy" is, we are not told; but it suggests itself as that of a "child of nature" who has found nature to be an everlasting paradox, and believes that cosmic truth lies in a riddle as complex as the confusion of the worlds, or in uncommonplaces as plain as pikestaffs.

WILLIAM C. HALL.

MILTON AS TEACHER.

IN a few hurried words at one of our London Whitsuntide meetings, I referred to the writings of Milton. I have often thought that the time might come, and there are moments when it seems close upon us, when the ordinary Englishman would no longer listen in patience to lessons drawn from the Bible; when he would treat the Bible as a book whose pretensions had been examined by the learned and discredited. The particulars of the different criticisms he had heard of every book, from Genesis to the Revelation, would be mostly forgotten; the general effect would be that the Bible was untrusty and he wanted to hear very little more about it. He would thus revenge upon himself his former irrational Bible worship.

It is useless to be impatient with a man in that mood; it is more to the purpose to consider what is likely to appeal to him. The man who has been sickened of Solomon may still pay attention to a saying from Shakespeare; and one who scoffs at the books of Moses may pause when he catches the name of John Milton. For Milton has never had to be found out. No one ever supposed him to be a miracle of a man. He was a man peccable and passionate as his fellows, a man whose outward life was one of toil and valiant endeavour, a man whose domestic life was so pathetic that a sense of reverence holds one back from too hastily trying to summarise it. An inspired man was he. For having given him great powers, God gave him also great tasks to exercise them; great troubles and disappointments to discipline them; great sorrows to sanctify them.

It is curious that all Milton's greater poems may be classed as studies in temptation. The sweetly musical dramatic poem known as "Comus" is a sort of parable of the steadfastness of virtue in time of trial and a glorification of strenuous self-discipline. "Paradise Lost" is a study of Adam's sin with his repentance and partial recovery of hope and self-respect; the "Paradise Regained" may be taken as a kind of prophecy, symbolised by the victory of Christ over the tempter, of the final triumph of good; "Samson Agonistes" is the story of one called by Providence to play a hero's part; but morally so ill equipt that every blessing becomes a curse to him, every chance occurrence a snare.

It is instructive to note the development of Milton's teaching in these poems. When Milton wrote "Comus" he was still young. Conscious of great powers, calmly preparing himself to exercise them as Providence should open out the way, pure in heart, pure in life, he hardly knew yet what evil was. In "Comus" one feels that it is just the temptation that is unreal. The power of the wicked spirit is utterly scorned from the beginning. Milton could not indeed live nearly thirty years and be ignorant of the existence of evil; he had seen it as well as read of it. But it had never wrestled with him, or bruised him. Wherever he had been till now, Virtue had but to assert herself, and Vice would shrink abashed.

> Or, if Virtue feeble were,
> Heaven itself would stoop to her.

There is an awful distance between the lyric poem of "Comus" and the poem of "Paradise Lost." In the meantime Milton had entered into the struggle of life. In the terrible political contest of his time, he had known what it was for the side that to him represented the Right to have to fight as with the left hand only; he had known the day of defeat as well as the day of triumph. He had known the day when he could dream of the people as "a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks;" he had known too the bitter day when he had to doubt if not despair of the temper of the people, when he had met with men who did not deserve that any faithful parliament should hazard for them, that any noble spirit should conduct and lead them out, but were fit only to live and die in servile condition.

In private life, too, before this time Milton had suffered many things. What sin was, and repentance, and hope, and chastened humility, he had learned most thoroughly. Temptation is real enough in "Paradise Lost." It is Heaven's presence and guardian care that at times seem unreal. The angels guard Eden's gate. What use when Satan can so easily climb some other way? In any case Adam falls, and after suffering misery unrelieved, after making excuses all unworthy, after resentments and quarrels, the outward symbols of inward unrest, it is but a partial and uncertain peace he attains at last.

> But rise, let us no more contend, nor blame
> Each other, blamed enough elsewhere, but strive
> In offices of love how we may lighten
> Each other's burden in our share of woe.

The career of Adam can never more be a proud one. He will learn wisdom, but will ever be shamed at his own past folly; he will attain to virtue but never to perfect security in this world; and will thank Heaven's mercy rather than his own good deeds if he come at length to bliss. Milton would hardly be content to leave us so. The Quaker who asked him "What about Paradise Found?" must have voiced a question already heard within. He knew that his story was not complete. If sinful suffering man is represented in Adam, man as triumphant over sin is represented in the story of Christ. In the "Paradise Regained," Milton attempts, with partial success, to represent temptation as real and yet unsuccessful, to represent Christ as needing to toil, to suffer and be patient, and yet as able in the end to conquer his temptations completely and gloriously.

> Ill wast thou shrouded then,
> O patient Son of God, yet only stood'st > Unshaken!

When toward the close of the poem we read after Christ's last reply:

> He said and stood;
> But Satan smitten with amazement fell;

it seems like a prophecy of a better time, when man shall no longer be the victim of his own weakness and of the arts of inimical demons; when he shall awake in the likeness of God, and ill shall fly as an evil dream. So Milton hoped and so he prophesied.

Meantime he does not deceive himself concerning the actual condition of things. And his last poem, the magnificent drama of "Samson," is in its way the antithesis of "Paradise Regained." It is the story of one who is endowed with marvellous powers, who is marked out by Heaven for great exploits; yet, lacking wisdom to control his strength, alternates folly with heroic action till utter want of moral continence completely ruins him. His sacred secret blabbed to a harlot of the race of the enemy, himself betrayed, eyeless, a prisoner and slave; become the occasion of blasphemy in the mouth of the very enemy whom it was his business to destroy; what can he long for but death; that in the final defeat all lesser defeats may be forgotten; that he may have his part in that oblivion which is at once the doom and the refuge of the unworthy?

At length, from out the depth of misery and disgrace fresh comfort springs. No longer bewitched with outward form, Samson sees the truth of things as never before he saw. It becomes clear to him that even yet Heaven has not given him over. And he whose life had been so miserably equivocal, sounds the right note in death. "Living or dying," so sing the chorus who represent the general thought of the people.

> Living or dying thou hast fulfilled
> The work for which thou wast foretold.

To bring this brief paper to a close. Among the inspired teachers of our own country and language Milton if not greatest is one of the greatest. What does he teach us? In regard to God, the certainty of Divine Providence; in regard to man, the supreme importance of Duty.

Time was when the way of virtue seemed to Milton not only the right, but the inevitable way, a way almost easy. Later on he did not lose his faith in God, but he felt the fearful reality of temptation. In "Paradise Lost" it is the guardian angels who are deceived and outwitted. Satan gains his end in spite of them. And Milton seems to say to us: Be watchful, for thou knowest not whence the attack may come; and be humble, for only by God's grace and not by thy own valour wilt thou at last succeed. In "Samson Agonistes" he adds: "And finally, if thou hast failed, if in place of watching against the enemy thou hast been rash enough to tempt the devil to tempt thee, do not despair. Heaven's designs do not topple over when thine own fall down. If Heaven permit a man of sense to disgrace himself and become a fool, the same Heaven knows how to make use of a fool, self-confessed, in carrying out its wise designs. As long as thou livest there is hope to do some worthy thing; and if nothing but death is before thee begin thy amendment by dying nobly."

These are not new lessons. In themselves they are not sufficient ones. But such as they are they come from our own literature, and even the man who has given up his Bible may take the best that is in English literature and cling to it as a raft till he meet with some sure Word of God to carry him more safely home.

PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR.

The following resolution was adopted at the meeting of the Executive Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, held at Essex Hall, London, July 12, 1905:—

"The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, having heard with deep regret of the death of Mr. Protap Chunder Mozoomdar, desire to place on record their sense of the great devotion and ability which from his early years he brought to the service of Spiritual Religion. His eloquent addresses made a deep impression in England on his various visits. Here he made many friends, who now share in the sorrow of their brethren of a kindred faith in India. The Committee especially beg respectfully to assure Mrs. Mozoomdar of their sincere sympathy in her bereavement."

AT a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj, held at Calcutta on June 9, the following resolutions were passed:—

"The Executive Committee of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj place on record "their sense of deep sorrow and irreparable loss at the death of Babu Protap "Chunder Mozoomdar, who by his deep "piety and spirituality was a tower of "strength to the Brahmo Samaj, and who "by his profound scholarship and extraordinary eloquence spread the truth of "Brahmoism far and wide.

"Resolved also that they offer their "sincere and heart-felt condolence to the "widow of the deceased; and that a copy "of the above resolutions be sent to the "widow of the deceased."

AT a special meeting of the Managing Committee of the Punjab Brahmo Samaj, held on the evening of May 30, the following resolutions were adopted:—

"The Managing Committee of the "Punjab Brahmo Samaj wishes to place "on record its sense of profound sorrow "at the death of Bhai Protap Chunder "Mozoomdar, who, during his long ministry of forty years, has rendered unique "services to the cause of Theism in India "as well as England and America. The "Punjab Brahmo Samaj has special reason "to cherish his memory with grateful "reverence as it had the inestimable "privilege of his ministrations in the "course of his many visits to the Province.

"The Managing Committee wishes to "express its heartfelt condolence and "sympathy with Mrs. Mozoomdar in her "very sad bereavement.

"That the above resolutions be published in the local papers and the principal Brahmo papers in India and also "communicated to the Brahmo Samaj "Committee, Calcutta, and Mrs. Mozoomdar."

THE assurance of immortality is hidden in the righteousness and love of a good man's life.—H. W. Crosskey.

OBITUARY.

MRS. ANTHONY, HASTINGS.

ON Friday, July 14, in the little graveyard of the Congregational Chapel at Much Hadham, Herts, close to the ancestral home of the Anthony family, the ashes of the late Mrs. Anthony, who died July 10, at Hastings, were buried, after a simple service marked by a spirit of faith and trust in harmony with her whole disposition and character. The mourners included not only representatives of the family, but also members of the rural congregation that has long had good reason to honour the name she bore. The Revs. J. Greig (minister of the chapel) and W. G. Tarrant (Wandsworth) conducted the service.

The widow, for more than a quarter of a century, of Samuel Hollis Anthony, of Wynches, Much Hadham, she had resided for many years at Hastings. Delicate health rendered her life for the most part a sequestered one; and her rare gifts of wisdom, humour, and gentle force of character could be fully known by few. To these, however, her natural winsomeness was such that they could not realise that her years had outstripped the span of threescore and ten. Her outlook on life was intelligent and shrewd, and her interest in political, social, and religious movements keen and incessant. The stepmother of the late Rev. Edgar Solly Anthony, of Poole, she was a warm friend and counsellor to others of our younger ministry, who will long remember her gracious hospitality and stimulating intercourse. Her loving patience under heavy trials added the final touch of sweetness to a mind that could not otherwise than attract and charm. She leaves a son and daughter to mourn her loss, and with a circle of grateful friends to cherish an uplifting memory.

A Christian Conference has recently been formed in Manchester which members of various churches have joined for interchange of thought and idea, and an endeavour to find common ground not only in the great verities of religion common to them all, but also in the practical work of the churches in the world. The initiative came from the Rev. F. D. Cremer, Vicar of Eccles, who, it will be remembered, arranged a year or two ago a series of addresses in his church by representatives of various denominations. Mr. Cremer's invitation has been responded to by between thirty and forty clergymen and laymen of the Church of England, Presbyterian Congregationalist, Methodist, Baptist, Society of Friends, and Unitarian connections. At the last meeting a discussion was opened by Mr. T. C. Horsfall, a well-known and much-respected member of the Church of England, on Creeds and Truthfulness. The chairman is Mr. John W. Graham, Principal of Dalton Hall. The meetings are private, so we cannot give any account of the proceedings but the mere fact of such gatherings and discussions is of a very hopeful nature, and we congratulate the promoters, and particularly the Vicar of Eccles, on the establishment of the Conference.

A HYMN.

HERE, on the sun-dried golden turf,
Below—the sparkling, dancing surf
And ever-changing sea,
And clouds that drift in scudding race,
Father, we turn our thoughts to Thee!

Here, where the poppies greet the morn
In streaks of flame among the corn,
Where clover draws the bee,
And evening brings the silver moon
And yearning silence all too soon,
Grant that our hearts may yearn for Thee!

Here, where the curving downs stand high,
Shimmering golden 'neath the sky,
Spreading where'er we see,
Where fields of breeze-swept oats and wheat
Dream joyous through the summer heat,
Humbly we murmur thanks to Thee!

Here, where the lark from his retreat,
Darts up with sudden song so sweet,
Rippling in sound so free,
Where birds, and sea, and breeze combine
To sing a summer hymn divine,
Father, we sing in praise to Thee!

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"CAPTAINS COURAGEOUS."

EPHESIANS VI. 10—17.

THOSE of you who did not help to keep Empire Day on May 29 may like to know how the village children, whom I told you last week I meet every day, kept it. They brought flags and flowers to school. In the morning there was speech-making, and in the afternoon a holiday. It must have seemed rather like a geography lesson when the speakers asked questions and talked about this great empire of ours, its vast forests and wheat-fields, big cattle and ostrich farms, rich coal and iron, gold and diamond mines, and about the railways, canals, steamers, telegraphs and ocean cables, the letters and newspapers that join us each to each and all with all to the farthest parts of the globe. One speaker said that greater than the glory of wide stretching lands and rich product and wonderful inventions and undertakings was that of having more liberty than any other empire to choose who should rule us, and how we should be ruled, more freedom to trade, work, and worship God as seemed best to us.

I fancy most of the children, if they had thought at all about it, had a vague idea that the Empire was something to be kept going by King, Parliament and army, and that ordinary people need not trouble themselves much about it except at election time, or to shout and wave flags if there were a big victory for British troops. It was a surprise to hear that every child in that school had a share in making a great empire, by doing such everyday things as working hard and happily at school, being kind and useful at home, not being cruel to animals, playing healthy games, reading good books, keeping clean and active in body and mind, speaking and acting truthfully, saving money, and certainly not spending it on cigarettes or too many sweets; in short, by making the most of every opportunity to become healthy, wise, good men and women (or "citizens" as one speaker said). For besides being told of the things that make us rightly proud of our kingdoms and colonies, the boys and girls were reminded of the many things to be ashamed of, and to be seen even in this lovely English-Welsh valley—ignorance, selfishness, dirt, laziness, dishonesty, drunkenness, carelessness about religion, which no king, parliament and army, no good arrangements for work and trade, for schools and healthy homes, and for all sorts of churches and chapels can do away with, if people themselves do not try to remove them.

We must, therefore, all try to become good citizens of the empire, and that means, among other things, that we have to be very brave. Now, there is the courage which comes from having strong, well-managed bodies, and the courage which comes from strength and control of mind and spirit. The second kind of bravery enables us to bear and dare, if through bodily weakness we have not enough of the first. Both sorts are needed to dare the dangers of earth, air, fire and water, and to bear pain and hardship and sorrow, and to help our country by making the best use of the powers which God has given us.

One of the visitors read a story in verse about a little boy who "had convalescence," that is, he is getting better after a bad illness. He is at the seaside, and is talking to his sister about a new friend he has made on the shore.

"He's a sea-captain, not a land-captain; but, all the same, he was in the war,
And he fought—for I asked him—and he's been ill ever since, and that's why he's not afloat, but ashore,
And why somebody else has got his ship; and she behaved so beautifully in the battle, and he loves her quite as much as his wife, and rather better than the rest of his relations, for I asked him—and now he's afraid she will never belong to him any more.
I like him. I've seen him three times out walking with two sticks, . . . but never talked to him till to-day.
He'd only one stick and a telescope, and he let me look through it at the big ship that was coming round the corner into the bay.
He let me ask questions, and I said: 'Have you got convalescence? Do your eyes ache if you try to read, and your neck if you draw, and your back if you sit up, and your head if you talk?
Wouldn't you rather go back to bed? I think I would. Don't you wish you were well? Wouldn't you rather be ill than only better? I do hate convalescence, don't you?'
Then, he shut up his telescope and sat down on the shingle, and said: 'When you come to my age, little chap, you won't think "What is it I'd rather have?" but "What is it I've got to do?"
"What have I got to do or to bear, and how can I do it or bear it best?"
That's the only safe point to make for, my lad. Make for it, and leave the rest!'
I said: 'But wouldn't you rather be in battles than in bed with your head aching as if it would split?'
And he said: 'Of course I would; so would most men. But, my little convalescent, that's not it.
What would you think of a man who was ordered into battle and went grumbling and wishing he were in bed?'
'What should I think of the fellow? Why, I should know he was a coward,' I said.
'And if he were confined to bed,' said the sea-captain, 'and lay grumbling, and wishing he were in battle, I should give him no better a name;
For the courage that dares and the courage that bears are really one and the same.'"

Then the boy thinks of all the kind people who have worn themselves out in tending him during his illness, and he has been cross and complaining. "I wish I hadn't thought so much about being miserable that I never thought about trying to be good." And he sends his sister for a "gallop on Jack," as she has not been out of his sight for weeks.

"Tell me one thing before you start. If I learn to be patient, shall I learn to be brave, do you think? The sea-captain says so.
He says 'Self-command is the making of a man,' and he's a finely-made man himself, so he ought to know.
Perhaps if I try hard at convalescence now I may become a brave sea-captain hereafter, and take my beautiful ship into battle, and bring her out again with flying colours and fame,
If the courage that bears and the courage that dares are really one and the same."

So you see what sorts of bravery the best sailors and soldiers have. If the British Empire requires "captains courageous" to defend it by these less and less necessary battles with their terrible destruction of life, how much more does it need brave men and women, yes, and brave children too, to safeguard it in the everlasting warfare against evil and against anything that prevents the saving of life for the noblest purposes!

AN UNPUBLISHED LETTER OF JOHN WESLEY.

FOR the following letter of John Wesley's we are indebted to the Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., of Aberdare. The letter which, we understand, has not hitherto been published, is addressed to "Mr. Tho. Mason, Shopkeeper in Limerick."

It speaks for itself, as an instance of the intimate oversight that Wesley exercised over his people:—

"Castlebar, May 30, 1771.

"DEAR TOMMY,

"A conversation I had yesterday with C. Proctor determined me to write immediately. The person at Birr will not do: not only as she is far too young; little more than a child; but as she has only little, if any, Christian experience. You want a woman of middle age, well tried, of good sense and of deep experience. Such an one in every respect is Molly Pennington; but whether she is willing to marry or no, I cannot tell. If she is, I hardly know her fellow in the kingdom. If I meet with any I will send you word.

"I hope you speak to Jonathan How with all freedom, and tell him whatever you think amiss in him. Especially encouraging him to press all believers to go to perfection, and to expect it now! Peace with all your spirits!

"I am, dear Tommy,

"Your affectionate brother,

"J. WESLEY."

Mr. Jones adds a note that Mr. Mason did not marry Molly Pennington. The letter is now in the possession of some great-great-nieces of his, resident in Aberdare.

RELIGION OR DENOMINATION.

"OUR Unitarianism may quite well be left to take care of itself." So we wrote last week, in speaking of what the missionary ought to do who is intent on carrying the message of religion to the people. And what we had in mind as the essential thing to be made clear was, that the realities of religious life, and not any denominational interest, must always be the chief concern. No great religious movement has arisen or prospered through denominational ambitions or any eagerness to further the interests of a sect. The power of a quickened spiritual life has come first, in answer to deep human needs, and has possessed the hearts of men with a great longing to go out to help others and gather them into the true life, and if out of such a spiritual movement a powerful denomination has come into being, that has been a secondary result in the marshalling of forces and largely through repulsion from others who held to different methods of religious life. If ever denominational interests have taken the first place it has been a sign of degeneracy in the pure life of the spirit. So it was, surely, in the first preaching of the Gospel; so it was in the rise of the people called Quakers, gathered into the religious Society of Friends, so also in the rise of the people called Methodists. The passion of the new life came first, the deeper conviction of the true life with GOD, the over-mastering power of the Spirit breathing through the hearts of men, cleansing them from evil, lifting them out of all self-seeking to higher levels of devotion and eager, loving helpfulness. So they became messengers to their brethren, and bringers of new light and gladness. They went out to speak for GOD, "for GOD and man, in the strength of JESUS," to bring men to their true allegiance, and to do the work of Him who sent them. Whenever the interest of the society or denomination came to be of more concern than the self-forgetting service of the Gospel there was a hardening of heart, and no longer the genuine ring of a Divine ministry; the evil spirit of pride and tyranny too readily came in, and, gaining mastery, caused divisions or repression of the true life, and the pure testimony to the things of GOD was weakened.

So it is in every Church to-day. If the work of GOD is to be done, for His Kingdom and the welfare of mankind, it must be in self-forgetfulness, devoted to the highest and universal interests; by no other way can the breath of new life come into any Church, and the inspiration of the Divine Spirit stir the hearts of men to a more effectual ministry of love and truth.

In our own connection, in the fellowship of our Free Churches, this truth holds with exactly the same force as elsewhere. Our separate fellowship has been differentiated in the course of the religious life of this country by a very different process from that out of which the Society of Friends and Methodism arose. Partly, it has been through the seeking for spiritual freedom, and an undogmatic fellowship in religion; partly through the demand for a simpler interpretation of the Gospel and from a theological protest; and "our Unitarianism" has got its name from the theological protest, though it is constantly seeking to infuse into that name the larger meaning of spiritual freedom and the broad inclusiveness of a catholic religious fellowship. But certainly our churches have a right to exist only in so far as they have a message of religious life for the people. No true Church can be built, nor can there be hope of fruitful life or prosperous growth simply on the ground of theological protest.

The true life with GOD is the sacred charge of the Church, to be nurtured in its communion, to be declared by all its members through every aspect of their life and work in the world, and by its special messengers and witnesses through whatever means they find of reading the mind and heart of their fellow-men. It is this life to which our Churches must be dedicated with absolute devotion; that is what they must be thinking and caring about, and then their own life and all helpful activities will naturally find the most effective channels. It is not our business to be anxious and troubled about many things concerning "the denomination," but to be throwing our whole strength into the witness of that true life, and then the denomination and "our Unitarianism," in that sense, will take care of itself. It will grow and prosper if it is worthy of a place within the operations of GOD's kingdom; our duty is with the work of bearing faithful witness, not by word alone, but in practical fidelity, and by every means in our power to help others to enter into the same true life.

So the word of the faithful messenger will be concerned with truth and honour, and good citizenship and brotherly kindness, the lifting off of heavy burdens and the righting of grievous wrongs, the quickening of new hope in the degraded and outcast, the bringing home of the lost into the peace and joy of the FATHER'S house, the opening of blind eyes to all the beauty of this common earth and the gladness of human fellowship, the deep trust of the human heart and the power of reverence and faithfulness even unto death in submission to the righteous will of the ETERNAL, and all the far-reaching ministry of Love. No aspect of human life will be outside the range of his sympathy and the enlightening interpretation of his understanding heart. He will be simply as one who is among his brethren, a helpful friend, in GOD's world. And as with each trusted messenger, so with the Church as a whole, the living union of faithful people; they in their united faith and love have the same testimony to bear, and with yet more persuasive power, because they are together in the earnest purpose and rejoicing of that high fellowship. The man who speaks for GOD and the Church, which lives and works in the strength of that Divine Communion, are alike self-forgetful instruments of the holiest purpose, rich, according to the measure of their self-forgetfulness, in power of blessing and in possession of the joy and peace of the true life with GOD.

PROFESSOR VAN MANEN.

THE death of Professor van Manen, at Leiden, on July 12, came as a welcome release from a long and trying illness. When the third volume of the "Encyclopædia Biblica" was published in 1902, containing his notable articles on "Old Christian Literature" and "Paul," he was already incapable of further work, and he was obliged to resign his University professorship. The distressing form of aphasia from which he suffered cut him off not only from the eager intellectual pursuits to which his life had been devoted, but from happy intercourse with friends, and one must be glad for him that his long trial is now at an end.

Willem Christiaan van Manen was born at Noordeloos, in Holland, Aug. 8, 1842; thus at the time of his death he was not quite 63, half a year older than the late Richard Armstrong. A son of the manse (his mother was a Hugenholtz), he was educated at the high school at Y elstein and the University of Utrecht, where the keenness and fearless freedom of his thought already gave promise of that radical criticism with which his name was afterwards to be so prominently connected in the realm of Biblical scholarship.

On leaving the University in 1865 van Manen became a minister of the Dutch Reformed Church, and during nineteen years held three successive charges in small country places. From his last ministerial settlement at Zierikzee, near the mouth of the Schelde, in Zeeland, he went in 1884 to the University of Groningen, but was called in the following year to Leiden, as Professor of Old Christian Literature and New Testament Exegesis. It is in that Chair that he has now been succeeded by Professor Kirsopp Lake, of Oxford.

From the first van Manen was a strenuous scholar, and, after gaining more than one essay prize as a student, he continued throughout his career, whether as country parson or university professor, a long course of original work on his chosen subject of early Christian literature. He published a great deal in the Theologisch Tijdschrift, of which he became one of the editors, the Jahrbücher für Protestantische Theologie, and other periodicals, and before he was thirty, while minister at Winkel, in North Holland, he published, with Dr. A. C. Duker (1870-71), an edition of the Apostolic Fathers, a new translation, with introduction and notes.

It was in 1882 that A. D. Loman began to publish in the Theologisch Tijdschrift his "Quæstiones Paulinæ," following the brilliant work of Straatman in a revolutionary reconstruction of ideas concerning Paul and the Epistles which bear his name. To their school van Manen belonged, and became its most prominent representative. His views were already well known through other publications before he brought out his chief work on Paul, in three successive volumes, 1890, 1891, and 1896, dealing respectively with the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles to the Romans and Corinthians. In 1900 he published a briefer survey of the whole subject in his hand-book of early Christian literature, or "Old-Christian" literature, as the Encyclopædia Biblica prefers to translate "Oudchristelijk" and "Altchristlich." The articles in that Encyclopædia on "Old-Christian Literature," "Paul," "Philemon," "Philippians," "Romans," clearly present his views to English readers.

Not a single Epistle is left to Paul himself, but the whole of that literature is relegated as pseudonymous to the second century, while the actual life of the Apostle of the Gentiles is conceived much more on the lines of the picture in the Book of Acts than on those of the self-revelation of the spiritual emancipator, whose glowing words we still believe to be preserved in the chief of the Epistles. The originality of van Manen's work, as that of his predecessors (and of the German Bruno Bauer) is generally felt, even by liberal scholars, to have run into eccentricity, and his results have failed to win any widespread acceptance. At the same time his work has been most stimulating, and his scholarship undoubted. His teaching at Leiden was based on the sound principle, laid down also in the article on "Old Christian Literature," that the old division between canonical and non-canonical writings is inadmissible, and that the whole body of the literature belonging to the period, to which he sets the year 180 A.D. as the limit, must be treated from the same point of view of reasonable historical criticism. In that field he laboured earnestly while strength was granted him; and now, held in honour in the world of scholarship, and in warm affection by close friends, he has passed out of the shadows, and is at rest.

THE ORIGIN OF LIFE.

To realise how close at hand lie the romances of life we have only to let stand in the house for two or three weeks a cup of infusion of hay or of tea-leaves. A drop of water taken from this infusion examined under a microscope will then be found to be as full of living organisms as Hampstead Heath on a Bank Holiday. Where has this life come from?

Out of the Everywhere into the Here.

If that question had been asked before the end of the 17th century the answer, in accord with the current doctrine of the time, would have been to the effect that life was produced spontaneously or bred from corruption. It was then held that meat and cheese were responsible for the maggots engendered in them, that animals of a higher organisation could be similarly produced—sea-mussels out of sand, and eels from dew. Such were the conclusions drawn by the upholders of the theory of generatio spontanea (since rebaptized by the name Abiogenesis).

Omne vivum ex ovo.

Redi was, however, able to show that if one prevents the access of blow-flies to meat, maggots hatched from the eggs they lay will not be found; but he still believed that the grubs found in the galls of plants were produced out of vegetable matter. Like the apple whose presence in the dumpling caused King George to wonder, there was no sign that these had ever gone inside. Leeuwenhoek, the eminent Dutch microscopist, discovered how these galls were produced. An insect makes an incision in the leaf, lays its eggs there; the plant, to protect itself against the irritation caused by the hatched larva, surrounds the alien with a mass of tissue, upon which it feeds, thus stimulating further growth. He traced the origin of other creatures, and by his discovery that animalcules may be conveyed in the air he prepared the way, before his death, in 1723, for all that is now known concerning the numerous bacilli.

The Universal Microbe.

The twentieth century answer to the question: "Whence comes life into our hay infusion?" is: "Bacteria." These germs are ubiquitous. They are universally present in water. They float in colonies through the air we breathe. We swallow them in millions, and our habitual health depends not so much upon their absence as upon our power of resistance due to the defensive action of the host of phagocytes in our blood.

Like other living things, these minute organisms are dependent for their activity, growth, and development upon certain conditions of moisture, heat, and food. Cooled below or heated above a certain degree of temperature, they are killed. But there is a great range of diversity in their power of resisting cold and heat. It is sufficient to boil milk in order to destroy the germs that are pretty sure to be there and to be already multiplying. In order to sterilise a vessel full of organic matter, the usual process is to heat it to as high a degree as it will bear without being itself destroyed, and then seal it, when the contents will be preserved like the Mammoth remaining fresh, embedded in Siberian ice, for an incalculable time. But, as there are organisms that habitually live at extreme degrees of heat and cold—Algae in hot springs at a temperature of 135° C., and Diatoms in Arctic seas in water ever near to the freezing-point—we can never be sure that in our sterilised tube every form of bacterial life has been finally destroyed. It may happen that there are present in a dormant condition germs which, under the impact of an exceptional energy, may still be called forth into activity.

Radiobes are not Bacteria.

This possibility has been advanced in connection with the recently popularised discoveries of Mr. Butler Burke, of Cambridge, in his tubes of sterilised beef-gelatine. He subjected his vessels to a temperature far above the boiling-point of water, and under pressure, for half an hour. The bouillon with which he shut in his radium may, it is suggested, have contained microbes of high heat-resisting power. But, he answers, the growth observed does not answer to any known form of bacterial life. It dissolves in water, while ordinary bacteria do not, moisture being a necessity of their existence. The discoverer believes it is a more primitive form of life than bacteria.

As is generally the case, the experimenter stumbled upon his discovery while looking for something else. He was trying to find out whether radium could alter the chemical properties of certain organic substances in such a way as to produce "unstable molecular aggregates," and with that purpose in view he enclosed radium in beef-tea tubes after proper sterilisation. Then he perceived on the surface of the gelatine that a kind of growth had formed, though growth had never before been witnessed in a sterilised tube. Under a microscope the formation has the appearance of living microbes which contain nuclei, grow and sub-divide like bacteria. To these "Radiobes" Mr. Burke assigns an intermediate place between crystals and bacilli. If then the discovery is confirmed and established, a new bridge is made across the gulf that divides the inanimate from the animate, and a new means of demonstrating the passing upward of life from the inorganic into the organic.

Evolution implies Abiogenesis.

Theoretically, the idea is already accepted. If Evolution is true, the principle of continuity demands that the process traced in the development of the mammal from the amoeba must be operative in the development of the amoeba from the mineral and the mineral from the primeval nebula. Whether demonstrated or not, the investigations of science lead us to suppose that Abiogenesis in the true sense ought to and must be true.

This supposition is strengthened by facts that are continually streaming in from a number of sources, of which the following three may be mentioned :—

(1) There are the results of experiments made upon radium compounds. Many phenomena usually termed "vital" are exhibited by radio-active bodies. They show matter to be capable of absorption and expenditure of energy, of giving forth heat in a seemingly inexhaustible stream. They show that matter may manifest a liveliness which with difficulty may be modified. For, at a temperature at which air turns liquid, radium still goes on emitting heat. And though chemists have succeeded in paralysing it for a time, in about a month it recovers its vitality and exercises its old powers as before. These properties indicate that some of the qualities of organic nature are to be attributed to the inorganic.

(2) Further, consideration has to be taken of the results of such experiments as Professor Bose, of Calcutta, tabulated in his lecture at the Royal Institution, wherein he explained that inorganic matter could respond to stimulus, could be wearied by overuse and restored by rest, could be deadened by poison and revived by antidote, and that, though weaker, this response was identical with that exhibited by plants and animals. The sensitiveness of metals was thus shown to be simply a less developed form of the sensitiveness of the plant.

(3) From Naples comes the illustrated record of patient researches conducted for twenty years by Professor von Schrön, which throws another plank across the ravine. Beginning with an examination of the crystalline products of bacterial secretion and afterwards detecting the same processes in chemical salts, the Neapolitan researcher has been able to fully demonstrate vital activity in crystals. Baron Reichenbach, in the middle of the nineteenth century, had established the radio-activity of crystals, but now it has been demonstrated that the crystal unit of development is a cell of mathematical regularity, and the processes familiar to biologic inspection have their analogues in the chemical world.

The Inorganic World, Alive.

To the deductions based upon these results Mr. Burke's discovery promises to offer confirmation and strengthen the supposition that the functions of living matter were not entirely new to organic nature, but were anticipated, foreshadowed in the inorganic. The distinction usually made between living and non-living matter has no more scientific basis than it has philosophical. In less emphatic expression, the life that manifests in sea-weed manifests also in the fissures of the rocks where crystals are growing. Our conception of life must be extended to include the mineral world. Nor must we say life begins here. Its origin lies farther back still.

Genesis of Life upon this Globe.

The fundamental question of Biology has been said to be : "How did life begin upon the earth ?" The answers fall into two classes, which may be designated (a) the miraculous, (b) the natural. In the first class place should be found for such theories as Lord Kelvin's. He supposes that when this globe had cooled sufficiently to bear organic life a meteorite carried in its crevices some germs as it fell upon earth. Huxley also uses such phrases as "living matter once originated," as though implying that in the appearance of the first bit of protoplasm there was an interference with the continuity of nature, an exception to its uniformity. Why are we to suppose that the becoming of protoplasm was a solitary incident, a sort of "splendid accident," such as the poet Watson counts evolution to be ? If creation is an eternal process and the same laws operate now as in pre-geologic time, is it not more plausible to hold that the dualism presumed in the antithesis between the world with life and the world without life is due to a misconception ? Haeckel and Spencer at least are more consistent. It is true that our globe passed through a condition in which organic life as we generally know it could not exist, but is not the legitimate deduction to be made from this fact the following—that life at that period must have existed in an ante-organic condition ?

To Be is to be Alive.

We cannot afford to ignore the large body of evidence which leads to the conclusion that life on this globe never came into being because it never was not. Not alone in the seething cataclysms when the mountains were rent asunder and rocks molten as ore in the furnace, while the crystals shaped themselves out into manifold moulds of loveliness in the fissures and chasms of the earth, but in the undifferentiated fire-mist, ere the mass which contracted into the globe was flung off, life lay potential awaiting the call to activity and the putting forth of its unrevealed powers.

As to the means by which that veiled life put forth its energies, Mr. Burke's discovery furnishes promise of explanation. If his conclusions are accurate, by the influence of radium a very primitive mode of organic life has been called into manifestation, if not from inorganic forms, at least from non-organic substance. If radio-activity is a form of energy that quickens potential into active life, the earth, which is slightly radio-active, may in the course of æons have awakened the dormant life hidden in its own mass. We are therefore threatened with the claims of a new ancestry, and presently the anthropoid ape that has rendered so long a service must give way to the "ancestral skill in radio-activities." We are more ancient than we supposed—descended from globular dots, offspring of radiobes.

Before the foundation of the Earth.

The more natural theory of the appearance of life upon earth is the supposition that life preceded the beginning of the globe, that its formation is the outcome of the living substance underlying all matter, that omne vivum ex vivo because omnia viva sunt.

If the hypothesis is true that the visible material world is the effect of an invisible immaterial cause, then it is futile to expect from the scientist whose business is with phenomena an explanation of noumena, which is the business of the religious philosopher. The statement of the highest forms of religious philosophy is that the world arose out of the thought of the Immanent Presence as a man thinketh a thought. Matter is a precipitated idea: Without Him, Who is Life, nothing could be, from radiobes to saints. All life is divine, and all that exists is alive. Were it possible for anything to become dead, inanimate, it would cease to be.

The word Abiogenesis therefore, implying the origin of life from what is non-living, suggests an antithesis for which there is really no philosophic basis, and as it would seem from recent discoveries, no scientific basis. The term could only arise at a time when a half-sided view of Nature dominated the scientific mind, enabling it to be constantly engaged in attention to the process of evolution while completely ignoring its correlative process, Involution.

If it were possible to unify systems of thought so diverse as those which contain Plato's "Ideas" and Ramanajâcharya's "soul to every atom," Spinoza's "substance" and Leibnitz's "monads," Spencer's "inscrutable energy" and Haeckel's "cell-soul," it would be by means of the word Involution. It is obvious that life is evolved out of the world because it was first involved in the world. If evolution is continuous, it is because involution is continuous. The world-soul that vivifies the whole creation ensheathed itself in matter or descended into matter, or the long ascent could not be possible.

Descent and Ascent of Spirit.

The origin of life must therefore be sought for in the Cosmogonic process. Whether stated in the poetic imagery of one of the documents of Genesis : "The Lord God sent man forth from the Garden of Eden"—forth into the desert of experience—or in the sweet symbolism of Wordsworth : "Trailing clouds of glory do we come from God who is our home," or stated in the non-theologic language of Spencer : "All things proceed from an Infinite and Eternal Energy"—we have a varied testimony how from One without a second has sprung all life. Before the making of a radiobe, before the movement of an electron, before the etheric energy that focussed in an atom, before the first motion in the inert nebula, before the nebula itself, in the Silence and the Darkness was Life, because He was there. Step by step we go back in thought until we come to the last limit, where out of the Boundless Deep issued the word : "Let there be Life !"

Hidden Causes.

To win the secret we must penetrate behind the phenomenal, go within the veil. "There is not the slightest reason to think," said Professor Beale, "that the nature of the changes that take place in living centres will ever be ascertained by physical investigations, inasmuch as they are certainly of an order totally distinct from that to which any other phenomenon known to us can be regulated."

The study of origins has other methods than the scapel, the test-tube, the magnifying lens. The world of causes is unseen, and for solution of the fundamental questions of biology as of psychology, we must look to the wise man of the future who will combine the training of the man of science with the open vision of the expert seer. "If on the scientific insight of Faraday," speculates Stopford Brooke, "could be engrafted the poetic genius of Byron, the result would be a poem of the kind for which the world waits." If on the trained observation of a Darwin could be engrafted the super-sensual vision of a Boehme, the result would be a discovery for which the world waits. To the scientific mystic we have to look for the man who will bring the blind by a way they know not, who will make our darkness light before us, and crooked places straight.

BEDFORD COLLEGE FOR WOMEN.

SIR,—Will you allow me to add a few words in support of the appeal which is being issued on behalf of Bedford College? The sum of money required is moderately large, but where the investment is good the amount of money required should be no obstacle. And that to invest money in the education of women is as profitable for men as it is for women, as profitable for the next generation as it is for this, as profitable for the nation as it is for the individual, I become more firmly convinced with every year's additional experience. We are, I hope, gradually awaking to the fact that the uneducated woman is an insuperable obstacle to all progress. It is she who is mainly responsible for neglected children and unhappy homes amongst the poor, for a frivolous society and for extravagant luxury among the rich. Of course, college education is not the only form of education for women, nor one which is always appropriate; but it is a very important form, and especially important because it is just here that we are able to approximate women's education to that of men, and enable them to share similar privileges and duties.

I am afraid there is still a lingering belief that a college education unfits women for home life, and is a bad preparation for the duties of wife and mother. I am so thoroughly convinced that the contrary is the case, that I should not in the least fear the results of a "social investigation" into the homes of women who have been educated at college before marriage. That women who have other interests, and who have the means of independence in their hands, will be more careful that they marry the right person than those to whom marriage is the only resource, is indeed probable; but most people will agree with me that this is all to the good. And the whole discipline of a thorough and sound college education is calculated to develop just those qualities in a woman which she needs for managing a home. Patience, perseverance, an orderly mind, an appreciation of the relation between cause and effect, and, above all, reasonableness—are not these virtues which may prove as useful in the guidance of family life, as they are indispensable in the pursuit of knowledge?

We hear much of the waste involved in war, and in the maintenance of standing armies; but this is really insignificant in comparison with the waste of leaving uncultivated the most important faculties of half the human race. The standing armies of idle men are small compared with the standing armies of idle women, and almost as much to be deplored is the waste involved when uneducated and untrained women are reduced to the level of machines, or of brute animals in the struggle to earn a living. The opportunities for women to raise themselves to even a moderately high level of intelligence and capacity are still so comparatively few, that for such an institution as Bedford College to be killed or seriously crippled for want of funds would be an incalculable loss to England.

HELEN BOSANQUET.

STATE INTERFERENCE.

SIR,—In the letter from me which you kindly published on 8th inst., I combated certain definite proposals. Mr. Millin now enters the field with the general and very sweeping proposition that the community is responsible for some of the worst forms of human suffering, and that it should do what it can to mitigate and remedy.

Discussion of the first part of this would be unprofitable, so I will address myself only to the second. History and experience teach us that under a policy of comparative non-interference all social conditions have steadily and enormously improved, so that even the worst off classes in this country now live under conditions far superior to those of any preceding age, or now existing in any other country. This is surely a prima facie argument in favour of that policy. History teaches us, further, that the endeavours of rulers, or governing bodies, to remedy evils by enactments, involving regulation, have generally, if not always, either intensified the very evils themselves, or have created others, nor will this cause surprise, when we reflect that the range of human capacity is narrow and finite, while the development of the human race is wide-reaching and infinite. On the other hand hardly an instance can be cited when governmental interference has been beneficial.

From these considerations I come to the conclusion that the function of government in social as in economical matters should be limited to the romoval of existing obstructions, mostly the legacies of earlier legislators, and to provide a free field without favour for all, leaving the results to the clash of character and natural abilities. The paternal despot, the Tory peer and the Socialist have the same fundamental idea in common, namely, that they know better what is for the good of others than the people themselves; and, therefore, they try to create what they intend to be a suitable environment. Even supposing that they could succeed in this, it seems to follow that, as the force of such environment increases, individual character must find less room for its development and become weakened by disuse. If we look abroad we may see that as Government regulations have increased individual initiative and self-reliance have decreased, so that in countries like Spain and Russia, where Government interference is at a maximum, intellectual and even moral development are in a state of stagnation.

Mr. Millin misquotes me in applying my term, "a living organism," to society. I wrote of the industrial system. But this is a small matter. He says in one and the same sentence that my conception of society appears to be artificial, and also that I believe it to be natural. In that I cannot follow him; but, when he asserts that a natural social system would be one under which no one made a profit, I wonder whether he wishes to go back to the time when "Wild in the woods the noble savage ran."

But why this objection to profit? Profits are merely the fees paid for the provision or production of articles required by the purchasers, and are, therefore, as justifiable as the salaries even of State officials.

RICHARD SIMON.

SIR,—While quite sympathising with the reply of Mr. G. F. Millin to the individualist attitude of Mr. Simon, a short space may be asked for something in the way of a "truism." If, as we hope, the society decides to do something, then probably many millions will be wanted. And the society would have to be very particular that the schemes did not do more harm than good in the future. The future Chancellor of the Exchequer would have to take care that the extra burden was put on the right shoulders, or the extra taxation would make home trade still worse, and keep up the supply of poverty to be relieved. State interference must be coupled with the maxim of Adam Smith, "Equality of sacrifice." The Socialist party in this country have been in a tremendous hurry, but they have only played the game of reactionary forces for the last ten years. Public money has flowed in a mighty river, but in the wrong directions; that is, in ways that increase racial hatred and envy. If the working classes have supported jingoism, they have supported the thing which eats into the means which the State requires for reform; and time will be needed, coupled with patience.

IMMORTALITY.

SIR,—You may, perhaps, allow me, as a reader of THE INQUIRER for over sixty years, to say a word on the interesting letter of your correspondent, F. T. Mott, and your editorial comment thereon. The problem stated, as to a human soul coming into existence with and in a finite body, and yet itself immortal, was for many years a hard one for me. I longed to believe that the seeming contradiction of having a beginning, yet no end, might be solved, "if so God will,"[2] but I could not. The very essence of Unitarian teaching I conceive to be "have faith in God." But to attain that faith, it was for me an absolute necessity to gain some idea, some glimmer of light, as to how and by what methods God works. It became to me, as time went on, more and more evident that He works always by orderly, harmonious, slowly but surely evolving methods, truly scientific in their very nature. Thus mentally prepared, the yearned-for glimmer of light became perceptible to me by no "idle speculation," but through the inspiring (not inspired) writings of the best theosophical literature. As regards the especial point raised by your correspondent, I may say very briefly that theosophists do not conceive the human soul to have had a beginning; but that, being a ray from the Divine, it necessarily participates eternally "in the life of the Eternal." Differentiating itself from the one absolute existence, for the purpose of developing individuality, it clothes itself in a suitable mortal garb for this life only; surviving the disintegration of that body, and reclothing itself for another life in another sphere, thus passing "through a series of changes," for perhaps "millenniums of time," until, perfected by suffering, exalted and purified by experience, it attains—not annihilation, but re-absorption into omniscience, and the realisation of the prophecy that "God shall be all in all."

ELLEN M. HIND.

[But if our correspondent has found welcome light on the great subject of how God works, why does she speak of the human soul as "differentiating itself" and clothing itself, &c.?—ED. INQ.]

SYNCRETISM.

SIR,—In his contribution under this heading, "A Minister," favoured your readers last week with his definition of "Syncretism. Happening to read the introductory chapters of Harnack's "Expansion of Christianity" shortly before, I found a marked difference of opinion between the eminent German professor and your contributor. "A Minister" tells us "Syncretism does not go as far even as composition; goes no further than accommodation; unites systems more or less antagonistic, but does not attempt to reconcile them. A fusion of ideas being seen to be impossible, it is thought to be enough if they do not come into collision." Describing the internal conditions of Early Christianity Dr. Harnack says (Expansion of Christianity, vol. I, pp. 32,33), "All existing materials were fused together, elements that lay far apart were solidified into a unity, and all previous constructions were shattered, while the surface of the movement was covered by broken fragments thrown out in a broad moraine, in which the debris of all earlier strata were to be found. This is the meaning of "Syncretism." Clearly, then, "A Minister's" definition is somewhat at variance with the teaching of Harnack. Which is right?

A. COBDEN SMITH.

A VAN MISSION.

SIR,—As one who has always taken a keen interest and at times an active share in open-air preaching in London, I note with pleasure the article on the subject in your columns; for while, on the one hand, there is a widespread indifference to public worship, there is, on the other hand, an awakened religious feeling abroad, in the rational guidance of which Unitarians ought surely to take their share, even apart from considerations of denominational gain.

With respect to the programme of service set forth by Mr. Spedding, my experience would suggest the omission of "an opportunity for questions or remarks," and this because I so heartily agree that "the address should be affirmative, not controversial—religious rather than doctrinal." The opportunity for questions invariably leads to controversy, which, without the control of a duly acknowledged chairman, is apt to degenerate into an unseemly wrangle that cannot fail to destroy the religious character of a meeting.

Music is a most important factor in open-air work; if good, it will always draw attention, which can generally be sustained by a speaker who appeals to both mind and heart.

AMERICAN NOTES.

THE following notes we received some weeks ago from the Rev. Charles W. Wendle, of Boston, whom we hope very soon to welcome on this side of the Atlantic again as Secretary of the International Council of Unitarian and other liberal religious thinkers and workers:—

The Honourable George Bancroft, son of a Unitarian minister, was a parishioner of the writer in Newport, Rhode Island, and showed him great kindness. On one occasion, when he was the recipient of a gracious communication from his parishioners, Bancroft's name and that of his wife headed the list of signatures. The writer had various conversations with him concerning ethical and religious questions, and found him to be not at all an Agnostic, but a Transcendentalist rather. Such also was the standpoint from which his great history was written. He was a most enthusiastic admirer of Emerson.

As for Thomas Jefferson, there is on the walls of the Unitarian Association in Boston an autograph letter from that eminent man in which he thanks the Rev. Dr. Bancroft, the historian's father, for his volume of Unitarian sermons, with whose sentiments, he says he is most cordially agreed. The letter also contains the statement that he trusts there may be no young man at that time living in America who will not die a Unitarian. This ought to be sufficient on that point.

Benjamin Franklin's creed, as published in his works, is well known, and shows him to have been a Deist, while his contemporaries agree as to his liberal sentiments. We have been told that during his stay in London he attended Unitarian services at Essex Chapel, and was a financial contributor to the support of its worship.

So far as Daniel Webster is concerned, the writer made a special study of his religious opinions some years ago, and received a long letter from Rev. Dr. Lothrop of the Brattle-street (Unitarian) Church in Boston, on this subject. This letter was published in the Boston Transcript and elsewhere. Dr. Lothrop states that Webster was for forty years a pew-holder and communicant in his church, that he always addressed him as "my pastor," and sent for him on the death of his son for spiritual comfort. Later in life he removed to Marshfield, Mass., where there was no Unitarian church. Here he sometimes went with his second wife, an Episcopalian in faith, to her church in the village. On this ground one of his biographers, an ardent Episcopalian, tries hard to make out that Webster, in the closing years of his life, held orthodox sentiments. But we have no other testimony for it. There is not a line to be found in any of Webster's writings to show that he held other than liberal sentiments. In the Dartmouth College case there was ample opportunity for him to express any orthodox views he might have held, but he carefully abstains from so doing, basing his whole argument on larger and more inclusive grounds.

So far as Chief Justice Marshall is concerned, he often attended the Unitarian Church in Washington while he was on the bench, and undoubtedly held Unitarian sentiments. One of his biographers says of him that he held Unitarian views of religion. His daughter, an earnest orthodox believer, states that he returned to his early Trinitarian faith in the closing years of his life. It may be so, although we have grown to be somewhat sceptical of such testimony At any rate, we can claim him for the years of his intellectual strength and maturity. As Rev. Dr. Alger somewhere says, "A man is to be judged not by the closing scene of his life, but by its ingrained characteristic."

MY IDEAL HOLIDAY.

IN many respects I daresay I represent a large section of my fellows. I have to work pretty hard for a living—a living which makes demands upon the mind and body. I get one week in summer for a holiday, and therefore it is of the utmost importance to make the most of the time. May I just add that I have to study economy? In saying this I am simply claiming affinity with all those whose holiday is a matter of combining the minimum of expense with the maximum of pleasure.

Last summer discovered to me what I have no hesitation in terming an ideal holiday. I crossed over to Douglas, and from there went to Peel by rail. At Peel a wagonette was waiting. A five miles drive took one seemingly from all traces of civilisation. Up and up we went, leaving the level of the plain for the uplands of the higher regions. Each minute of the way apparently gave a fresh insight into the wondrous beauties of lonely nature. It was difficult to think of Market-street or Piccadilly amid such surroundings, for here everything was different; so much so that one did not appear to be the same individual.

At last a bend in the road revealed our destination, a farmhouse nestling, as it were, in the seclusion of sky and coast.

I ought perhaps to have said that the wagonette at Peel station gave a kind of entry into acquaintanceship. We were all bound for the same haven, and introductions of an informal nature made one feel very much at ease.

The tea table at our temporary home confirmed the belief that we were a happy family, all imbued with the same quest of getting the very best out of our holiday. It was Saturday evening when we first arrived, and after tea we proceeded to make discoveries in physical geography. A very pleasant walk across fields brought us down to the shore. I can picture that shore now as it appeared to me last summer on that Saturday evening.

A small strip of smooth sand leading to the approach of a picturesque cottage, the only habitation about; immense blocks of jagged, threatening boulder rocks on nearly every side relieved from utter awfulness by the presence of the everlasting green which needs little encouragement for invitation. In one or two directions high cliffs imprisoned the vision, for right out to sea these barriers proclaimed their own majesty of strength and dignity. On the lower plain of coast numerous caves visible at low water were in evidence. To sit on a well-planed rock and look around was to take one into another world—a place where high stools and massive ledgers were quite unknown. Here was the very personification of solitude, save for the plaintive cries of the feathered tribe who abounded in great numbers.

This tiny little shore amidst a very forest of rocky leviathans was always attractive to us. A dweller on the promenade at Douglas might be disposed to pity our isolation from the world. The pity, however, could be dispensed with; a bright, happy spirit of mutual friendship tended to produce the most satisfactory results. Each day brought its own plans, and a careful if impromptu programme was generally settled before breakfast was finished in the morning.

Thus a very beautiful walk would be arranged up to the dinner hour, then in the afternoon a long drive into unexplored districts would take place. The evenings were most happily spent. Let me give a description of one of them: It had entered into the mind of the leader of our festivities—a lady, by the way—to have a real whist drive. To arrange original partners the happy device was to gather wild flowers in duplicate made up into sprays. The whist drive proved a great success. Your Douglas promenader would have looked in vain for any traces of ennui. Another evening we had a potato race, the details of which I dare not begin to tell. Music, singing, cards, competitions indoors; walks, drives, bathing, boating, fishing outdoors. Always remember that our great altitude guaranteed the purest and most bracing of breezes, and that practically we lived the outdoor life. It will be seen that living under these conditions was productive of the greatest benefit both for body and mind.

I took the liberty of calling this experience "My Ideal Holiday," for there seemed such a combination of ideal circumstances. Companions whose very presence lent charm and rest proved a great factor in the case, while the physical environment ministered to physical needs.

I have said little or nothing about finances. It will be sufficient to add that the cost was exceedingly moderate.

I think I have lived long enough to know that the simple life with its simple requirements frequently gets the most happiness. In fact, it is the nearest approach to the Ideal.

THE EASTERN UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Eastern Union of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches was held at the Friars-street Chapel, Ipswich, on Thursday, July 6. Delegates were present from most of the churches of the district, including Rev. John Birks, the President; Rev. Lucking Tavener (Ipswich), Rev. R. Newell, Messrs. Dowsing and Frost (Framlingham), Miss Smith (Bedfield), Rev. A. Hall, Mrs. Mottram, and Mr. S. C. Sothern (Norwich), Mr. Panchen (Yarmouth), Mr. C. J. Selby Stalham, Rev. A. E. Rump and Mrs. Jeffries (Hapton), Rev. J. Morton Barnes (Lynn). Rev. F. W. Stanley represented the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. In the morning the party was conducted over Christchurch Park and House, and the museum by the Curator, Mr. Frank Woolnough, who gave interesting descriptions of the places and things specially viewed by those present. At 12.30 about seventy sat down to luncheon, after which the business meeting was held. Part of the afternoon was occupied by excursion by tram to the borders of the town, and at four o'clock a religious service was held.

BUSINESS MEETING.

The President, the Rev. John Birks, in the course of his address said: Although with pleasure responding to the desire that I should be president of the Eastern Union, yet it is not without some degree of diffidence that I appear before you to-day to fulfil the duty devolving on me. I cannot say that this feeling arises from an impression that the cause we advocate is not worthy of our best efforts and most earnest attention, but rather from a fear that I shall not be able to do it that justice which its great importance demands. It will be readily believed how one of my difficulties in the anticipation of this hour would relate to the choice of subject for what is described as the president's address. The main elements in the theology of our body and our distinctive ecclesiastical principles and practices have been so often, and with so much fulness and force, explained and vindicated, that they have not presented themselves to me under any aspect or relation on which it seemed desirable that I should dwell. I have therefore chosen the subject, "What can we do?"

We are prone to look out for some specifics, to rack our brains in search of new inventions, and to be full of hope if we can only set up some fresh machinery. But I think instruments good enough are in our hands, and if we are strong in spirit, if we have a mind for it, we may do a fair stroke of work on the old lines, and after the old forms, without waiting till some happy genius lights upon a patent apparatus of rare shape and efficacy. Change is needed, most surely, but it is in ourselves, in the renewing and freshness of life in us rather than in promising novel appliances, which, like those now existing, would prove weak and vain if worked by nothing better than the old feeble forces.

Still, while saying this, there is no reason why we should not seek to mend the nets we have; to improve upon our methods, or to follow the old, if good, with more enthusiasm and vigour.

We need a closer drawing together. Not that we should be less independent, but more united; that there should be more real co-operation. We are strong in one place, weak in another; one church is thriving, others are fighting hard for life, and there seems need for a more perfect brotherhood among our churches. If the lamp is to be kept burning in many places, it is a necessity that the richer and poorer towns and villages, the strong and the weak, should be joined together in affectionate helpfulness. The principle of co-operation so usefully and powerfully employed in commerce, in politics, in education, is being applied with increasing force and vigour in religious enterprise. It is for us also to adopt and apply this principle. Now, when unbelief, carelessness, and indifference are sapping the foundations of morality and degrading the nobleness of man and the spirituality of life; now, when the long State church controversy is thickening fast, and great ecclesiastical changes are near; now, when the democratic tendencies of the age are fast transferring political power to the hands of the many, and making the last first; now is the time when, to the Free Churches especially, truth, freedom, the religious welfare of the land, look with earnest and confiding solicitude. Let us see to it that they may not look in vain.

Mr. NOTCUTT (Ipswich) gave the welcome to the visitors, and emphasised the need of co-operation among the churches of the district. He thanked the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for the help they gave in this direction. Their liberality and sympathy were a great stimulus to them. Their grants were given in such a graceful manner that they helped the churches by the way in which they gave. Norwich had been assisted by the lectures delivered by Mr. Carpenter and by the support given in many ways to the Martineau Memorial scheme; and it was almost impossible to estimate the encouragement given to Ipswich in times of grave difficulty. We were doing all we could to promote union, and he hoped Mr. Stanley would take that message back.

The Rev. F. W. STANLEY responded, and said he brought the warmest wishes of the Association. They were only too glad to be in touch with the Unions in the denomination, to make use of local information, and to do all in their power to help. The work of the Association had of late been considerably increased: New ideas had been tried with success. Mrs. MOTTRAM also responded, and said she had every confidence in our cause. We were on the crest of the wave, and were resolved not to go down the slope. The whole of the best spiritual and intellectual forces of our time were behind us. Sometimes we regretted heavy losses sustained by death. Men of honoured names and influence were taken from us. But we are alive to-day, and we have only this day. Let us take hands and help.

Rev. JOHN BIRKS gave a welcome to the Rev. J. B. Morton Barnes, who had settled at Lynn, and to Rev. Wm. Birks, who had settled at Diss. This was seconded by the Rev. LUCKING TAVENER, who said that to take up the work of our smaller churches such as Diss and Lynn required great courage, and the newcomers could be assured of the support of their fellow ministers of the Union.

Revs. J. B. MORTON BARNES and W. BIRKS acknowledged the welcome.

On the proposal of the Rev. R. NEWELL, seconded by Mr. DOWSING, Mr. R. Hamblin, of Ipswich, was elected president for the coming year. The Secretary, Rev. A. Hall, then read the report of the executive. They were pleased to report that the churches of the district were in a healthier state than they had been for some time past. Services were being regularly conducted in all the chapels, and some of the congregations had been wakened to greater activity by the special efforts they were making. The congregation at Long Sutton had, with the generous assistance of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and other friends, repaired the exterior and interior of their chapel, and adding an organ and re-arranging the seating accommodation, which greatly conduced to the brightness of the service and comfort of the worshippers. It is now fifteen years since the Rev. J. Pond re-opened the building. The congregation at Norwich had purchased a site for the Martineau Memorial Hall and Sunday Schools, and had £1,500 out of £4,000 necessary to erect a suitable building. The centenary of the birth of Dr. Martineau had been worthily celebrated at Norwich. The committee noted with pleasure that one of the first sermons, they believed the first, that he preached on leaving college was delivered at Halesworth, in Suffolk, on July 4, 1827, on behalf of the Eastern Unitarian Society, the predecessor of the Union. Special lectures had been delivered in Norwich by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, and special courses of sermons had been delivered at Braintree, Ipswich, Norwich, and Yarmouth. The committee called special attention to the useful and extensive work being done by Miss S. S. Dowson, the secretary of the Eastern Union Postal Mission. The death of Mrs. Tavener had removed one of the most prompt and enthusiastic local treasurers and workers the Union had ever had. The death of Mrs. S. C. Sothern was also recorded with regret.

The TREASURER then presented his report; and in the absence of Miss Dowson, read the report of the Postal Mission. The total number of letters received during the year was 329; 524 were sent out. 1,313 tracts were distributed, and 78 books sold. 119 correspondents were on the books.

Mr. PANCHEN proposed, and Mr. SELBY seconded, the adoption of the Reports.

The devotional portion of the religious service was conducted by the Rev. A. E. Rump, of Hapton, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. F. W. Stanley from the text: "Thy righteousness is an everlasting righteousness and Thy law is truth."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Belper (Appointment). — Rev. D. J. Williams, of Merthyr Tydfil, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation from the Belper congregation to become their minister, and he expects to commence his ministry there the first week in October.

Devonport.—On the occasion of the marriage of their late minister, Rev. G. L. Phelps, now of Evesham, the members of this congregation have presented him with a marble dining-room timepiece, as a mark of their esteem and respect.

Dudley.—Taking for his subject last Sunday morning "A Page in our History," the Rev. Alfred Thompson sketched the origin, progress and issues of the Sacheverell riots (1709—1715), showing how Sacheverell's repudiation of the religious toleration extended to Dissenters by William of Orange, inflamed the High Church party to violence against them. Sacheverell's nominal sentence was a virtual triumph, and strengthened enormously the prejudice against Nonconformity. In the Midlands the storm burst with all its fury in 1715. A violent and excited mob travelled from Birmingham, through West Bromwich and Oldbury, to Dudley, destroying all the meeting houses on their route. An old chronicle (quoted in INQUIRER of December 11, 1869, and Evans' "Midland Churches," 1899) relates that "the mobbe came on to Dudley on the 17th July, and the town mobbe joined them, crying, Down with the Roundheads! For the Highe Church and Dr. Sacheverall! The mobbe brake down the gatts . . . and aboute eleven a'clock at nighte sett fire to the two great pillars that beare up the roofe, which fell at two a'clock." The meeting house had been built in 1702, so that it had only existed for thirteen years when it met with this premature end. But these violent measures against the Dissenters gave alarm to the Government. The Riot Act, which had fallen into desuetude, was revived and made permanent, and a clause was added for the especial protection of houses of worship. The demolished chapels were rebuilt with Government money; that at Dudley being finished in 1717, the walls of which stand to this day. These were traditions worth recalling. But what our ancestors had done, and suffered, and sacrificed for us should be an incentive to us in turn to be mindful of posterity. Their old meeting house at Dudley had become historic, but on the other hand time had been encroaching on its borders, as well as disclosing many imperfections of structure and sanitation. Might it not be well to consider whether after 190 years the moment had not arrived for considering the expediency of building afresh on a better site and a better plan? It was worth thinking over, and might mark a new page in their history, give them a new bond of brotherhood, and extend their serviceableness to God and man.

London: George's Row Mission.—The Sunday-school and general excursion to Waltham Abbey was a great success. The Flower Show has also been held, when 281 plants were exhibited. Mr. F. Withall kindly took the chair at the subsequent public meeting, and Miss Herford spoke and presented the prizes. Music was given by Miss Matheson, Miss Withall, B.A., and Miss V. Withall. Rev. F. Summers moved a vote of thanks.

London Guilds Union.—The annual summer excursion was held on Saturday, July 15. Guild members from Essex Church, Mansford-street, Stepney, Stratford, Highgate and Walthamstow met at Kew Green, and after a pleasant stroll through Kew Gardens the party adjourned to one of the cottages on Kew Green for tea, which was provided by the members of the Essex Church Guild. After tea the Rev. F. K. Freeston welcomed the members of the various guilds to Kew, and congratulated Mr. Hankinson on the excellent arrangements made for the comfort and the enjoyment of the party. The President of the Union, Mr. A. Thompson, of Mansford-street, thanked the members of the Essex Church Guild for their hospitality, and also spoke of the future work of the Union. The Secretary then announced the date of the next meeting, which will be held at Mansford-street on Oct. 25. Miss Gittens, of Leicester, will read a paper on "Lending Our Minds Out." The remainder of the evening was given up to boating on the river. About eighty members and friends were present.

London: Hackney (Appointment).—At a meeting of the members of the congregation of the New Gravel Pit Church held on Thursday, the 13th inst., it was resolved that a cordial invitation should be sent to Rev. Henry Rawlings, M.A., to accept the ministry of the church. Mr. Rawlings has accepted this invitation, and will enter upon his ministry on the first Sunday in September.

Lydgate Chapel.—A bazaar in aid of the scheme to provide a new school building, which is sorely needed, a new organ, and an addition to the endowment was held on Wednesday, Thursday, and Saturday, July 12, 13, and 15. It was opened on the first day by Mrs. C. E. Sykes, of Letton, Hereford, at one time a member of the congregation, on the second by Miss Brown, of Leeds, and on the Saturday by four children of the Sunday-school. It has been decided to inscribe the new building to the memory of Oliver Heywood. With none of our existing chapels of the Presbyterian foundation is his name more closely associated than with this at Lydgate, and nowhere is it more remembered and honoured. The present school-room is far too small for ordinary purposes and very inconvenient. At the same time the old organ is useless and beyond repair, and £450 is needed to establish the finances upon a satisfactory footing. For a country congregation composed of working people, the provision of these requirements is a great task. Nevertheless, it is being attacked with considerable spirit and enthusiasm, this bazaar representing a continuance of their very determined effort. Generous assistance has been forthcoming from several quarters. The Yorkshire Unitarian Union has recognised the scheme by a grant under certain conditions of £250. This, together with subscriptions and the proceeds of the bazaar (about £125 net), and funds raised otherwise in the congregation and Sunday-school, makes a total of a little over £600 towards the estimated sum of £2,200. The very fine weather which continued during the course of the bazaar contributed very much to the success, and the enjoyment of it.

Middlesbrough.—On Monday evening, July 17, Mr. L. Worstenholm, late of Middlesbrough, was the recipient of a handsome English lever watch, subscribed for by the members of the church, as a slight recognition of his past services as secretary and lay preacher. The gathering took the form of a garden party, Mr. T. F. Ward kindly throwing open his grounds for that purpose. Mr. Ward, in making the presentation, spoke in the highest terms of appreciation of Mr. Worstenholm's services, and the loss sustained by his removal to Darlington. Rev. W. H. Lambelle and Messrs. Jas. Smith, J.P., T. W. MacNay, T. Howcroft, and several others spoke in similar strains. In acknowledging the gift Mr. Worstenholm spoke with great pleasure of the time he had spent in Middlesbrough. A vote of thanks to Mr. and Mrs. T. F. Ward brought the pleasant gathering to a close.

Mottram.—The scholars' annual walk took place on Sunday, July 9. There was a procession of 220 scholars, teachers, and friends through the village at 1.30; two hymns were sung in the market-place and an address given by the minister (Rev. H. Bodell Smith), followed by service in the chapel at 2.30, and special musical service and distribution of prizes to the scholars at night.

Oldbury.—The annual flower services were held on July 2, conducted by the Rev. W. G. Topping, and on the following Sunday morning Mrs. Timmins, widow of the late Rev. Thomas Timmins and sister of the late Rev. Henry McKean, was the preacher. Mrs. Timmins also addressed the Sunday-school in the afternoon, speaking to the children of the work of the Universal Mercy Band, with the foundation and progress of which her husband was so closely associated. The congregation are preparing to hold a garden party and sale of work in Mrs. McKean's garden on the last Monday of the present month, to raise funds towards the proposed memorial to the late Rev. H. McKean.

Sheffield: Attercliffe Mission.—This mission, founded in 1901, was in December, 1903, constituted a branch church in connection with Upper Chapel, and the assistant minister of Upper Chapel, the Rev. H. Dawtrey, is minister-in-charge at Attercliffe under the supervision of the senior minister, the Rev. C. J. Street. The Attercliffe congregation pay all local expenses, and contribute what they can to the cost of the ministry. The services and Sunday-school have hitherto been held in the upper room of the Vestry Hall, but the time has come when the congregation should have a home of its own. A suitable site has been secured, and plans are in preparation for the erection of a school-chapel, the total cost being estimated at £1,500. Towards this amount over £1,000 has already been raised, including a grant of £50 from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. A circular, making appeal for the remainder of the money required, has just been issued locally, and the ladies of the three Sheffield congregations are preparing for a bazaar in November next. It is hoped that the building will be completed and ready for use early in the New Year.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—At a meeting o the congregation recently held, with a view to celebrating their Jubilee, it was decided that the time has now arrived when the chapelmight be removed with advantage to another position. With this object the offer of a piece of land on which to erect a new chapel and school has been obtained, and the congregation are now making an effort to raise the necessary funds. At the same time it was decided to take steps for the disposal of the present buildings, which have served the congregation well for a period of nearly fifty years. A considerable sum was recently expended upon the beautifying of the edifice, which is a very substantial and internally a beautiful building. The chief cause of the proposed removal is that the congregation is now drawn from outside the district in which the chapel is situated, but the older members will eave the present premises with regret.

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH,
NARBOROUGH ROAD, LEICESTER.

Minister: Rev. GERTRUD VON PETZOLD, M.A.

The Committee of this Church now appeal with confidence to Unitarian and Liberal Christian friends throughout the country and ask their assistance in removing the balance of the debt that has weighed upon them heavily for the last four years. It was incurred by the building of the Church and Hall, consequent on the removal of the congregation from Wellington-street to a new suburban district, where a vigorous new life has been infused into their work.

At the present time large congregations are being attracted under the ministry of the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, M.A., and the principles of Liberal Christianity are being brought prominently before the whole town of Leicester, great interest being aroused thereby generally.

The cost of the buildings, £4,360, has been attacked with great vigour by the congregation and friends, the result of their efforts being the substantial reduction of £3,466, which is, however, inclusive of £1,476 realised by the sale of the old property. The most recent effort has been a subscription, amounting to £238, by members of the Church, who, having thus made all the sacrifice within their power, feel justified in asking for a practical expression of sympathy from supporters of the general cause.

Towards the remaining balance the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have promised the last £100.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IT is now certain that a large and representative gathering of Unitarians from the British Isles will attend the meetings of the International Council at Geneva. Nearly two hundred people have intimated their intention of being present; 173 membership tickets have been paid for at Essex Hall, and 117 have booked places for the journey from London to Geneva on August 25, organised by the Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. We do not observe the name of any representative of the Unitarian Churches in Scotland on the list. Ireland has several representatives, so has Wales; England—north, south, east, and west—will be well represented. A small four-page circular has been prepared by Mr. Bowie, giving all necessary information about the train and steamboat service, with hints on clothing, money, luggage, &c. There will be an hour's religious service for the visitors from England on Sunday afternoon, August 27, at 5 p.m. in La Chapelle des Maccabées, one of the most beautiful churches in Geneva, adjoining the Cathedral. We shall have to wait a long time, it is to be feared, before the ecclesiastical authorities of St. Margaret's, Westminster, offer a like courtesy to a congress of Unitarians meeting in London!

THE fourteenth Universal Peace Congress is to be held at Lucerne, September 19-24. Members of the Association, says Concord, and others able and willing to attend this Congress, are requested to send in their names without delay to J. F. Green, 40, Outer Temple, Strand, W.C. If a party of at least thirty arrange to travel together, the whole expenses including seven days pension can be limited to £5 5s. or a very little more.

THE July number of Concord contains a full report of the second National Peace Congress, held at Bristol, June 28 and 29. The first National Congress was held last year in Manchester, under the presidency of Mr. Leonard Courtney. This year the Bishop of Hereford was President, and on the first morning, before the business proceedings began, he gave an address in the Cathedral, in which he struck the true note for such a gathering. "It was a shocking thing," he said, "that a Christian country like England should spend 71 millions a year on its Army and Navy, and still more so that in the last ten or twelve years they should have doubled that expenditure, and should all that time be priding themselves upon their Christian progress. Those things showed how far their Christian life was still out of joint. Their practical aim, therefore, should be to educate popular opinion, and men in positions of influence, to the paramount duty of endeavouring far more than hitherto to apply in every department of life, public and private, the principles of the Gospel. They remembered a saying of a great statesman—that what was morally wrong could not be politically right. Yet how few, comparatively speaking, carried that with them as the one guiding principle. What was morally wrong could not be socially right, and could not be internationally right. Their great aim should be to spread the spirit of goodwill in the place of the spirit of self-interest and rivalry, so that the people should be educated from their earliest days, and brought up with a new enthusiasm for mutual conciliation and peace."

IN this Congress 179 organisations were represented by 472 delegates, and it was the largest representative gathering of the kind ever brought together in this country. The Bishop of Hereford, in his presidential address, paid a warm tribute to Mr. Courtney, his predecessor in that office, as one of the noblest living English statesmen, a great example to them all for his large vision, his impartial rectitude, his unselfish patriotism, and, above all, his love of justice and peace. The Bishop also laid stress on the duty of training the young in right opinions, and said that he felt it nothing short of a calamity to a large number of Englishmen that they knew so little of the great utterances of Channing on peace and war and the speeches of Sumner on "The True Grandeur of Nations." He had been made more hopeful by the visit he paid to Boston last October, when the late Mr. Secretary Hay, as representative of the President, took part in the Peace Conference. It was equivalent in significance to what might have taken place there that day if an International Congress had had been welcomed in Bristol by the British Prime Minister. The words uttered by Mr. Hay were of great significance, because they were carefully read by all the diplomatists in Europe. His words expressed the predominant feeling of the great people behind him, and from a man in his position, followed by action now helping to bring peace between Russia and Japan, seemed to show that they were at the dawning of a better day. Through it all, what surprised him most in America, and gave him most encouragement, was the strong sentiment for peace, wherever one went, in the heart of the people. The American democracy he ventured to look upon as the greatest peace society in the world. Resolutions were passed expressing satisfaction at the work done by The Hague tribunal, against the growth of militarism in India, for just treatment of native races, and urging missionaries to dissociate themselves entirely from aggressive action, and to be true representatives of the Gospel of peace.

THE Cheap Cottages Exhibition was opened at Garden City, Letchworth, on Tuesday, by the Duke of Devonshire, and is to remain open until the end of September. The object of the Exhibition is to show that a labourer's cottage can be built for £150, and this Exhibition will be of special value because it has not only led to the erection of a large number of admirable cottages, but it is to leave them in Garden City to be inhabited, and so submit them to the test to which the Duke of Devonshire referred to of such vital consequence, the test of their durability and serviceableness in regular use. The Exhibition was opened with great éclat, Mr. St. Loe Strachey, editor of the Spectator, presiding, and among those present being the Bishop of Hereford, Sir William Grantham, and Mr. Ralph Neville.

WATTS, THE PAINTER OF ETERNAL TRUTHS.

I.

WATTS was the religious painter of his age, a mild, resolute, and noble personality, whose chief expression of his faith was through painting, in an age when dogmas and their foundations are in uncertainty, but the great experiences of life continue. He treated the eternal realities in allegory, and the light of eternity is upon the human types through which he expressed himself.

In explanation of his own pictures he wrote: "The great majority of these works must be regarded rather as hieroglyphs than anything else, certainly not as more than symbols, which all Art was in the beginning, and which everything is that is not directly connected with physical conditions. In many cases the intention is frankly didactic." "Whatever type may have been used—classical, mediæval, or other—the endeavour has been to impress distinctly the direction of modern thought, and in all except two cases reference to spiritual dogmas has been purposely avoided."

Mrs. Meade, the novelist, called him "The Painter of Eternal Truths"—a most fitting title, agreeing with his purpose as stated above, and its realisation in the pictures which go to the heart of faith, hope, love, life and death, conscience, temptation, courage, without embodying the doctrines of any church and without reference to the controversies of the age. He is didactic, but spiritually didactic, of the realities that are all in living forms of belief, and outline those forms.

The two exceptions which he mentions as having direct reference to dogmas are "Faith" and the "Dedication to all the Churches."

"Faith," he himself has explained, "wearied and saddened by the result of persecution, washes her bloodstained feet, and, recognising the influence of love in the perfume and beauty of flowers, and of peace and joy in the song of birds, feels that the sword was not the best argument, and takes it off."

In "The Dedication to All the Churches," more usually known by the title, "The Spirit of Christianity," a woman in scarlet robe, surrounded by luminous clouds, while her gaze is heavenward, and one hand rests upon her bosom, extends the other hand with outstretched fingers towards a group of children of different races and colours who nestle at her feet under the protection of her mantle. The spirit of Christianity is shown in the protection of the weak, regardless of human distinctions, while with pity for the wants and woes of humanity her trust is in God above. Her hope on earth is in the simple and weak, not in the mighty men of valour. The lessons of these two pictures, in which the artist is opposing too prevalent theological tendencies, are clearly the affirmation of the truth of Jesus against the heresies of the churches.

This is a mild and genial kind of controversy, the recommendation of the methods of peace and goodwill and of tender care for those who would be excommunicated or left in the drift by the harsher methods of "progress" and selection; and the implication that in weakness is the strength of Christianity.

However Christian in feeling we may recognise Watts's pictures to be, they have usually an appeal in them to principles that are not exclusively Christian, but belong to the divine in universal humanity. The meaning of Greek myths no less than of the Hebrew stories is drawn out, and Death, Life, Hope, Love, Conscience are universal subjects, as treated by Watts, not requiring first an entrance into any church for the understanding of his symbolism.

In his own life Watts was averse to any outward distinction. Twice he was offered a baronetcy, and Mr. Gladstone urged him to accept the honour as a tribute paid to art in his person, but he declined. He did not value rank, and shrank from public recognition. In a letter written to Mrs. Meade by Mrs. Watts he sent the message: "Tell Mrs. Meade that the only title I will ever take will be the one she has given me—The Painter of Eternal Truths."

While working on the Lincoln's Inn frescoes he wrote to Sir Henry Taylor: "I have plenty of ambition and ardently desire to be useful to my generation; but I would prefer working silently and unnoticed, save by that amount of encouragement that would cheer my efforts when well-directed, and for the sake of that direction alone. To produce great things one ought to be intent only upon doing one's utmost, and never stop to consider whether the thing be great or little in the abstract. The really great is so far beyond one's reach that comparison becomes an unworthy consideration. To work with all one's heart, but with all singleness of heart, is the right thing, and whoso does this may feel satisfied, whatever the result of his labour may be."

This was the spirit of his work. He did not bargain about payments, and was ready to work for nothing if good might come of it. He kept his pictures long in his studio not satisfied with the results of his labours, and of some of his most cherished conceptions, such as "Love and Death," he painted several pictures, never attaining a representation of his idea satisfactory to himself. In this he reminds one of Bellini's Madonnas—always beautiful, uplifting to others, but leaving him to try yet once more to put into the mother's face all he conceived of its love, maternal and divine.

In his old age Watts continued to develop. He did not merely live on past experience. His biographer, Hugh Macmillan, says of him that he became more self-poised, tolerant of differences, charitable towards weakness, hopeful amid the troubles of life, loved for what he was even more than for what he had done, "growing more simple, more sunny-hearted as the years go on." Watts was still alive when these words were written, and lived long enough to read the excellent book Mr. Macmillan produced. The author himself did not see it in print, but died soon after he had corrected the proofs of his chapter of interpretation of "The Cycle of Death."

"I paint ideas, not things," said Watts. "I paint primarily because I have something to say, and, since the gift of eloquent language has been denied me, I use painting; my intention is not so much to paint pictures which shall please the eye as to suggest great thoughts which shall speak to the imagination and to the heart, and arouse all that is best and noblest in humanity." "I teach great truths, but I do not dogmatise. On the contrary, I purposely admit every form of belief, and I appeal to men of every age and every faith. I accompany them to the church door, and I allow each to enter and to feel God's presence in his own way."

SYDNEY UNITARIAN CHURCH.

SIR,—The kindly references, by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, to the Sydney Unitarian Church and its struggles, may have prepared you and the English Unitarian friends generally for this appeal.

As Mr. Hargrove well said, it is useless to go back to "ancient history," and we are thankful to say that the troubles of the last few years are over, although the present representatives of our cause in Sydney, and who were not responsible for the calamities, find themselves saddled with the responsibility for a debt which hampers them in the good work, and requires early attention.

Upon the building itself there is still remaining about £300 of the original debt; but there is a more pressing debt of £250, of which we trust to wipe out a considerable portion by means of a bazaar to be held early next September.

With a little effort we are able to do the ordinary work of the Church, and keep the yearly balance on the right side; but the extra effort will be no easy task, and we venture to invite the practical sympathy of the friends in the Old Country.

The Unitarian Association has promised a donation of 10 per cent. on the Bazaar takings up to the amount of £50. Donations may be sent to the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., of Leeds, who visited the Church last year, and who is able, from direct personal acquaintance, to explain how we are endeavouring to carry forward the banner of Unitarianism in the face of unusual difficulties—difficulties, however, which we intend to overcome by resolute work and fidelity to the cause.

IMMORTALITY.

SIRS,—Accepting your correction of a verbal inaccuracy on my part, may I just say that the idea I meant to convey was that the human soul, as a spark from the Divine fire, contains within itself all potentiality of individual development? But throughout its long career, the God who first sent it forth is ever working within it, using it as His instrument, until it learns to respond to the divine touch, and so to work out its own salvation, through Him of whose being it is indeed a part.

LITERATURE.

BOOKS NEW AND OLD.

A SENTENCE in one of the letters of Richard Lewis Nettleship has been running in my head lately. It is to this effect: "Has the higher religious thinking in England gone on outside of English dogmatic Christianity?" The question chimes in with an uneasy impression created by a good deal of theological reading. So much of it is scholarly, laborious, sincerely earnest, and yet it never seems to come to close hand-grips with real problems at all. Theology is tending to drift more and more into scholasticism confined to a small group of professional students. The aim of the professional teacher of religion is to establish some appearance of harmony between traditional doctrine and new knowledge by concessions of small importance or intellectual legerdemain. It is this which makes so much of our modern religious writing ineffective: It is ineffective because it is unreal. Nettleship's suggestion that the higher religious thinking goes on outside the recognised dogmatic limits has more truth in it than many people will care to recognise.

It is this which helps to give importance and interest to what, for want of a better term, I may call lay-theology. It is usually more free from unconscious bias, and in consequence more individual and less official than the more elaborate efforts of the schools. It sends the mind off on fresh tracks of thought, and gives the impression of coming to close quarters with existing difficulties and real ex-experience. There are, for instance, in the letters of Nettleship himself sentences and paragraphs, which, in their suggestiveness and actuality, contain more spiritual stimulus than many volumes. I find myself going back to them continually, they are so frank and incisive, with a gift for expressing the essential elements of a question in a few words. "It is strange how differently trouble affects different people," he writes, "I sometimes think it only makes them better if they are good already. Nothing at least has given me such a feeling of my own moral weakness as the way in which personal loss has demoralised me." Strangely different this from the conventional doctrine of resignation taught from most pulpits, and yet as soon as it is put in this way we see that it contains a forgotten element of experience. Or, take this summary of the religious significance of the controversy about the miraculous birth of Christ. "Has it anything whatever to do," he asks, "with anything that can be called 'divine'? Is a person more worthy of love, devotion, worship, because he was abnormally born?" "If an 'orthodox' attacks me," he writes again, "I am perfectly prepared to admit that he lives better than I do, but what I can never admit is that his life is the expression of his orthodoxy. . . Religion isn't worth talking about, if it does not mean the simplest, most elementary, if you like, most 'primitive,' convictions that one finds in oneself when one is stripped of all conventional trappings. Most 'religious controversy' seems to me to get nowhere near the real thing." And this little revealing sentence has often impressed me as of more value than many pages of commentary: "Did it ever strike you that Christ was never ill, and that he could go to sleep in a storm, as Skobeleff could do in a battle?"

It is true that the sentences I have quoted are no more than obiter dicta; but they succeed in sending the mind forward with vigour and freshness. The same quality belongs to a little book published recently, entitled "Religion, a Criticism and a Forecast," by G. Lowes Dickinson. In four short essays it discusses Ecclesiasticism, Revelation, Religion, and Faith. The treatment is necessarily slight, and the book contains many things which are likely to provoke dissent, but it is a piece of real thinking; and it has about it the subtle personal interest of a candid mental disclosure. It grapples at close quarters with some of the central problems of religion, and in its general drift and tendency it is a vigorous, if at the same time it is an unconventional plea for some of the essential factors of the spiritual life. No better illustration of its earnestness and underlying enthusiasm could be given than this fine description of the nature and function of faith. "Because there is an horizon, because there is space, because there is the unknown, therefore there is faith. Columbus had faith. But what he discovered was not the wor d of his dream. Only the dream helped him to discover it; and, spiritually, we are all in his position. We are Columbuses setting forth on our voyage. We need our dream, but we need also our compass. And the confirmation or dissipation of the dream hangs upon reality. But while, in this sense, faith must wait upon truth, it is also true in another sense that truth waits upon faith. For the impulse to pursue truth is itself a form of faith. We hope that truth is obtainable; we desire and will to attain it; we dream its attainment as we go in quest of it. And, but for that dream, and that hope, and that will, we should never start at all. Faith is the sense and call of the open horizon. If we abstract it from the forms in which we clothe it, from the specific beliefs which are, as it were, its projection into the intelligence, it presents itself as the spring of our whole life, including our intellectual life. It is the impulse to grow and expand; and just because it is that it has itself no form, but may assume any form. It is a taper burning, now bright, now dim, and changing colour and substance with every change in the stuff it consumes. The frailest thing we know, it is also the least perishable, for it is a tongue of the central fire that burns at the heart of the world."

But now I must clear myself from a possible misunderstanding. In this eulogy of lay-theology and this emphasis of its significance, I do not mean to undervalue the work which the trained scholar alone is capable of doing, or the guidance of accredited Christian teachers. The best books of the theological world (of course, purely technical treatises must be excepted) escape the penalties of professionalism, and appeal to a wide circle of intelligent men and women. A book, for instance, like Harnack's "Expansion of Christianity" is a piece of work of first-rate historical importance. The second volume in Dr. Moffatt's excellent translation has just appeared, and should have many readers. I should like also to call attention to a volume by Dr. Rashdall, entitled "Christus in Ecclesia." Perhaps it is a little unfortunate that it has been published in the form of sermons. A series of essays on the Church and its Institutions might have been more attractive. But here we have a vigorous and candid plea for the corporate and historical forms of Christianity by a scholarly Broad Churchman. It is a piece of constructive work which needed to be done from the side of Liberal Religion, and it has been done very effectively. Among other new books on religion readers of this column will be glad to welcome "Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century," by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong, but this is a book which will be dealt with in detail by another pen.

There is nothing more striking in the book-world than the fashion for cheap reprints. They pour into the booksellers' shops in an incessant stream, and publishers are startling us continually with some fresh marvel of elegance and cheapness. The Temple Classics led the way, and, though they have had many rivals, they still keep their pre-eminence for good books that appeal specially to a cultivated taste. Malory, Montaigne, North's Plutarch, the Golden Legend, and a whole series of Franciscan translations show that something besides popular taste has been considered. The latest volume is the "Hymns of Prudentius" in the Latin text, with an English translation. The half-crown series of Darwin's works is also a marvel of cheapness, but the issue of Maine's Ancient Law, in a handsome, well-bound volume, at the same price, is, on the whole, the cheapest and most satisfactory reprint that I have come across. No one certainly has any excuse for not possessing books and reading of the best. Sometimes, perhaps in an unwarrantably sceptical mood, I am tempted to wonder whether this cheapening of good literature has led to any real increase of knowledge and taste. Do these rows and rows of cheap classics merely induce money out of the pockets of the unwary, or do they also fill the mind with great ideas and noble images of truth, and bring us a step nearer to the far-off ideal of a cultivated and thoughtful people? W. H. D.

FROM THEOLOGY TO RELIGION.*

ALL serious minds have their ideas as to the way modern thought has affected and will affect religious life. Mr. Bremner in his little work gives us his ideas on the subject. The book consists of a series of essays, very practical and suggestive, on various aspects of the modern religious problem. "The word which best sums up the intellectual temper of the present generation is 'critical,'" writes the author. But the signs of a new era are manifold, when, as a result of present research and criticism, spiritual interests will hold sway as never before. "In the new era men will silently put a supreme value upon Religion. We shall hear less about the Christian religion and the Mohammedan religion, and we shall see clearly that nothing can be further from true religion than theology." Mr. Bremner sums up the advance that is to come as an advance from theology to true religion. That is his main thesis. "Religion, indeed, is a thing so fine, so intimate, so universal, that it cannot consort with company rough and uncouth as theological dogma." This is no new thesis, and with the author it seems to be based on a conception of theology that is far from adequate. Theology is, after all, the thought-counterpart of religion, and the prophecy of a coming divorce between spiritual life and the attempt to express that life in terms of thought which constitutes theology, seems without any rational justification.

In this book, however, one sees, as in so many quarters nowadays, the reaction against that dogmatising that has so often proved the snare of the theologian and brought his art into disrepute.

Mr. Bremner, in spite of his thesis, turns theologian himself and deals with such questions as "Biblical Criticism," "Miracles," "Evolution and Ethics," "Evolution and Religion," and "Religious Education." And he pleads for an advance in ideas with the best.

An interesting but short section is devoted to an estimate of woman's influence in the advance, with the result that the "eternal feminine" is declared to be ultra-conservative, and consequently the great cause of reaction. This opens out a view of our present position, a view of religious development altogether, in fact, that may be new to some. Women, he argues, apparently are and always have been the great retarders of religious progress. "The nurture of intellectual falsehood is always calamitous, and most calamitous where the fosterer, however well-intentioned, is a person of influence. Now, women, from their influence with children, are the great propagandists, and the intellectual squint is precisely one of those 'characters' which have a fatal tendency to reappear as one generation succeeds another." The reason of the ultra-conservatism, the author holds, is not to be found in lack of logic or clearness of thought, but in the unreasoned and violent likes and dislikes characteristic of the feminine nature, which robs the clarity of thought of its value. And "pre-eminent among these likes and dislikes is the fatal dislike of new ideas, especially in what is erroneously termed the religious sphere." This re-appearance of the "old Adam" in the modern prophet is extremely interesting, and one is only sorry that he does not develop his case to greater lengths.

Altogether, Mr. Bremner has given us a very readable if not a very learned book. Even a busy man may take it up and regale himself with an essay in his odd half-hours with good profit and yet without being over-taxed. May it have success.

J. WORSLEY AUSTIN.

THE COMING CHURCH AND THE BROAD CHURCH.*

WITH all their differences of aim and spirit, of scope and subject, these two books have enough in common and in contrast to be taken together. Dr. Hunter's address makes but a slim volume, while Dr. Rashdall's book is a solid work of considerable importance. To the animating passion of Dr. Hunter's plea all liberal Christians must heartily respond. It seems to us one of the noblest appeals for the Free Catholic Ideal ever made. Those of us who heard this kindling utterance when it was delivered last October from the pulpit of the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, will be glad to glow again to the now printed word. From the present expansion of that sermon we learn that the preacher has now definitely severed his connection with "the new congregationalism which seeks to be a large and aggressive denomination." In a note we are told that "the writer . . . . prefers to describe his own ecclesiastical position as that of an Independent Christian minister—in sympathy, more or less, with churches of every name, but formally related to none." We can understand how modern congregationalism should force a man of Dr. Hunter's catholicity to secede; we can also appreciate his motives in temporarily withholding his personal allegiance from every other body. But the position of an individualistic free-lance cannot, we imagine, be permanently congenial to him. Nor, indeed, is it a position that can be long occupied by any Christian congregation or Christian minister. It may be all very well for a while for a wealthy congregation and for a distinguished preacher. But the stronger congregations must aid the weaker ones and must even advise and guide them in matters of government and the choice of minister. There must be more organic and vital bonds than those which simply permit a rich congregation to pay and a poor one to receive. All experience teaches that in order to take part in any mutual service and co-operation that shall be a benefit to our rich and poor, educated and ignorant congregations, they must federate and finally unite in a corporate ecclesiastical life. Without this they cannot possibly bear each other's burdens and so fulfil the law of Christ. It is to be hoped that Dr. Hunter's detachment is only a momentary necessity, and that the catholics in our own body may win him over as a powerful helper and leader of their cause. For our cause and his are essentially one. We seek a Broad Church which is frankly and fearlessly based on the open principle of undogmatic inclusiveness.

On the other hand, there are many men of strict intellectual integrity to whom the section of Anglicanism which Dr. Rashdall represents, cannot commend itself. As Dr. Hunter says:—"They are not able to pass through its gates in an upright attitude, and they cannot crouch and creep. . . . Honest men cannot subscribe to articles, or repeat creeds or pray prayers which do violence to their serious convictions. . . . To make free with solemn obligations is not the same as to be freed from them. Reforming from within is always difficult work, and it may be morally dangerous. To seek to remove evils by lending to them in the meantime the support of one's own practice and influence, to make insincere professions in the hope that one day such professions will not be required, is not a policy which can be fairly described as wise and good. . . . They are not willing to act a lie in order to get or keep a place as religious teachers in any community." (pp. 37-39.)

With Dr. Hunter's main plea all our readers are familiar, for it has ever been the plea of the best men among us—of Taylor of Norwich in past times, of John James Tayler, Thom, and Martineau in recent times, and of a rapidly increasing number of our ablest representatives in the living present. It is the plea for what we know as Free Catholicism.

"It is the subtle sympathy of congenial souls, it is the unity of the spirit, that is the real bond—the bond of peace. In our supreme moments of religious communion we cease to be sectarian; cease to be Roman Catholics or Protestants; Conformists or Non-conformists, Calvinists or Arminians, Trinitarians or Unitarians—cease to be anything partial; it is given us to realise our oneness with God and with the whole church and family of God" (p. 69).

Already "the best men in all the Churches do not want to wear theological or sectarian labels" (p. 93). It would, therefore, seem a fitting thing that "Trinity Church," Glasgow, should now abandon its own indefensible dogmatic label and follow the example of some of our own churches, who have wisely discarded or never adopted the name "Unitarian." For "what is the conclusion of the whole matter? At present little more than this. By putting before you the ideal of a church simply Christian, I hope to put you in love with it, to deepen your confidence in it, to make you give your influence and sympathy to the movements and men who are most directly and openly preparing the way for it, and to stimulate you to do what you can for its realisation. It is an ideal worth living and working for. Though it tarry, wait for it—praying with Tauler, 'May that which is perfect come, that that which is in part may be done away.' The waiting, however, need not be passive. Even now we may belong to the catholic fellowship of Jesus Christ. In our religious sympathies we can disown every sectarian limit; we can refuse to have anything to do with drawing lines, or keeping to lines already drawn, which the Master of Christians never drew; we can decline to let artificial and conventional arrangements hinder us from recognising the scattered kindred of Christ wherever they may be found; we can treat as anti-Christ the sectarian temper of all those religious guides who bid us hold no communion with any other church than their own; we can turn away in the Lord's name from everything that has the mark of exclusiveness upon it as if it had the mark of base ambition or passion; we can strive to make our ways of worship and teaching and work as non-exclusive and catholic as he was who said, 'Whosoever shall do the will of my Father, the same is my brother and sister and mother,' and

'Him that cometh into me, I will in no wise cast out.'" (pp. 91–92.)

When we pass from this high and generous ardour to Dr. Rashdall's book the atmosphere cools and the prospect narrows. In some respects it is a salutary supplement to what we have been reading, for it treats of some of the practical features of that Ideal which we have just been contemplating. "The unity of the spirit," says Dr. Hunter, "must work itself out in a body and be seen of men." So far as this is consistent with the prosperity of the Establishment we see Dr. Rashdall endeavour to work it out.

He deals in a manner at once interesting and intelligible to all educated men and women with the services and ordinances, the institutions and practices of the Christian Church. His is a much-needed book, and we are sincerely grateful for having had the pleasure of reading it. We may be permitted to repeat for ourselves what the author says in his preface. "Many are now engaged in the task of theological reconstruction, but I do not know of any book with which I should be in general sympathy covering exactly the ground of the present work." Dr. Rashdall is perhaps the foremost champion of the Broad Church movement, and his volume has the merits and defects of that school. It reveals a fine combination of social enthusiasm, theological liberalism, and a practical ecclesiastical conservatism which makes the most out of the existing condition of the Church of England. Towards Non-conformists he offers a frank hand of fellowship, but strictly on the understanding that Anglicanism remains the predominant partner. He would welcome them to Holy Communion in the Church, but he omits to suggest that Anglicans might sometimes receive Communion in a Non-conformist church (p. 326). In some respects he is out of sympathy with his own denomination (pp. 254, 307). But, with all her faults, he loves her still. This love is, however, of a somewhat cold and calculating kind, and the whole air of the book seems to us laden with an Anglican opportunism and a utilitarian complacency in which even Christian devotion appears to become a mere means (p. 162), and not the chief end of a man who is to glorify God and enjoy Him for ever. We are told (p. 184) that God does not care for our gratitude "unless it is in some way good for us to be grateful." This is an ambiguous phrase, but it sounds as if we are to be grateful to God not because He desires the thanks of His children or because His children in the uncalculating gladness of their heart desire to offer their thanks, but because gratitude has a good effect upon our souls. The three sermons on prayer seem to us to be on a commonplace level and to concede far too much to popular science. Prayer is treated too much from the point of view of an Ethical Society, as a moral gymnastic, "a mode of cultivating and building up devotion to ideals" (p. 171).

When we come to the justification of certain special usages and practices we see the Broad Church in its worst light. Anglicans, as we know, are committed to the reading or singing of all—even the imprecatory—psalms, but this need not worry them, for they are here shown a convenient way round, or, rather, through. As we sing psalms like the "cursing" 109th, "we must mentally correct them in the light of Christian teaching" (p. 186). We presume that in reciting the creeds and saying the litany and some of the more extraordinary prayers we must mentally correct these, too? At this point one seems to understand fully Dr. Rashdall's remark (p. 341): "Amid all the controversies by which we are surrounded, the most distressing feature is the appalling indifference to truth which (I regret to say it) seems to be more and more prevalent among large sections of the clergy and their more zealous lay adherents."

Although Dr. Rashdall is not sparing in his attack on "dishonest apologetics" (p. 269), he offers (p. 83) a sheer evasion of Article XIII. by ignoring the fact that it follows Article XII. and should be read with it. At the same time, he feels that "it is hardly possible to read the words without a shudder when one thinks of what they probably meant to the Protestant dogmatist who penned them."

It is this hardihood in making one thing mean another that shocks people who are not members of the Anglican Church and has driven many of us and will yet drive many others out of her fold. Far more perilous than the obscurantism of the High Church or the honest ignorance of the Evangelical section is this laxity of the Broad. There is here no question about the theoretical ethics of this kind of thing, for the theory is firmly grasped, only it is not applied with any thoroughness or rigour to conduct. Here, for example, is what the author himself says:—

"It is morally wrong to go on asserting doctrines which we have no ground for believing to be true. There are times when it is a duty to refuse—even by silent acquiescence—to encourage the growth of what seems to us false and groundless opinions on matters of religion, even where they seem to have little direct bearing upon the individual life and conduct" (p. 122).

"No admiration for the virtues of those who believe what we doubt should ever for one moment make us palter with truth, make us play at believing things we really can't believe, or try to keep up in others beliefs which we have ceased to hold ourselves" (p. 362).

These are noble sentiments, as fine as any in this book. "It is morally wrong to go on asserting"—but let us meanwhile blandly assert. "There are times"—but those times do not seem to be just yet. Are we to believe that dishonesty ceases to be dishonesty when for the purposes of practical ecclesiastical politics it is openly proclaimed and organised as a method of reform? Whatever Dr. Rashdall's views, he declares them boldly enough, but does that relieve him and his school from the implied judgment of those whose moral consciousness has commanded them at no small sacrifice to quit the Church? Are these too simple in mind, or are they only too sensitive of their personal honour?

MR. P. C. MOZOOMDAR'S LAST BOOK, "THE ASIS."

FROM the Indian Messenger of June 25 we are glad to reproduce the following review of a book, the last written by the late Protap Chunder Mozoomdar.

Having referred to Mr. Mozoomdar's well-known book, called "Heart Beats," the writer continued:—Perhaps we find the man nowhere so completely as in his new little book published shortly before his death, written in Bengali called "Asis; or God's blessings." It is a compilation of short autobiographical notes dealing within a small compass with nearly all the important topics connected with his life. The book shows completely the mental and spiritual vigour which Mr. Mozoomdar retained to the last. It represents him faithfully without any attempt to give undue colouring to the brightest aspects of his nature. Mozoomdar was always known to be an English writer, but the present work discloses the most agreeable fact that he had a complete hold upon his mother tongue, and as a piece of literary workmanship it may be regarded as almost perfect.

"Asis" may be fitly compared with Keshub Chandra Sen's autobiographical sermons known as "Jivan Veda." But the former gives us a greater variety of subjects than the latter, and will be read probably with greater intellectual delight and with no less spiritual benefit.

It is not possible to give a summary of the book, but we may notice one or two points in it.

Mr. Mozoomdar's early education was imperfect and incomplete. But, nevertheless, we know that he lived to become one of the greatest writers and thinkers of his day, at least in his own country. It was his deepest religious impulse that made him what he was. There are two things in his religious life which helped to raise his character—(1) His relation to Christ, (2) His relation to Keshub. He disclaims the idea that he imbibed his veneration for Christ from Keshub. Those who have read the story of his first conversion to life in Christ in his "Oriental Christ" know it already. But he freely and gratefully confesses his indebtedness to Keshub Chandra Sen for all that he learned from him about Christ. Mozoomdar's relation to Jesus is a lesson to his countrymen. It exemplifies a Christian life without identifying oneself with denominational Christianity. Why he was drawn to Jesus at all is a question which he himself raises. The answers given are twofold—(1) He was a sinner and was in need of salvation, (2) Jesus was vouchsafed to him for his countrymen as well. Let no follower of Christ misunderstand him. He believed in no miraculous cure of sin by the blood of Jesus, but believed in its cure by the perfectly natural process of assimilation of character. In his life-long labour in the field of religion he was never slow in showing that the place of Christian religion was only a place of moral character in it.

His relation to Keshub serves a practical lesson to the Brahmo Samaj. We all know with what intense affection and admiration he was united with him; and yet his independence of action and character has always been most phenomenal.

He has left with us a lesson how independence could be united with veneration. What is more natural than to expect that Protap was only a transcript of Keshub, and yet how different we know the fact was. Perhaps there are no two men in the Brahmo Samaj so differently constituted as they were. Take them, for example, as speakers. Keshub was easy, spontaneous and emotional; Protap was laborious and intellectual, and even sometimes verbose. As a writer Protap certainly was more artistic than Keshub; but the latter touches our heart more deeply. Both have been regarded as mystics, but Keshub was a mystic of the Eastern type. Protap reminds us of Wordsworth and Emerson. Indeed, I am inclined to think that he was deeply read in the latter, and his language as well as thought was shaped by him. If there was any man, however, whom Protap resembled most it was Maharshi Devendranath. To this he bears testimony himself in the book, and Keshub is also reported by him to have borne the same testimony. Both were recluse and lovers of nature. Keshub was interested in man, specially in historical men. Both Devendranath and Protap were interested in nature. Some of Mozoomdar's chapters in his "Spirit of God," specially the one on Kinship of Nature, are indicative of what I say about him. Nature to him was "intensely human" and put his "unquiet self" often "to rest." The soul found itself in it, and its suggestions were often a practical guide to him. I remember to have read and heard him saying with what rapturous awe he listened night and day to the gurgling noise of a spring in the neighbourhood of his hermitage at Kurseong. Mozoomdar was in the habit of taking a walk every morning. It was done both for his physical and spiritual benefit. We often noticed the expression of his face during these walks. They bespoke of a contemplative attitude which was a nutriment to his spiritual powers. I met him one day in one of the busiest streets in Calcutta in this attitude, and was sorry to have disturbed his reverie. He told me one day that he lived in high water level of spiritual life in these morning hours, and all that he had done and said in life were directly or indirectly the effect of it.

I have only given above a few hints of what the reader is expected to find in his latest book. It is worth perusing. Brahmoism is not subscription to a number of opinions, but a growing participation in that life which our leaders lived—Mozoomdar being one of them. We shall find the book to be a guide to lead us to that life. One does not care to know much what opinions he entertained, but is most anxious to know what kind of life he lived.

"Asis" and Maharshi's autobiography have not only been, within the last few months, contributions to Brahmo literature, but they have been most valuable contributions to Bengali literature in general. The language in them is of the same type—classical, dignified, and chaste, and stands in sharp contrast to the effeminacy of expression to which we have been used of late years. The dignified language is simply the outward garb of dignified sentiments which they convey.

OBITUARY.

MR. H. A. R. JOY.

I LIKE that figure of the Greeks—
A lone man on a sea-girt rock,
On whom despotic Malice wreaks
Relentless frenzy, shock on shock.

He stands, so strong to do and dare,
A king of man, if he were free!
But tempest-blinded, fettered, bare
And powerless in his agony!

* * * *

I like that figure. But I know
Of men enisled on barren rocks,
Who leave no legacy to show
A life's achievement; whom fate mocks

With distant views of heavenly fires,
While, fettered in the gloom, they lie
With unlit torch, and pent desires
Consume them slowly till they die.

And when I hear from one of these
The cry ascend "Thy will be done!"
Promethean bellowings cannot please
As these calm words from such an one.

So wrote our friend "H. A. R. J." (with whose initials during the last few years readers of THE INQUIRER have grown familiar), in the little book of verse "Suspiriosæ Cogitationes," reviewed in these columns last December. And on the next page, picturing a humble funeral at Davos, we find this verse:—

Men see a funeral pageant pace
To yon lone plot on Dörfli crest;
I see a hero of our race
Go by in triumph to his rest!
Yet few can know, and fewer praise
The glory of your barren days.
Farewell! my brother.

We quote these verses at the beginning of this memorial notice, because our friend was of the same kindred as those other men of whom he wrote He was only thirty-five when he died, and he would have laughed if we had offered to see anything heroic in him. "Friedeck" he called the little house in which he settled at Tunbridge Wells a few years ago; and the same name, with yet richer meaning, he gave to the house to which he moved on his marriage in 1903. If one went to see him there it was to be met in the happiest spirit, by a man of beautiful simplicity of nature, of quick sympathies, generous impulse, and quiet humour, one who delighted in his garden and was the friend of little children. But that bright, brave spirit was only preserved through "reverent service of a will resigned." For years he had endured very grievous trials, disappointed of all high ambitions by the lack of strength, crippled in the eager hopes of his young manhood, cut off from all active pursuits, and from year to year prostrated by recurring illness. He was of giant frame, being far over six feet in height, and he had been in Australia and California, but it was in the constantly disappointed search for health, and several years before he settled down at Tunbridge Wells he had spent at Davos.

Henry Archibald Robert Joy was the eldest son of the Rev. H. Joy, D.D., rector of Gretford, near Stamford. He was born March 24, 1870, at Bampton, in Oxfordshire, of which his father was at that time the incumbent. He was a cousin of Bruce-Joy, the sculptor, and the artist, George William Joy. From Worthing School he went in 1888 to Worcester College, Oxford, graduating there with honours in 1891. While at Oxford he taught in the St. Ebbe's Sunday-school, and after graduation was for two years at Wycliffe Hall, intending to enter the Church. But doctrinal difficulties barred the way, and failure of health cut him off from any other career on which he might have entered. Among his poems will be found some which belong to the time he spent in Australia, while others were written at Davos, where he was President of a Students' Association. In 1896 he published "Poems and other Verses, by H. A. R. J." (Fisher Unwin), the best of which are included in his later volume, and in 1897 an anonymous prose work, "The Perfect Law of Liberty; a Plea for Freedom of Thought in the Service of Faith," by Vindex (Redway). This shows how his thought had moved. The book was an attempt "to emphasise the fact, too little recognised, that the Christian Religion is a Religion of Liberty—a liberty from which nothing is excluded but sin; that all truth belongs to Christianity; that Theology is only so far Christian as it is true; and that in the determination of truth the soul must suffer no authority to intervene between itself and God." It is an earnest essay, dealing with fundamental questions of inspiration and prophecy, and the chief doctrines of the Church, fearless in its criticism, insisting on the progressive nature of all genuine religious thought, and entirely Unitarian in its conception of God and Christ. Indeed, from that time Mr. Joy was in close friendly relations with members of the heretic communion, and after he settled at Tunbridge Wells he several times conducted the service for the congregation meeting in the Mechanics' Institute, and once at least went over to Canterbury to preach. If his health had permitted he would gladly have undertaken regular service with some Free Church.

He was a scholar of fine feeling, as his poems amply testify, and a man of earnest democratic sympathies. Thus he wrote of his ideal for this country in "A Song of Jubilee" in 1897, of how with the might of England law and freedom are spread, and "in claims of wider kinship prejudices fade away."

Draw the bands of fellow-feeling closer
'twixt the severed parts;
Knit the Empire as one people in a Commonwealth of hearts;
Rouse the cry of Federation; strike the fetters from our trade;
Still the rage of petty faction in a league of mutual aid.

Yet there is a darker side of the picture, and there ought to be no boasting of England's greatness while such things remain.

Boast we well of England's greatness, we her sons who know her shame?
Do we blind ourselves to blemish by the glamour of her name?
Not while thousands of her children wander homeless in her streets;

Not while opulent oppression sits in magisterial seats,
Wielding power in strength's assertion granted for the weak's defence ;
Massing gold in legal pillage of dependents' hard-won pence.
Not while Labour lingers work'ess in the Poorhouse and the slum,
Where low appetites are blatant and all higher impulse dumb.

These and other evils oppress the mind of the true patriot; but still there has been progress during sixty years, and an increase of power to grapple with our ills.

Only let our general bounty, linking with our special skill,
Fight the pestilence and the famine, and forbid the Turk to kill :
Thus the new-found power to fetter evils that we cannot cure
Adds new zest to our rejoicing, heartens courage to endure.
Debtors we to every nation for the greatne:s of our own,
Pay the debt with grateful welcome to the guests of England's throne !
Let the hands that clasp in friendship break the swords that clank for strife ;
And unite divided empires in the interests of one life !

Of what Mr. Joy endured, both from the failure of his health and from the pain of breaking with old associations in his steadfast loyalty to truth, we must not speak further here, nor of what he accomplished in quiet ways of practical helpfulness in spite of the grievous disabilities from which he suffered. Repeatedly he had been reduced to the last extremity of weakness and had rallied. This year he wrote in April that he had suffered from his "annual attack of influenza," though with less damage than usual ; but further illness and prostration of strength followed, and he passed away on July 13th. Sorrowfully, but with grateful remembrance and admiration for the brave and beautiful spirit of his life, we bid him farewell. Let his own words of faith conclude this memorial notice, the last lines, "L'Envoi," of his "Suspiriosae Cogitationes" :*—

Tho' the world be dark with pain ;
Steeped with tears the bread we gain ;
Tho' the anguish of man's strife
Close but with the close of life ;

Faith is ours (no wavering mood
Vanquishes) that God is good.
Hope is ours that Man must climb
Far beyond his sordid prime.

Love is ours, to light our way
Thro' the darkness to the day ;
Present Guerdon, future Hope,
Urging Faith to boundless scope.

Love that fills domestic claims ;
Love inspiring social aims ;
Love, unbound by race or creed,
Asking nought of man but need.

Glad of heart, may all who move
Thro' life's darkness lit with love
Grudge no ray of warmth and light,
Where their brethren toil thro' night.

THERE are seasons when to be still demands immeasurably higher strength than to act. Composure is often the highest result of power.—Channing.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A SEASIDE HOLIDAY.

THEY were the happiest and jolliest party you ever saw—nine of them, all told, and they were walking along the way which led from the railway station to a farmhouse called "Brookside." The distance was about four miles, the first half over heathery moorland and the last two miles down from the moors, and along a little wooded valley. Flowing along the valley there was a stream of clear water, which sometimes ran over pebbles and couldn't help laughing, because the pebbles tickled it. The path and the stream kept quite close to each other, as if they were chums, and occasionally they got so mixed that you could hardly say which was path and which stream, and you had to pick your way over stepping stones. In the trees, which grew on both sides of the valley, cheeky squirrels were frequently to be seen, and they peeped and scolded if you stood still, but scampered off if you moved ever so little. At the foot of the trees there was much lovely green moss and graceful ferns, along with other woodland plants bearing flowers. After a while the valley widened out, and there were meadows, and here the stream gave up laughing and, becoming more serious, began to flow quietly between its banks, where reeds and rushes were growing, and, along with them, meadowsweet and purple loosestrife. Still, although the stream was less merry, its faithful companion, the field path, kept quite close to it, until at last they reached the Brookside Farm garden in company. At the corner of the garden they parted for a short distance—the brook flowing along the lower side of the garden and the path turning off and passing through the farmyard to the door of the farmhouse.

Yes, they were the happiest party of folk you ever set eyes on as they walked along the valley path from the railway station down through the woods to the Brookside Farm, for all nine of them were to stay for a whole month's holiday there, and what is more it was to be a seaside holiday too, for if you followed the path which led downwards from the farm and again joined the stream at the other side of the garden, you only had to walk a quarter of a mile and there you came suddenly upon a little bay with a sandy shore, and with rocks and cliffs on either side, and the great sea with its rolling waves right in front of you.

Who could help being happy in such a place, where everything was ten times more beautiful and wonderful than they had expected it to be ?

But who were these nine joyous ones ?

Well, there were father and mother (Mr. and Mrs. Holden) and the three youngsters —Frank, fourteen years old ; Elsie, twelve ; and Ernest, nearly ten. Then there was Charlie and Mab Westcott, school friends of Frank and Elsie. Charlie was fifteen years old and Elsie just over thirteen. Next came Nip the terrier (age doubtful), the most important member of the party in his own opinion, and lastly there was Uncle Ned. Uncle Ned was Mrs. Holden's brother, a tremendous favourite with everybody and with the young folk especially. It was Uncle Ned who had planned the whole thing. He was a doctor, and he had noticed that Frank, who had been working for a scholarship examination, was getting done up, and needed care and a rest ; so he had arranged to take his own holiday at Brookside, and to devote it to the welfare and pleasure of the young folk, and of Frank especially, for he had a great opinion of his nephew, and foresaw that he would "make his mark."

So, pretending that he was going to Brookside to carry out studies in shore life and plant life, he first invited Frank to go and help him, then the other two to help Frank, then Charlie and Mab to add to the delight of the other three by joining them, and lastly father and mother had to go and keep them all in order when he himself was busy. Nip invited himself !

Now Uncle Ned knew Brookside well, having stayed there in his student days, but he had wisely said little about its many beauties and attractions, preferring to let these come as delightful surprises. So when they arrived at the station, he arranged for all the luggage to be sent on by the carrier's van, and then informed the party that a walk of four miles lay between them and lunch. Thereupon they took their way over the moors and down the valley alongside the merry brook, and having come a long journey from a busy city, dusty, smoky, and stiflingly hot, it filled them with delight just to breathe the heather-scented moorland air, and with rapture to look up at the great snow-white summer clouds sailing across the blue sky.

Even Nip was carried away by his feelings, and went nearly wild with joy on the moors. He had found the long railway journey very trying, and now he raced and scampered here, there, and everywhere, taking a series of flying bounds in the deep heather, and every now and then catching whiffs of rabbit, so that the spirit of a mighty hunter awoke in him, and he followed the scent until he came to the burrow, and then went into hysterics, and exploded in a series of yelping barks like a fifth of November cracker.

After the heather came the valley, with its woods and squirrels and jays, and the stream and its close friend the woodland path. All these had succeeded each other like a beautiful dream, which ended not as dreams so often do, in disappointment, but in an added delight when at length Brookside Farm was reached, and its lovely garden sloping down to the brook and full of roses, honeysuckle, sunflowers, and hollyhocks opened on their view.

And this was to be their home for four happy weeks with cheery Mrs. Banks, the farmer's wife, and her daughter Maggie, to help their mother to look after their welfare at home, and with Uncle Ned and father to take them out for long rambles and expeditions in search of the wonders of the sea and shore, the rock pools and cliffs, as well as the woodlands and moorlands.

I am sure I cannot at all hope to be able to tell you even a hundredth part of the marvels they found and the interest and wonder awakened in their minds by what Uncle Ned was able to say about them. The boys were chiefly interested in shore life, while Mab and Elsie cared more for the beautiful plants so plentifully to be found. Next week I hope to tell you about their first walk down to the seaside and some of Uncle Ned's preparations for collecting and keeping specimens.

A LAST GIFT.

A YEAR ago this week we published a review of Mr. ARMSTRONG's little book on "The Trinity and the Incarnation." Earlier in that same month, he wrote for THE INQUIRER a memorial article on GEORGE FREDERICK WATTS, and at the beginning of August a review of HERBERT SPENCER's Autobiography. Then for six weeks in the autumn he delivered at Northampton and Nottingham the course of lectures on "Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century" now published,* which we must accept, save for the hope of a further volume of sermons, as his last gift to the religious thought and life of his time.

The lectures, delivered to large popular audiences, were received, as Mr. WICKSTEED says in his preface, with an interest that gave promise of far-reaching usefulness and influence.

"It was felt that they displayed in a high degree all the best characteristics of Mr. ARMSTRONG's expositions. They are, indeed, models of lucidity, candour, and sincerity, and in the largeness and generosity of their appreciation and sympathy they show that Mr. ARMSTRONG's mind was deepening and mellowing as well as strengthening up to the very end. His death has disappointed the hopes of many expectant audiences; but it was impossible to allow utterances of such weight to be withheld from the public, and (with a single exception) the manuscript was so complete as to render the task of preparing it for the press a light one."

The lectures had been, indeed, very carefully prepared, "drawing together to a focus," as Mr. ARMSTRONG says in the last lecture, "studies scattered over many years of life." It was one of his great gifts, to be able, even in extempore speech, to say, clearly and concisely, exactly what he wanted to say, and what most needed to be said; and so with these lectures fully written, although he had no opportunity of revision, it is not surprising, and yet a very happy circumstance, that when the swift summons came and all his work had to be laid aside, there was left for us a book, practically ready for the press, to meet the eager expectation of those who had hoped to hear the lectures from his living voice, and to be treasured by the great number of those who had delighted to learn from him, to rejoice in his strength, and to follow his guidance in the interpretation of the deeper things of the religious life.

The one exception to which Mr. WICKSTEED refers is in the latter half of the third lecture, on "Agnosticism, Scientific and Literary," where, after a searching analysis of HUXLEY's modes of thought, there followed a criticism of MATTHEW ARNOLD. This part of the lecture had been marked by the author to be completely re-written, and in its place we find simply a note, indicating the main lines of the argument followed. Those to whom this omission may be a special disappointment may be reminded that MATTHEW ARNOLD was the subject of other published lectures by Mr. ARMSTRONG, first in his little volume on "Latter-day Teachers," published in 1881, which we fear is now out of print, and more recently both in his "Faith and Doubt in the Century's Poets" (1898), and his "Makers of the Nineteenth Century" (1901). WORDSWORTH, SHELLEY, CARLYLE, MILL, DARWIN, TYNDALL, BRADLAUGH, PARKER and MARTINEAU, included in the study of these last lectures, had also all been dealt with in one or other of the earlier volumes, and there is thus an added interest in Mr. ARMSTRONG's final word on them.

The subject of the lectures is limited at the outset to teachers who have written in our English mother-tongue, whether English, Scottish, or American and, further, to those who have made their appeal, not chiefly to philosophers and theologians, but to thoughtful pople generally, who are interested in the great questions of religious faith. For the most part, the writers dealt with belong to the latter half of the Nineteenth Century, from the period of great excitement over what was called the conflict between science and religion, when HUXLEY found the name "Agnostic" for his own attitudes of mind, and the conception of Evolution as presented by DARWIN, and SPENCER was so profoundly modifying our conceptions of creation and the order of the world. But first, in the opening lecture, three earlier writers are dealt with, who have exercised a deep and abiding influence on the religious thought of succeeding generations, and a fourth, JOHN STUART MILL, who was a potent force in his own day on the side of the critical understanding, and whose attitude on the subject of Theism, having regard to his up-bringing, had great significance in the progress of thought. Of the other three, CARLYLE is celebrated as the prophet of the "Everlasting Yea"; SHELLEY, if atheist in a formal sense in revolt against orthodox tyranny, yet "atheist in the ultimate interests of Theism," who "diffused an atmosphere in which men might come to know God again in that heart-intimacy in which he was known long ago by the founder of Christianity;" and WORDSWORTH, the poet-prophet of the Divine Immanence in Nature and the soul of man. On this last point, Mr. ARMSTRONG speaks in the following passage:—

"The rarest peculiarity of WORDSWORTH is that he looked into the heart of man in the same still waiting way as that in which he gazed into the core of the world of mountain-slope and woody gorge. The simpler the human being the more the poet had to learn from him. The ancient beggar, the leech-gatherer, the child, from these he read the deepest secrets of all: And by this patient, loving observance, year after year, he came to know how the law of the same God who shapes the hills moves through the soul of man—a law severe and stern, yet if we receive it and obey it, benignant, tender, nay, secreting joy and gladness even in a world deeply acquainted with grief. And so, though no real poet's creed aptly fits itself into the clauses of a theological system, WORDSWORTH became the greatest conserver of ultimate religious truth in the English literature of the nineteenth century. His thought has now diffused itself into the atmosphere of our time. He has given us a background of religious feeling on which we can securely set forth such doctrine of GOD and man as philosophy may ultimately declare consonant with reason and with fact. And, if the young are still often impatient with him, in many an old man's heart he has unsealed the fountains of peace." (P. 24.)

The second lecture is on the "Rise of the Evolution Doctrine," dealing with DARWIN, SPENCER and FISKE, the third, as above noted on "Agnosticism, Scientific and Literary;" the fourth on "Materialism and Atheism," represented by TYNDALL and BRADLAUGH. They are lectures, as all who knew Mr. ARMSTRONG, would be assured beforehand that they must be, clear and just in their exposition, giving full weight to the real advances of scientific knowledge, and with warm appreciation of all that was noble in the writers criticised; HUXLEY's transparent truthfulness and hatred of shams, BRADLAUGH's sincerity and reforming zeal, TYNDALL's vein of poetry in his interpretation of nature, and yet with keen discernment laying bare the logical defects of such thinkers in their attitude to fundamental questions of religion.

Of special value is the conclusion of the

* "Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century: An Historical Study of Religious Thought." Six Lectures by RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG, B.A., with an Introductory Note by PHILIP H. WICKSTEED, M.A. (Philip Green, 5, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. 2s. net.)

lecture on the Evolution Doctrine, where it is shown how FISKE interprets and completes the teaching of SPENCER on the side of religion. We will quote here, as a fine example of Mr. ARMSTRONG's power of clear exposition, his account of FISKE's argument in his essay on "The Everlasting Reality of Religion." The argument, Mr. ARMSTRONG says, is drawn strictly from the doctrine of evolution itself :—

"The history of man shows that he has from the beginning, since a certain rude culture was attained, believed crudely at first, less crudely as culture has advanced, in three things: first, that the Power ruling in nature is quasi-human, that is, has qualities to which the human mind is akin, such as consciousness, intelligence, will, love, summed up under the one term 'psychical'; secondly, that the human soul does not die; thirdly, that the unseen world has an ethical significance. These three beliefs, and these alone, according to FISKE, constitute a real religion; and these three beliefs have been evolving into clearer and more definite pronouncement parallel with the culture of the human race. They have continually been more and more cleared from childish adulteration, they have reacted continually on the race, and have made humanity continually a higher and better thing. Now the whole history of Evolution, in living things, is the history of the adjustment of organism to its real and actual environment. If a certain portion of the dermal surface has been developed into an eye, it has been in response to the real and actual fact of light external. So of the ear. No organ has ever been developed under evolution, to be defrauded and befooled by finding no external fact corresponding to its function of apprehension. And so the whole teaching of Evolution from first to last is that each fresh internal adjustment has been shaped to fit into and harmonise with some actually existing fact outside. Now the growth of the religious faculty in man is a growth more significant than any mere physical sense. The development of his ethical and spiritual organ is a still grander thing than that of eye or ear. To suppose that there is no fact outside the man corresponding to the new function and the developed organ which crowns his manhood, is to suppose that all the methods of Evolution are reversed just at the highest point, and to make the age-long growth of the soul unmeaning. The teaching of evolution is that the fundamental religious belief of man corresponds not to fiction, but to fact—that there is GOD, that there is immortality, that there is an unseen ethical world. Therefore Religion is for ever real" (pp. 71—73).

Coming to the fifth lecture on "Pure Theism," Mr. ARMSTRONG has a thoroughly congenial subject in his account of the teaching of FRANCIS WILLIAM NEWMAN and THEODORE PARKER; and then, in the concluding lecture, he speaks of "JAMES MARTINEAU ('the foremost exponent of Theism in England in the nineteenth century') and the Outlook To-day."

"His supreme strength," Mr. ARMSTRONG says of his great teacher, "lay in the directness and convincingness of his appeal to religious experience. His philosophy was a religion and his religion was a philosophy. They merge and coalesce, and both spring forth from the deepest experiences of the soul. Hence his sermons, his prayers, his hymns, his marvellous canticles, illuminate his philosophy, and his abstrusest treatises thrill with the emotion of his religion. While I am well aware that the present currents of religious philosophy do not largely flow in the channels which he has hewn, yet I believe that his main theses must ultimately be vindicated, and that, though perhaps somewhat dwarfed for the moment, he is destined to stand forth in the history of thought among the master minds" (p. 195).

We must be forgiven for making one other long quotation from this lecture, which contains, in fact, the sum of the whole matter in Mr. ARMSTRONG's own interpretation of the truths of the religious life :*—

"The central and characteristic contribution of MARTINEAU to the Philosophy of Religion lies in his twofold argument to GOD from our intellectual demand for causality and our moral demand for a divine source and fount of goodness. In the strength of the first, he has perhaps been equalled by others. In the strength, the brilliancy, the moving fervour, the uplifting inspiration of the latter, I doubt whether he has been equalled in the literature of man. In these things, in the analysis of our moral nature, he spoke the things that he knew. He had but with steady hand to exhibit the moral nature as he found it in himself, and the demonstration that it implied and necessitated GOD was complete.

"He built his Theism, then, on the demand of the understanding for a living cause behind phenomena, and the demand of the conscience for a living righteousness behind the moral law. There is, however, a third fact of human nature, which makes for Theism, the perception by the emotions of a living love behind the beautiful or the sublime. Under the pure ministry of nature the soul is ever and again overwhelmed by the inrush of a sense of present deity, all-holy, and all-gracious, protective, hallowing, encompassing, which transcends all argument, and is its own witness and perfect guarantee. If this fact of our nature be admitted to equal rank with the arguments drawn from our intellectual and our ethical constitution, then we have, as we should expect if GOD be real, the threefold and harmonious testimony of the three elements—and there are only three—of our nature, the understanding, the conscience, and the emotions. In the last interview I ever had with Dr. MARTINEAU he gave me his assurance that he deemed this testimony of the emotions entitled to equal rank and credit with those two other testimonies which he himself had so lucidly and powerfully expounded (p. 194).

Speaking, in conclusion, of the "Outlook To-day," Mr. ARMSTRONG, while rejoicing in the changed attitude of recent science towards questions of matter and spirit, notes the danger of a practical materialism more deadly than any philosophical theory. He points to new questions raised by recent psychological studies, of which religious thought must take account, but rests in the conviction that in a true interpretation of the whole of human experience as it is in the world to-day, the reality of religion is assured. Fundamentally it is a practical problem of life, which, through faithfulness to the light and the inward voice of duty, does find itself in touch with the supreme Goodness, Wisdom and Love. These are his concluding words :—

"There is provision in the life of man—in that organ which FRANCIS W. NEWMAN calls the soul—for the continuous satisfaction for its demand for God. The pressure of competition, the struggle for wealth, the craze for pleasure, every evil passion, and all mere dead indifference, are ever making for the decay of religion in our midst. These must be confronted by purity of heart and truth in the inward parts. These, and these alone, can permanently establish such belief in God, as shall have not merely the cold precision of the intellect, but also the fervent glow of faith. It is wise and right to strive to show that Theism is intellectually justifiable, as I, with all my strength, believe it is. But for its health and vitality down the generations the belief in GOD depends on those profounder elements of life which involve the conscience and the soul" (p. 207).

In these passages we have furnished to our readers abundant evidence that this last volume of Mr. ARMSTRONG's lectures is a gift which they must by no means neglect. His essay on "God and the Soul" remains his chief contribution to religious thought, and we rejoice that in the popular sixpenny edition it is now available for wider use than ever. In India it has met with a warm and continually growing appreciation on the part of earnest native students of religion, and among our own people we believe that it still has a great work to do. But this new volume of lectures comes as a most welcome supplement, to be thankfully placed side by side with the other book, and to be used in illustration and comment on its high theme. It will be at the same time, to many friends, a cherished memorial of the last year of a life, rich in true affection and beneficent activity, and steadfast in service of the Highest to the end.

MARTINEAU MEMORIAL FESTIVAL AT KOLOZSVÁR.

A SIMPLE but very touching festival was held in memory of Dr. Martineau in the Kolozsvár Unitarian College. The theological students, under the leadership of their Dean, Dr. Boros, have been wont every year to commemorate some one of the great heroes of the Liberal Faith. During the past college session two such meetings were held. One was in the autumn, when the students expressed their appreciation and admiration of the pioneer work of Servetus, and at the same time their thankful acknowledgment to the Geneva Protestants for the noble memorial raised for the great martyr. The second was the closing festival of the college year, which was devoted to the memory of Dr. Martineau. It was the more interesting and touching because two of Dr. Martineau's former Hungarian pupils paid their tribute to their revered master.

One of these was Bishop Joseph Ferencz. Few, if any, are aware that in 1859, when the first Hungarian Unitarian students appeared in London, one of them was the present bishop, and the other Aron Buzogány, who died as an officer of high rank in the educational department of the Government. Bishop Ferencz gladly availed himself of the opportunity, and spoke with loving remembrance of the famous master of Manchester College. He attended Martineau's lectures only for six weeks, but he remembers him very well, and is able to relate some very interesting episodes from his experience. The Bishop holds in great esteem a copy of Dr. Martineau's "Endeavours after the Christian Life," given to him by the author, when he had to leave England very suddenly. This happened in 1859, when Europe was in a great political convulsion, and the two Hungarian students were warned to return home immediately, or they might not be able to do so for an uncertain time, because of the war between Austria and Italy, which was soon followed by that between Austria and Germany. Bishop Ferencz made some fine remarks on Dr. Martineau's work, and on the very high qualities of the book mentioned.

After the Bishop, Dr. Boros read an elaborate essay on Dr. Martineau as a theologian, a philosopher, the man and the teacher. He was the pupil of Dr. Martineau just twenty years after Bishop Ferencz, when his teacher was already above 70. He spoke with admiration and enthusiasm of Dr. Martineau's exceptional qualities, his hospitality, his fatherly care for the students from a strange land, his fortitude in a time of grievous trial. Dr. Martineau was extremely dear to the Hungarian students for a political reason also. He perfectly knew the situation of Hungary in the East, and spoke with a prophet's foresight of the intentions of Russia, and of the basis of the politics of Austria. His essays: "International Duties and the Present Crisis," "Foreign Policy for 1856," were written fifty years ago, but they are true and applicable to-day, not only in their ethical principles, but also in their political bearings.

Professor Boros also read the two following letters he had received from Dr. Martineau as examples of the deep interest he took in his pupils:—

The Polchar, June 29, 1880.

"DEAR MR. BOROS,—

Your kind letter received last month was most acceptable to me; but I was unable to send you my thanks for it till the busy weeks at the end of our session were over; the more so as I was also distracted by the cares of removal from my old home in Gordon-street to a house (No. 35) in the neighbouring square. At last, however, I reached this quiet nest among the mountains, and can turn my thoughts towards your distant scene of labour and of hope.

"The subjects on which you have to lecture cover a large field, and I rather regret that you have had to take them all up at once. But it is best, in such case, to give yourself up mainly to the thorough working out of one subject at a time; and, with the others, to be for a while content to use a text-book, and fill it up with oral comments or short notes. If you have access to Richard Rothe's "Dogmatik," I think you will find the study of it very suggestive. This intermediate position between orthodoxy and rationalism, qualified him, in an especial manner, for the deeper interpretation of doctrine; a matter in which the Unitarians are very deficient.

"I am delighted to hear that you mingle with your academic pursuits some active religious service of the Sunday-school kind; for, in truth, the world of mere ideas gives us only half our life, and less than half our very thought itself, till it completes itself in affection and action; and the Christian Church will never be a true spiritual fraternity till all classes in it find the way to interchange their gifts and help each other to the common graces of the Christian mind. I am persuaded that the religious scepticism of our time is due, much less to the advance of knowledge, than to the decline of pious service and disinterested love. It is when we cease to 'do the will of the Father in heaven' that we no longer know of the doctrine whether it be divine or not.

"I was particularly interested to learn your feeling respecting the recent change in our political affairs. I confess that to me it is by no means a subject of rejoicing, and I largely share the apprehensions, in relation to foreign affairs, which your countrymen entertain. Though I have always belonged to the Liberal party, I think its leaders have gone completely wrong in their views of European and Asiatic policy during the last six years, so that at the last elections, I voted against them for the first time in my life. Much as I admire Mr. Gladstone, I cannot trust his judgment as a statesman.—Believe me, yours faithfully,

"JAMES MARTINEAU."

"September 17, 1885.

"DEAR MR. BOROS,—I was delighted to receive your letter of the 20th August, which was doubly interesting, as enabling me to congratulate you and Mrs. Boros on the birth of your little daughter, and as reporting the intended formation of a new literary and religious society to widen the culture and quicken the zeal of the members of your ecclesiastical communion. Both events I welcome as of happiest augury: the one for your domestic, the other for your spiritual home. May the blessing of God mature the fair fruits which both events appear to promise.

"I think the idea of this society is one which may be worked out to results of great good. It will be a most wholesome thing to impart to your laity of the knowledge of the religious side of your national history, and a patriotic pride in whatever is noble in the part played by your Unitarian founders and forefathers. Through the medium of biographical sketches and the incidents of past struggles, an enthusiasm for true principles, a knowledge of the development of the doctrine, and a healthy aversion to intolerance may be awakened in many a mind that was asleep before. And still more durable will be the benefit, if the fresh interest can be turned into a practical channel, so as to enlist your people, especially the young and fervent, in some definite work of instruction or benevolence. It is when thoughts and affections become embodied in action and institute habits that their inspiration is secured against dying out, and lives on as a creative power. Our English Sunday-schools have, in this way, been as great a good to the teachers as to the scholars under their care.

"Notwithstanding my retirement from my college office, I shall continue to keep up my old interest in the students, and through the Hungarian members of their fraternity, in the affairs of your churches. Living so near University Hall, I shall often be among my colleagues and their pupils, only to listen instead of to teach. My work is rather changed than dropped; for the printers keep me entirely engaged upon a new edition of my recently published book; and, were it otherwise, I should be busy with its intended successor.

"In this country retreat, a constant series of friendly guests occupies my time too pleasantly for much progress in the severer tasks which I set myself; except, indeed, when I catch such visitors as Mr. Upton, whose congenial conversation rather stimulates than stops my pen.

"Remember me affectionately to my former pupils whom you may happen to see, and believe me always, yours most cordially, JAMES MARTINEAU."

Professor Boros also added some portions from his own college diary to illustrate Dr. Martineau's kindly temper. His literary activity and the position he held in the Unitarian connection were also dealt with in turn.

At the commencement of the proceedings one of the present students offered one of Dr. Martineau's prayers from the College pulpit, the choir sang first the Hungarian and last the English national hymn. After the meeting Dr. Martineau's portraits were shown to those who were present. Professor Boros, in his monthly magazine, published one of Dr. Martineau's hymns in the Rev. N. Jozan's translation. Everybody who took part in this solemn memorial gathering went home filled with deep reverence and admiration for the great English teacher. The theological students seemed to have been most happy to have co-operated with their bishop and professor in honour of one of God's greatest servants.

THE Hibbert Journal for July contains many interesting and suggestive contributions. The first article, by Mr. Claude Montefiore, marks something of a new departure. It is the first of a series in which the attempt will be made to consider Christianity from the point of view of non-Christian religions. The adherents of Christianity have shown during the past fifty years an increasing interest in other types of religion, and have studied them with care and tolerant sympathy. Many books and articles have been written by Christians upon Buddhism, Mohammedanism, Judaism, and other great religions. The aim of our best scholars has been to see these religions as they really are, and to appreciate all that is best in them. Formerly, Christians wrote of other religions chiefly with a view of exalting Christianity at their expense, but recently our scholars have taken larger and more generous views of alien faiths. This change is most important and significant, and must be welcomed by every sincere lover of truth.

We now have in the Hibbert Journal a further development of the same liberal spirit. Christians have said much—often in the kindliest and most sympathetic way about other religions. Now we are to have articles in which other religions will say something—also in the kindliest and most sympathetic way about Christianity. In future numbers we are to be told what a Japanese Buddhist professor and what a distinguished Mohammedan from India think about Christianity. In the present number Mr. Montefiore tells us how the teachings of Jesus appeal to a learned and devout Jew. His task is more difficult than that of a Japanese, as he says, because he cannot so easily look at Christian civilisation from the outside. He begins by defending Jewish teaching against Christian misunderstanding. "The Old Testament is an important part of Judaism, but it is not the whole. It is often supposed that the best religious and ethical teaching which the Jew possesses is the Old Testament, and that all which those dreadful Scribes and Rabbis could produce was limited to laws, casuistry and nonsense. But this is by no means true. . . . There are many fine and great things in the Rabbinical literature which cannot be beaten or even paralleled in the Old Testament, and many religious and ethical doctrines of the Old Testament were developed, purified, and deepened by the Rabbis."

Nevertheless, he admits "these nobler sayings and teachings are buried in a mass of greatly inferior matter. They are not collected together in a lovely setting, united and illumined by the story of a noble life." Even a selection from the Talmud and Midrash "cannot produce the same powerful, driving, and emotional effect as the sayings and teachings of the Gospels. For they then partake of the weakness of all those books which are not really books, but snippets."

Mr. Montefiore goes on to assert that some of the teachings of Jesus which Christians regard as new and peculiar to themselves are no less Jewish than Christian. "The Jew has called God 'Our Father' as long as the Christian; on this point he feels convinced he has nothing to learn." "The synoptic conception of the Fatherhood of God and of His loving kindness was so novel to the great mass of the heathen when they adopted it that it has been falsely supposed that it must have been equally novel to the Jew; whereas to the Rabbinic, mediæval and modern Jew, it was and is the a b c of his religion." He protests equally strongly against Christian arrogance in claiming certain ethical principles as peculiarly their own. "For instance, that reconcilement with one's neighbour must precede reconcilement with God, or that the best alms are those given in secret, or that impure thoughts are evil as well as impure deeds, or that there is peculiar joy in heaven over the repentant—these doctrines and several others are not only Rabbinic commonplaces, but familiar Jewish maxims.

At the same time Mr. Montefiore disagrees entirely with the assertion of some secularists and Jews at the present day that there is nothing really original in the teaching of Jesus. Speaking as a Jewish scholar and an unprejudiced lover of truth, he disposes—one would venture to hope with finality—of that absurd contention favoured by the flippant Agnostic that the teaching of Jesus was only a rechauffé of the Old Testament, and is not therefore worth consideration. A few scattered quotations will suggest his line of thought which we have no space to pursue. "It seems accurate to say that the bringing together of so many excellent ethical and religious doctrines within the compass of a single volume, constitutes an originality by itself. "The combination of Deut. vi. 4 and Lev. xix. 18—the love of God with the love of man—was surely a brilliant flash of the highest religious genius." "A thought is not merely great and new by its substance, but also by its form. Not merely what is said, but how it is said, gives to a particular teaching its vast stimulus for good, its illumination and haunting power." In the Synoptics "we have religion and morality joined together at a white heat of intensity." Coming to definite teachings, Mr. Montefiore admits that what he calls the Jewish doctrine of tit for tat is traversed by the teaching of Jesus when he says, "If ye love them that love you, what thanks have ye," and in the parable of the prodigal son. And further he says, "It may be questioned whether the principle laid down in that most exquisite of stories, 'Much is forgiven her, for she loved much'; and the principle 'Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child,' are not to be rightly considered as novel creations of the Gospel." And, lastly, in the teaching of renunciation and self-denial, "we seem to be cognisant of fresh and original teaching which has produced fruit to be ever reckoned among the distinctive glories of Christianity." Mr. Montefiore closes his article with the plea that "if Rabbinic religion and the mediæval Jewish religious teaching have something to learn from the Gospels, the reader of the Gospels would have also something to learn from them." We may part from this most broad-minded and distinguished Jewish critic of Christianity with the willing admission that in his plea for reciprocal understanding and sympathy we are sincerely at one with him.

Mr. G. M. Trevelyan's article on "Should Agnostics be miserable?" demands an extended notice which cannot be given here. No one wants, we may say, all Agnostics to be miserable. No one surely thinks all Agnostics are miserable. Belief is only one of the sources of happiness. And it might well be a cause of amazement to an outsider to note how dismal and gloomy many Christians are who say they believe, or believe they believe, that God is love. All that we should be inclined to assert is that a genuine belief in God's love and in the continuance of life after death tends to make a man happier, and that a genuine disbelief in them tends to make a man miserable. Agnostics are very difficult to deal with, because one cannot make out where they are and what they hold. They are the most elusive and tantalising of modern thinkers. Mr. Trevelyan repudiates materialism, and would define God "as the sum of the customs of spirit." Mr. Trevelyan's conception of God and the universe seems to us much nearer that of many Christians than he imagines. "To have an adequate conception of the universe we must think of the facts of science in poetical terms." Two things seem to us clear; first, that Mr. Trevelyan's optimism depends on his conception of God and the universe—whatever that conception may be. And, second, if he were forced to accept materialism he would not be an optimist. The man to whom as to Macbeth the universe and human life are "a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing," can, if he is logical, be nothing but a pessimist. And further, the genuine Agnostic who does not know if there is any meaning in life or not, who leaves it an open question whether any assertion made as to the intelligence or stupidity, the beneficence or evil of ultimate reality is true or not, or whether there is any ultimate reality at all, can hardly be said to have a belief which makes for cheerfulness. Mr. Trevelyan believes, we think, a great deal more than this, and is fully entitled to his cheerfulness so far as his conception of God is concerned. A man may decline to make a positive intellectual affirmation about the personality of God, and yet have a partly unconscious faith in good and a very earnest faith in truth. Anyone who, like Mr. Trevelyan, has this, cannot be adequately described as an Agnostic.

When Mr. Trevelyan turns from God to the soul and deals with the influence of a disbelief in immortality on optimism, he is more definite. He admits that "the denial of personal immortality goes a long way towards destroying optimism, but he asserts that life is still worth living even if death ends all, and that enthusiasm and joy are still possible." We entirely agree with him in both statements, but we believe that the enthusiasm and joy which a man may retain in the face of expected annihilation is due to a latent faith in God, which finds expression in love for others, in a spirit of renunciation on behalf of some mysterious divine purpose, and in a deep religious confidence in goodness and truth. It is because Mr. Trevelyan has all this that he can retain his enthusiasm and joy.

He makes a very curious statement when he says, "I have never felt the slightest desire to be condemned to my own company through eternal æons.'' Few of the culprits even in Dante's hell were condemned to solitary confinement, and there is no reason to suppose that such solitude would be our condition in heaven. If Mr. Trevelyan means he can find no trace in himself of any desire for continued life beyond the grave, we venture to say—however arrogant it may sound—that he does not know himself. Many of our deepest desires and affections are unknown to ourselves. That any man except, perhaps, in a condition of great pain or misery, when faced with imminent death for himself or one he loves, should really wish for annihilation, is to us inconceivable. We may think we should not mind, or even think that we should like it, in one of our argumentative and lighter moods, but when some great experience of death or sorrow reveals us to ourselves, we know better, we feel the longing for eternal life, which, whether it is to be granted or not, is an ineradicable instinct of humanity. Mr. Trevelyan's article, like all we have read of his writings, is full of moral energy and intellectual force.

Dr. Moffat has hitherto been known to readers of the Hibbert Journal as a distinguished New Testament scholar. From his little Scotch manse at Dundonald he writes books and articles which have a European reputation. Now he comes before us in another role and gives us a study of George Meredith's religious teaching, which is in some ways the ablest and most interesting article in the present number of the Hibbert Journal. "Nature" is Mr. Meredith's "central word." "It dominates the entire field of his judgments upon ethics and religion. But it denotes far more than mere scenery, or even the sum of phenomena." Nature to him "is not the rich background from which Wordsworth saw influences streaming down into man's responsiveness, nor is she the Nature 'red in tooth and claw' from which Tennyson recoiled. Her note is not the calm and balm which Matthew Arnold loved to set over against the fretful days of man. Much less is she the sum of things and events, or the rounded order of the universe which Whitman hailed. To Meredith, her presence is at once more intimate and august. His Nature is living, radiant, and vital. The stimulus of discipline rather than tranquillity is her vocation, for man is part of her, and man's growth is her end." Nature is "neither dust and chance, nor do-as-you-please, but an upward process of evolution for humanity. A worship of passion and mere instinct? Never! Life according to Nature is for man a good, glad fight—

"A warfare but begun;
Unending; with no power to interpose;
* * * * *
God being there while he his fight maintains:
Throughout his mind the Master Mind being there."

Mr. Meredith has long been recognised as our greatest living novelist. The virility of his characters, the brilliance of his wit, his insight into human nature, his tenderness half-concealed by rugged humour, have won the admiration and reverence of thousands of his countrymen. He does not often deal directly with religious problems. But a religious conception of man and the universe is implicit in all his work. Dr. Moffat has done us a real service by drawing attention to the religious teaching of Meredith, and by sending us back once again to the novels and poems in which so bracing and uplifting a gospel of the divine meaning of life is to be found.

We should like to have referred to the very interesting article of the Rev. J. A. Hutton on "Is the Age of Faith Returning?" It is one of that type of article which the Hibbert Journal, and the Hibbert Journal almost alone, has provided. It deals with the movement of liberal religious thought.

Nothing is more striking than the testimony brought together by the Hibbert Journal from representatives of all the churches to the deep dissatisfaction with the present condition of the churches, and the firm conviction that we are on the eve of some far-reaching reformation. That reformation will not be brought about by any one denomination, Unitarian or Trinitarian. This Messianic hope, as it may be called, this hope of a new life, a new spirit, a larger unity, is gaining strength in the minds of many men of various creeds. Nowhere has this witness to the longing for a wider faith, a truer catholicity, found so full an expression as in the pages of the Hibbert Journal. The ardent hopes, the brave confidence in man and in religion shown by such men as Mr. Hutton, must give new strength to all who are waiting for the dawn, and who desire a fellowship in worship deeper than doctrine or ritual. The trustees, who partly support the journal, exist for the promotion of Christianity in its simplest and most intelligible form. They may well look with satisfaction and gladness at such articles as Mr. Hutton's, which are preparing the way for a religious communion wider than any denomination, inspired by the personality and based upon the teaching of Jesus Christ.

THE SOCIAL VALUE OF HOOLIGANS.

In the right hands a young hooligan timely caught is a gift from the gods, but like other of the divine gifts offered with broad impartiality to just and unjust, apt to prove troublesome and disconcerting if not accepted in seemly fashion. The circumstances which evoked the judgment here quoted are an illustration of the potential vice and virtue of the hooligan. When we add that the high appreciation of his innate worth comes from Mr. J. G. Legge, the Inspector of Reformatories, it will be seen that it is no hastily formed opinion, for there are few if any in the country with better authority on this subject than he.

The events which led up to the reflection on the divine origin of the hooligan seem at first sight to suggest a less cheery thought. In a certain county reformatory (the name and particulars may be found in the Annual Report on Reformatory Schools) the reins of government had fallen loose. The Superintendent had been in failing health, and, on the morrow of his departure on sick leave, all pretence of discipline vanished. The boys broke up the school windows, their breakfast bowls, and the vegetables in the garden. The only symbol of authority to which any respect was paid was the clogs of the bigger boys. The masters were defied, the police were booed at, work was neglected, and parties of boys wandered in and out and over the country side at will. It is worth noting, however, that very little damage was done in the neighbouring villages. After a short interregnum a new Superintendent, one "who understood boys," appeared, and within a few hours the ringleaders were removed, discipline was restored, and the boys were peaceably playing at cricket. And these ringleaders? They were placed separately in other reformatories, and, almost without exception, they "have done remarkably well."

In a word, it lay in the handling of them to make of these lads noxious criminals, or to discover them as "a gift from the gods." If that be so, then it is so just because even in their most mutinous disorder there lurked a soul of good, nay, in a sense, their outrage of decorum was itself good. It was evidence at least of human energy, of initiative, of great resolve stirring in the heart of them to be themselves, qualities these, which, rightly guided, are of quite priceless worth to a community.

On the whole we make poor use of this strong raw material of citizenship. If we get the hooligan into reformatory or industrial school, we do often turn out a not discreditable man or woman; but, except under these circumstances, we neglect him very sadly and disastrously. For one thing we call him opprobrious names, him or her, for not infrequently the hooligan is a girl, just the type known to antiquity as the Amazon. The hooligan in Greek marble we prize greatly; the Amazon in the slum, ah! well. Properly understood, the name hooligan is a name of honour, and the hooligan has a social function of some importance to fulfil.

It is commonly charged against the poor that they lack initiative, take things dully as they come, allow themselves to be crushed by their surroundings, are, e.g., dirty, because of some difficulty of keeping clean. The hooligan is a living testimony of the presence of initiative. We may not care for the precise choice he makes, even though it be no worse than that of hustling us off the pavement laid down out of a rate which we pay and he doesn't. And little he care for our care. What he chooses he performs, what he would be, he is. It is not easy to coerce the hooligan, it is not hard to influence him. He rarely cares chiefly about the form of his exercise. He is probably not welded to the pursuit of braining you in the street if you provide him with a gymnasium; only he has force to work off, and he must work it off somehow. Now, this force that the hooligan possesses, sometimes in inconvenient measure, is an index of a vast power which lies latent in the "masses," but which so often in the respectable members of those masses has been crushed and squandered. Think of the great multitude of boys and girls sent out from our schools each year. Some will be humdrum enough, we shall rarely hear of them, and never think of them. This mediocre crowd reaches out at the lower limit to those defective in vitality, semi-idiots, it may be, or marked for early death. At the other extreme we find those in whom the life energy is in excess—in excess, at all events, of the callings to which these elementary school children are called. Of these, are the hooligans. Mark them well as an index of forces widespread through all the unnotable mass. In the hooligan it is so mighty, that in spite of all restraints it will express itself, but it is present in different degrees in them all. Let the few hooligans who would "take heaven by force," remind us of the very many in whom are impulses bereft of aim.

Society is indebted to the hooligan in another manner. He is an incarnate protest against the benumbing influence of his environment. Boys leave school too young, or certainly they become wage-earners too soon, for when the lad draws his wages he ceases to be a boy. He grows too thoughtful, calculates his chances, has over fateful consequences forced on him and his resolves. The insouciance flees. He is of age to play at life in such a way that he can still be naughty, and the consequences yet be slight, or of age to have leisure to come to himself body and soul. These careless activities, and these all-important self-realisations are thwarted and obscured. And in this way countless boys are lost to noble manhood. They know not what they are losing; they have not, perhaps, the force of character to wrest it in spite of circumstances. They fetch and carry, and tie and scribble at command. Well might they live at an alien command. Not all, it is true; but such is the terse history of many boys. Now, the hooligan will not yield to alien pressure. He is quite sure his end is something other than to wash dirty beer bottles. What his real end may be he is ignorant, and it is worth while that we should help him to understand. If we fail to do this it is at least matter for gratitude that he will choose wrongly rather than be denied all choice.

Are we not in very deed making miserable misuse of our manhood and womanhood? It ought not to be so difficult as it is for a poor youth to be a character, without being what we call a bad character; nor would it be so were it not for the fact that the creation of character is in the nature of a by-product. At school knowledge is first, and character second; at the technical institute skill is first, and character second; in business the production of profit is first and character nowhere. The need for self-expression is neglected. We might learn a lesson here from the sphere of industry. Again and again a product which had been regarded as a waste product has been found to possess value, to be indeed, more valuable than the main product (e.g., various coal by-products). There is such a human waste product, the value of which we shall ultimately discover. Everywhere youth is craving to be itself, to give expression to its powers. Even of grown men and women this is true, but of youth much more so; and these unused powers are many and varied. There is much instruction to be found in that practice of William Morris, who took on any lad who applied, and found that almost every common boy had it in him to become an artistic workman. For the most part the opportunity is not offered; also, for the most part, when the way is not obviously open to a boy to develop freely and normally his indwelling, yet immature, possibility, he accepts the denial quietly and lives always unevolved. This the hooligan will not do. He is the divine postman knocking to deliver a claim of right from those forced by society to be and remain, less than they were made to be, and might be if they were not hindered.

A VEGETARIAN BANQUET.

THE Hon. Rollo Russell, in a volume upon "Strength and Diet," reviewed in our columns last week, came to the conclusion, after much research, scientific and historical, that a diet from which flesh is excluded is the best for health. Nor on that ground alone did Mr. Russell uphold such an opinion. We are interested now in asking what particular aliments Mr. Russell would recommend for persons like ourselves, situated in a climate like our own? What shall we eat and drink, to put the question bluntly? Mr. Russell provides his book with an appendix that meets the emergency; an appendix, to be more explicit, designed for the use of "persons desiring to adopt an improved dietary, with the object of increasing strength and efficiency." From this appendix we take the following suggestions, which Mr. Russell advises us to use with discretion:—

"Children do well on milk, porridge, good bread and butter; potatoes or rice or maize, with refined olive oil; sugar in moderate amount; some fruit and vegetables, and cold water between meals. Each of the following are alone quite sufficient for healthy development, and would maintain the young generation at a high level of strength.:—

"(1) Oatmeal or wheatmeal porridge, milk, sugar, some bread and butter, some vegetables or fruit.

"(2) Rice, macaroni, or maize, with butter or oil; brown bread, cheese or nuts, or almonds, sugar, milk, some green vegetables occasionally, or fruit.

"(3) Oatmeal, bread and butter, or rice; fish or flesh (a little); milk, sugar, some fruit or nuts occasionally."

The fare of a household, Mr. Russell arranges, for the sake of example, as follows (articles in brackets are unnecessary additions):—

"Breakfast.—Oatmeal or other porridge. Toast, cocoa, or water, or milk with a dash of coffee or tea. (Eggs or fruit, pine kernels or almonds. Marmalade or apple jelly. Various fancy breads. Fish.).

"Luncheon or Dinner.—Lentil, pea, bean, celery or potato soup. Spaghetti or macaroni au gratin, or risotto, with grated cheese or lentil sauce, or rice with tomatoes, or semolina, or butter, or Yorkshire pudding, or polenta with olive oil, or savouries of some pulse, vegetables and herbs, or potatoes roasted, steamed, fried, or creamy, with sauce, or baked beans with tomato sauce, or pie of vegetables (Irish stew), with wholemeal crust; or melted cheese on toast (Welsh rarebit), bread and raisin pudding, or rice in some form, or any plain or sweet pudding, or stewed apples, prunes, figs, pears, apricots, plums, peaches, blackberries, cherries, strawberries, raspberries, gooseberries, greengages. Fancy breads, rusks, biscuits, nuts, almonds, raisins.

"Dinner or Supper.—Some of the lighter articles of the above, some savoury dish or pudding, or else wholemeal bread, or toast and butter, vegetables, thin cocoa or lime juice or water. If this is the principal meal of the day it may approximate to that given for luncheon.

"Either plenty of porridge and milk, or else wholemeal bread, or some cheese, almonds, nuts, or other proteid or plasmon food, should be brought into every day. Lentils, beans, and peas, are highly nourishing, but should be used sparingly.

"For everybody it is a mistake and wasteful of energy to drink at meals; the time for drinking is about three or four hours after, or one hour before.

"Probably the best plan is to make a light repast in the morning, and evening, and a larger one between one and three."

MUSINGS.

BY A MINISTER.

XXV.

Sometimes, after week-day service, when the worshippers are gone, I watch for a dreamy moment or two the coming and going of Mr. Tozer. Mr. Tozer is the dean's verger. In dusky robe he glides from aisle to aisle, treading, but not disturbing, the dust of centuries, a monitor of silence in a dim and shadowy world.

A world not easy to explain. Western piety is tolerant, and gives privilege of sanctuary to many things. Here, before the altar, lies a wild king's tomb; here hang the banners of unholy war; here are chantries without priests, shrines without suppliants, images of saints whom no one invokes, tracings of legends which no one repeats. To Mr. Tozer there is nothing within these walls which is not sacred, no part which is not congruous with the whole. His catholic spirit rebukes my protestant mind. He knows nothing of Reformations and other dividing dates.

At what point in the duration of things the hallowing power of antiquity begins is not so easily said. If I scratched my name on pillar or seat, Mr. Tozer would look upon the act as a deed of shame; yet there are scrawled initials of some two hundred years' date, to which he points with pride, and effacement would now be the crime.

Nor is it easy to say where the line of reverence should be drawn. One hot day, in a church I know, a little Italian boy fell asleep upon the pavement, his hurdy-gurdy unbound beside him. Mr. Tozer would have drawn the line at hurdy-gurdies, if not at sleeping boys. Is it not written in the guide-book that "the nave and south aisle were formerly used as a thoroughfare to the close; but, this being an abuse, a passage was opened outside"? Thus the proprieties were saved, but how many passing pieties were lost! For myself, I am inclined to lean to established abuse, and to think that decorum is not always devotion, and that the laxity of common use, as in Italy, may go with reverence, but I dare not say this to Mr. Tozer, for to him propriety is piety in its holiest form.

Children, I am told, are sometimes taken by their teachers, a class at a time, to art galleries and museums. I wonder whether they are ever so taken to cathedrals and parish churches? What object-lessons might here be found! Here is history's own writing, bearing all the marks of time, hewn and carved in wood and stone, and wrought and cast in metal—tracery and moulding, shaft and panel, sign and symbol, effigy and scroll. Historic figures pass before the eye—prophets and saints and kings, apostles and martyrs, founders and benefactors, knights and crusaders. Here are the records of peace and learning and gentle deeds and homely virtues. Memorials of moral greatness are seldom public monuments; they stand away from public places, and must be diligently studied in crumbling masonry, faded inscriptions, and sometimes in ruined sites. Sunt hic etiam sua præmia laudi.

I like to think of the schooling given through their work to the workers themselves. The mediæval church as the promoter of local craft, the cherisher of native skill, encouraging and training taste and feeling, even in the humblest dwellers in lonely places—I am not sure that this is a matter which has ever been sufficiently considered. I am sure it was not sufficiently considered when Henry and his vicar-general set their commission to work. Deletion, not correction, was the order of the day. Walls were pulled down, buildings unroofed, treasures of art destroyed, not so much to stop corruption, or to check superstition, as to spite the pope. Then came the visitation under Somerset, and now the parish churches were not spared, and the reign of whitewash and staring transparency began. Rural England has not yet got back the love of form and colour, and the pride of workmanship which once made corporate ownership a common joy.

But even in ashes live wonted fires. The townsman of to-day, I doubt not, leaning over his counter, still feels the quiet influence of the grey towers, within whose shadows he was born, and hears with ears unconsciously attuned the soothing chimes which rouse the jackdaws from their windy nooks. The things we least heed often educate us most.

Now and then a time-worn figure drops from its place of honour on the West Front, and some day the verger's corner will know him no more. But a blessing rests upon his office—office more ancient than that of bishop or dean—a blessing turned into a chant for bishops and deans to sing: Eligo frequentare limen—"I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of ungodliness." There is no irony so exquisite as the irony of religion. Detraxit potentes e thronis—"He hath put down the mighty from their seat, and hath exalted the humble and meek." We are not always true to the words we sing, but it is good that they should be proclaimed and upheld.

HYMNS IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

A TEACHER in an elementary school in Essex sends us the following note:—

"May I through your columns call the attention of Unitarian friends to the accompanying hymns, and ask whether they can approve of their being taught in our elementary schools (a) to Unitarian children or (b) by Unitarian teachers? As one of the latter it seems to me impossible.

"The hymns, verses of which are quoted, are among those forwarded to schools under the Essex County Council; and I was yesterday informed that it would be necessary to teach them in due order to the children, who would repeat the words after me. Previously the children sang the hymns as given out from the headmaster's desk, which arrangement at least lessened my responsibility.

"There are 74 hymns, and parts of some 23 of these appear to me unsuitable for deliberate repetition; even though oneself were able in some cases to appreciate them with mental reservations.

Perhaps others, teaching elsewhere, would give their experience of the new regulations. Surely the public ought to be enlightened as to what is going on in our schools."

The following are verses from some of the hymns, numbered—

To Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,
The God whom heaven and earth adore.

(3)

All praise and thanks to God
The Father now be given,
The Son, and Him Who reigns
With them in highest heaven;
The One Eternal God,
Whom earth and heaven adore.

He came down to earth from heaven,
Who is God and Lord of all,
And His shelter was a stable,
And His cradle was a stall.

Jesus loves me! He Who died
Heaven's gate to open wide;
He will wash away my sin,
Let His little child come in.

He died that we might be forgiven,
He died to make us good,
That we might go at last to heaven,
Saved by His precious blood.

There was no other good enough
To pay the price of sin,
He only could unlock the gate
Of heaven and let us in.

(48)

For the sheep He bled,
Every lamb is sprinkled
With the blood He shed.

Glory to the Father, glory to the Son,
And to Thee, blest Spirit, whilst all ages run.

THE sermon preached by the Rev. J. J. Wright before the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire last June has now been published, and will, we trust, be widely read. We shall call further attention to it next week. Mr. Walter Brooks, of Ainsworth, writes to suggest that the authorities might also publish in similar form the address by Mr. Mackie, of Burnley, on "What should Unitarians seek first?"

REST assured, obstinacy is not strength. Wilfulness is the cheapest attribute of the scoundrel. Weakness and wilfulness almost always go together. But the power of will in a righteous cause is the consecrated sword which the Lord puts in the hands of His angels. Love is strong, holiness is strong, wisdom is strong.—P. C. Mozoomdar.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Chester.—The congregation of Matthew Henry's Chapel have erected a brass tablet to the memory of the late Sir T. G. Frost. The work has been satisfactorily carried out by Mr. Warrington. The tablet has been placed in situ by the kindness of Mr. Robert Hargreaves, who also made the frame for it. It bears the following inscription: "Erected by members and friends to the memory of Sir Thomas Gibbons Frost, Knight. Born September 20, 1820; died April 6, 1904. Thrice Mayor of this City, a lifelong member of this Chapel, and for 62 years one of its trustees. Requiescat in Pace."—The Sunday-school anniversary and flower services were held on July 23, conducted by the Rev. J. Morley Mills, of Bootle. The flowers were afterwards sent to the Infirmary and Wrexham-road Children's Home.

Floweryfield, Hyde.—The annual flower services were held on Sunday, July 16, the Rev. F. W. Turland preaching morning and evening, and special music was rendered by the choir.

Ilkeston and Loughborough.—On the first Sunday in the month the Rev. W. H. Burgess began his new duties under the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association in connection with these two places by preaching the Sunday-school anniversary sermons at Loughborough. The choir and Sunday scholars rendered special music. On the following Saturday the annual school treat was held at Woodhouse under favourable conditions. Last Sunday the Sunday-school sermons were preached at Ilkeston afternoon and evening. The Ilkeston chapel is much improved by its recent cleaning and painting. The little company of scholars heartily sang the hymns learnt under the instruction of Mr. T. Griffin.

Newport, Isle of Wight: (Appointment).—The Rev. H. M. Livens, formerly minister at Brighton, who has recently accepted the pastorate of the Unitarian Christian Church, Newport, has now fully entered upon his ministerial duties.

Windermere.—The first of the summer services for this season was held in the Institute at eleven o'clock last Sunday. There was an encouraging attendance. The preacher was the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst, of Gateacre. Next Sunday the Rev. James Ruddle, of Chorlton, Manchester, will officiate.

CHARGING the Grand Jury at Durham Assizes the other day, Mr. Justice Grantham said he could not congratulate them on any diminution of crime in the county, but there were some features of the criminal statistics which he thought very favourable indeed, and which he hoped would before very long have a material effect in the diminution of crime in the county. A great deal of crime was attributable to drunkenness, and it was very satisfactory that there was a very considerable diminution of drunkenness in the county. He believed that it was because the police had looked after the public-houses better, and had proceeded against publicans who really were the cause of these cases because of not exercising sufficient care—either themselves or their servants—in refusing drink to men who had had more than enough. At last they seemed to have wakened up to their responsibility. He was glad to be able to congratulate the publicans of the country upon having assisted the police in reducing this dreadful curse of drunkenness.

THE taint of prayer is distraction, the taint of preaching is affectation, the taint of domesticity is suspicion; and unreality is the taint of all things.—P. C. Mozoomdar.

BEDFORD COLLEGE FOR WOMEN (University of London).—The Council held a reception on Wednesday, July 19, to which were invited the foreign teachers attending the holiday course arranged by the University of London. Teachers from Austria (6), Denmark (14), Finland (3), France (10), Germany (40), Holland (8), Italy (1), Japan (2), Norway (1), Russia (2), Sweden (17), Switzerland (3), were present and were received by the following members of the College—Mrs. James Bryce, Mrs. Ayrton, and Mrs. Waller. The College libraries and laboratories were thrown open. A musical entertainment was preceded by a short speech of welcome by Miss Henrietta Busk in the name of the Council. About 200 guests were present, and the following legations were represented:—Japan, Portugal, China, and letters of regret at absence were received from many foreign embassies, legations, and diplomatic agencies. The Council have appointed Miss Anna Lamberg, Final Honours Upsala, to be resident librarian. The Reid scholarship in arts of the value of £31 10s. for the first year and £28 10s. for the two following years has been awarded to Miss K. M. Curtis, of the North London Collegiate School, and the Arnott scholarship in science of the value of £48 for three years has been awarded to Miss E. M. Stokes of Dame Alice Owen's Girls' School. The Council offer a scholarship of £20 for one year for the course of secondary training beginning in October, 1905. The scholarship will be awarded to the best candidate holding a degree or its equivalent in arts or science. Applications should reach the head of the training department not later than September 18. The Bedford College Hygiene Diploma has been awarded to H. Bideleux, S. M. Houchen, M. Neatby, M. Sheepshanks, and M. A. M. Stacy.

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH,
NARBOROUGH ROAD, LEICESTER.

Minister: Rev. GERTRUD VON PETZOLD, M.A.

The Committee of this Church now appeal with confidence to Unitarian and Liberal Christian friends throughout the country and ask their assistance in removing the balance of the debt that has weighed upon them heavily for the last four years. It was incurred by the building of the Church and Hall, consequent on the removal of the congregation from Wellington-street to a new suburban district, where a vigorous new life has been infused into their work.

At the present time large congregations are being attracted under the ministry of the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, M.A., and the principles of Liberal Christianity are being brought prominently before the whole town of Leicester, great interest being aroused thereby generally.

The cost of the buildings, £4,360, has been attacked with great vigour by the congregation and friends, the result of their efforts being the substantial reduction of £3,466, which is, however, inclusive of £1,476 realised by the sale of the old property. The most recent effort has been a subscription, amounting to £238, by members of the Church, who, having thus made all the sacrifice within their power, feel justified in asking for a practical expression of sympathy from supporters of the general cause.

Towards the remaining balance the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have promised the last £100.

SYDNEY UNITARIAN CHURCH.

The members of the HYDE PARK UNITARIAN CHURCH, SYDNEY, N.S.W., have arranged to hold a BAZAAR next September, in order to wipe out a portion of the debt by which they are hampered in their task.

The congregation is now united and harmonious, under the ministry of the Rev. GEORGE WALTERS, who occupied the pulpit for the ten years from 1888 to 1898, and who returned to the same, after an interval of five years and one month, in 1903.

When Mr. Walters and his congregation returned to the Hyde Park Church, they found themselves morally responsible for a pressing debt of £250 in addition to the £300 still due upon the building. It is in the none-too-easy task of liquidating this, or some portion of it, that they now venture to solicit the sympathy and help of Unitarians in England, and elsewhere.

This appeal has the approval of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, who have promised assistance.

Donations may be sent to the Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, 10, De Grey-terrace, Leeds; or to Rev. W. C. BOWIE, Essex Hall, Strand, London, W.C.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Editor requests that during August all correspondence may be sent to the Office of THE INQUIRER, and not to his private address.

DURING the present week the Rev. M. J. Savage, D.D., of New York, who is to preach the English sermon at the International Meetings at Geneva, has been in London, with Mrs. Savage, and Mrs. Hackley, the munificent founder of the Hackley School, in New York State, which corresponds among our American brethren to Willaston in this country. The Hon. Samuel J. Barrows, formerly editor of the Christian Register, and the Rev. Julian C. Jaynes, of West Newton, Mass., have already passed through London, bound ultimately for Geneva; and we hear of other American delegates already on the Continent, including Professor F. G. Peabody, of Harvard, President Franklin C. Southworth, of Meadville, the Rev. C. E. St. John, secretary of the American Unitarian Association, and the Rev. Charles W. Wendte, secretary of the International Council.

AT our Whitsuntide anniversary meetings this year we had hoped to welcome once more that venerable poet-preacher of the Liberal Faith in Iceland, Matthias Jochumsson. Being in Copenhagen on Government business, Mr. Jochumsson fully intended to come to England, but was prevented by circumstances which obliged him to go straight home by way of Norway. He reached Akureyri on June 21, much refreshed by the voyage, but still feeling somewhat the burden of his years. Mr. Jochumsson is a Foreign Correspondent of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and writing to the Secretary from Akureyri on July 10, he repeated the message of cordial greeting and of thanks to his Unitarian friends in England, which he sent at Whitsuntide. "My best comfort," he says, "is the consciousness that endeavour to promote liberal religion in my country has not been in vain, even though conditions here forbid self-supporting Unitarian congregations." Mr. Jochumsson has made a translation of the "Book of Daily Strength," published six years ago by the Association, and hopes to bring it out before the end of the year.

MANY friends will join with the Swansea congregation in congratulating their minister, the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, on the successful termination of his studies at the University of Jena, which, through their considerate kindness, and a grant from the Hibbert Trust, he has been able to pursue during a part of each of the past three years. Mr. Jones, last Saturday, successfully passed the examination for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy, and his Dissertation, written in German, on "The Idea of Personality in the English Thinkers of the Present," received the commendation "excellent" from Professor Eucken.

THE holiday schools in London have been opened this week. At the pioneer school at the Passmore Edwards' Settlement in Tavistock-place over 500 children came on the first morning, and as it was fine the classes were held out in the garden. Basket-making, needlework, painting, clay-modelling, and story-telling were among the pleasant occupations provided, and for the babies a sand-pit was arranged. Of the carpentering the Daily News tells a story of Mrs. Humphry Ward's of last year's experience. "A rough-looking little chap came in and hung round a bit, and finally made up his mind that he would like to try his hand at carpentering. There being a vacancy, he was given the opportunity, and with a few tools and some pieces of wood was shown how to begin on a simple model. Presently he threw down his too's in disgust. 'This ain't play, this is work, and I'm goin'.' However, he remained looking on, and the teacher said nothing. In a short time he had taken up his tools and started again, and when an hour afterwards the bell announced the hour for closing he became quite sulky, and said in an injured tone, ''Tain't time for shutting up yet!' He was at the school next day a half hour before the time for opening, and remained a regular and docile scholar."

A MEMORIAL to the late Archbishop Temple was unveiled last Saturday by his successor in Canterbury Cathedral. The memorial, which occupies a bay in the Corona, at the extreme east of the cathedral, represents the Archbishop as kneeling at a prayer desk, and it has an oak canopy over the grey marble. The inscription is as follows:—

FREDERICK TEMPLE.
Bishop of Exeter, 1869.
Bishop of London, 1885.
Archbishop of Canterbury, 1896-1902.
Strong and tender-hearted, he served and ruled in the fear of God and in the love of Christ. He lived through the reigns of William IV. and Victoria, and crowned Edward VII.

In his address at the unveiling, Archbishop Davidson said of Dr. Temple that God had undoubtedly given him powers of the highest order, but his greatness, after all, consisted in the indomitable purposes, lofty aims, persistent industry, and above all the pure, straightforward simplicity with which he applied those powers to the furtherance of his Master's kingdom upon earth.

LAST week's Guardian published a Cambridge memorial to the Archbishops on the subject of the Athanasian Creed. The terms of the address were as follows:—

"We, the undersigned resident members "of the Senate of the University of Cam-"bridge, being communicant members of "the Church of England, while we fully "recognise the value of the statement "of the doctrines of the Trinity and "the Incarnation contained in Quicunque "Vult, beg leave respectfully to express "to your Graces our conviction that the "so-called damnatory clauses, taken in "their plain meaning, go beyond the "warrant of Scripture and are a grave "offence to the consciences of a large "and increasing number of loyal Church-"men, and that therefore the presence "of these clauses in a Creed which is "recited in public worship and the im-"position of them upon candidates for "Holy Orders constitute a great and "growing danger to the Church. We "earnestly request your Graces to take "such measures as may seem good to "you, with as little delay as possible, "to remove this danger."

The address was signed by 92 names, about half of laymen and half in Holy Orders. Among them were Dr. Butler,

Master of Trinity, Dr. F. H. Chase (Bishop-designate of Ely), Professor Gwatkin, Professor Jebb, M.P., the Master of Pembroke, the Master of Selwyn, the Master of Christ's; the President of Magdalene, Professor Skeat, Professor Stanton, and Dr. Ward, Master of Peterhouse. Fifty-seven of these, whose names were starred, added further to the memorial, "that it is not expedient "that the Quicunque Vult, even without "the damnatory clauses, should be "recited in public worship."

ANOTHER memorial, published this week, is signed by 18 Deans of Cathedrals and Collegiate Churches within the Provinces of Canterbury and York, including the Deans of Westminster, Ely, Ripon, and Christ Church (Oxford). It expresses "respectful appreciation of the "efforts made by the spiritual rulers of "the Church towards solving the problem "of how to maintain unimpaired the "statement of the Catholic faith in the "Athanasian Creed, and at the same "time to relieve the consciences of very "many loyal and devout Churchmen, "who are bound to recite, or to hear "recited, in the public services of the "Church what are known as the con"demnatory clauses affixed to the Creed "in question; which clauses 'in their "'primâ facie meaning and in the mind "'of many who hear them convey a "'more unqualified statement than Scrip"'ture warrants, and one which is not "'consonant with the language of the "'greatest teachers of the Church'"; and concludes with the earnest trust that the Archbishops will find a way to "preserve in its entirety the statement "of the Catholic faith in the Athanasian "Creed, and at the same time remove "the burden which presses so sorely upon "the consciences of a very large number "of Churchmen to whom the Catholic "faith is most precious."

"THE Book of the Cheap Cottages Exhibition" is published for the committee at the office of The County Gentleman, 4 and 5, Dean-street, High Holborn, W.C., and costs a shilling. It contains a complete catalogue of the exhibition at Letchworth, Garden City, the opening of which by the Duke of Devonshire we noted last week. There are articles also on the origin of the exhibition and Garden City and Cottage Building Problems, and a most interesting series of drawings and plans of the cottages. Other illustrations include a portrait of the Duke of Devonshire, as frontispiece, and another of Mr. St. Loe Strachey, editor of the Spectator (from The World's Work and Play), to whom the original idea of the exhibition is due. The July number of The Garden City, the official organ of the Garden City Association, a threepenny monthly, published by the Garden City Press, Ltd., Hitchin, is a Cottage Exhibition number. A penny booklet, "Garden City in the Making," issued from the same press, has much interesting information and some charming illustrations.

AN article in the Spectator of July 22, on the Cheap Cottages Exhibition, concluded as follows:—"If anyone supposes that a cheap cottage must necessarily be ugly, let him go down to Letchworth and find out his mistake. Since some of the foremost British architects are showing work of their own at the Exhibition, it is almost superfluous to show that the best of the work is as good as it can be. But what will possibly surprise many is the high average maintained in the design of the cottages: in the homeliness and charm of the lines of roofs and windows, and gables, and chimneys, and doors. Here, if anywhere, is a village not simply of so many houses, but of so many homes. And the visitor, leaving behind him that homely village deep in the Hertfordshire summer, sees in his mind's eye other villages springing up by other English commons and roads; each cottage with its strip of garden, bright with hollyhocks and green with simple fruits; the cottage kitchens brightened by men and women with children to send into the fields after their fathers. In that picture he sees, or thinks he sees, the solution of one of the greatest, if not the greatest, of the problems affecting the health and the population of the essentially agricultural people to whom he belongs. The short way with physical deterioration is to live in the country; but you cannot live in the country without a house to live in."

THE public lecture given at the opening of the session at Manchester College, Oxford, in October, 1904, by Dr. Edwin Odgers, Hibbert Lecturer in Ecclesiastical History, was published at the end of the session (H. Rawson & Co., New Brown street, Manchester). "Some Points in the Study of Early Christian Life in Relation to its Surroundings" was the subject, and to the lecture as printed three pages of "notes and references" have been added. In reporting the lecture at the time of its delivery, we drew attention to the great interest and value of the series of illustrations it furnished of the conditions of religious life in the Pagan world in which Christianity first had to make its way.

AMONG the notes added by Dr. Odgers to his lecture is one on "Syncretism," a word for which, he says in the lecture (p. 10), we are indebted to Plutarch, and which is useful as denoting "religious fusion and recasting." The note is as follows:—"The history of the word syncretism is curious. Plutarch explains it to mean an alliance after the manner of the Cretans, i.e., merely on the ground of policy, as for example, the joining of two powers hitherto unfriendly in face of a common danger. (De fraterno amore, c. 19.) The word was revived in this sense by Erasmus, and so used by the Reformers, e.g., by Bucer, of Lutherans and Zwinglians making common cause against Rome. The notion of concilation or effacement of differences on the ground of mere expediency appears to have been dropped in modern usage, and the word is now generally used to mean conflation of beliefs. On Syncretism, considered as the formation of a common stock of religious and ethical ideas, and the relation of this to early Christianity, see the excellent summary in A. Harnack's Mission und Ausbreitung, &c., pp. 20-24. (Eng trs., The Expansion of Christianity, Vol. I., pp. 33-39.)" This note will perhaps answer Mr. Cobden Smith's question in THE INQUIRER of July 22, with reference to the "Musing" of the previous week.

THE Examiner recently chose as text for an outspoken leader, the rumour that a Cambridge scientist has succeeded in effecting spontaneous generation. Our contemporary expressed no opinion on the amount of foundation the rumour may possess. But the coolness with which it accepts the probability that even if the thing has not been done, it yet will be accomplished, is in refreshing contrast with the nervous precipitancy with which religious journals have met the announcements of scientific discovery in the past. The position of the Congregational organ is expressed in these words:—"As time goes on, our ideas as to the physical origin and basis of life must necessarily grow, and changes in them have very little to do with our religious conceptions. Religion deals with life not as physical merely, but in its larger relations as ethical and spiritual." At the same time it is recognised that the extreme materialistic claims must gravely affect the expression of faith. But supposing the extreme claim substantiated, the Examiner has yet no fear, and takes the occasion to give a warning to its more conservative readers:—"According to "some theorists the Bible has said the "last word not only on theology, but on "history and science as well; and any"thing which seems to conflict with "Scripture, must be ruled out as dan"gerous error. Even where this idea is "not accepted in its entirety, the in"fluence of it is still strong, and causes "men to look with suspicion and dislike "on scientific discovery of all kinds. "It has been a grievous injury to "theology and even to religion that they "should have been identified in so many "minds with untenable intellectual "positions."

THE July number of the Theologisch Tijdschrift opens with an article by Professor Oort, of Leiden, on "The Liberal Movement in the English Church." Referring at the outset to the first number of the Liberal Churchman, and Canon Hensley Henson's books, "Sincerity and Subscription" and "The Value of the Bible and other Sermons." Professor Oort notes the significance of the formation of the Churchmen's Union for the advancement of liberal religious thought, and the strong pleas which are now made for greater freedom within the Church; but then goes on to express his own inability to understand how men holding such convictions can remain bound as they are by he strictly orthodox formularies of their Church. In the same unfortunate position, he points out, are the clergy of the Swedish Church, which is strictly Lutheran, while in the Dutch Reformed Church they are happier, in being no longer a State Church, and having fought through their battle for freedom. At the same time, he adds, the dogmatists are strong also in the Dutch Church. Professor Oort's conclusion is that while evidently liberal thinkers within the creed-bound church are able to reconcile such a position with their own conscience, it is yet more unmistakably evident to anyone who has eyes to see, how every confessional bond takes away the joy of living and working together with brethren of like mind, and turns the blessing of such fellowship into a curse.

In the same number of the Tijdschrift Professor Eerdmans, of Leiden, has an article on "Sins of Intention in the Old Testament," reaffirming a position he took up in a previous article on "The Ten Words" in the Th. Tijdschrift for January, 1903, which had met with criticism, that in the Old Testament there was no counterpart to the later Christian conception of sin, but that in the olden time sin was regarded never as a matter of intention, but of deed. This article is followed by an interesting sketch by Miss G. Hoevers, of the Hague, of a new scheme of religious instruction. The rest of the number is taken up with book notices, Professor K. Lake contributing three short reviews in English.

While the older Theologisch Tijdschrift appears every two months, Teyler's Theologisch Tijdschrift, which is now in its third year, is a quarterly. Thus there is a July number of both reviews. Teyler's for July gives the first place to an article by Dr. H. J. Elhorst on the Maccabeean period of Jewish history. This is followed by an elaborate account of philosophy at the University or Utrecht in the seventeenth century, and then there is an article by Professor Cannegieter, of Utrecht, on the "Mystery of ,the Contradictions in the Spiritual Life of Man," out of which, nevertheless, with all its suffering, which is its glory, emerges the conviction that the life of the soul comes from God, and is in union with God. Book reviews and bibliography complete the number.

Mr. G. F. Millin, from whom we publish another letter this week on "State Interference," is well known as a vigorous writer on social questions. His books on "Life in our Villages," "The Social Horizon," "The Village Problem," and "Evil and Evolution," were followed in the autumn of 1900 by a further study on "Commerce and Christianity," which quickly reached a second edition. Of this we are glad to note that a cheap popular edition is now available (Sonnenschein & Co., 1s.). Writing of this book in the Inquirer of February 9, 1901, the Rev. H. Shaen Solly said it "pleads for the application of religious principles to commercial affairs, and endeavours to show that the only way to do this practically is to adopt the principles of Collectivism or State Socialism. The author points out the tendency to a general breakdown in competition and the establishment of monopoly, and that unless these monopolies are to be intolerable tyrannies, they must be managed by the State." There is much in Mr. Millin's book to stimulate earnest thought, and in its present cheap form it will doubtless find many readers.

We learn with great regret that Miss E. A. Manning, honorary secretary to the National Indian Association, has been compelled by continued ill-health to resign her office. Miss Manning's devoted labours in the cause of education and social progress in India, carried on through a long series of years, have endeared her to all who have that cause at heart, and especially to those Indian students and others visiting England, to whom her house has always been open. All the arduous duties of secretary have devolved upon her since the death of Miss Mary Carpenter in 1877, and for six years previously she had been secretary to the London branch. The Committee have been so fortunate as to obtain the services as honorary secretary of Mrs. T. W. Arnold, a lady of long experience in India, and well known to many in Northern India, to whom all communications relating to the Association should in future be addressed. Mrs. Arnold's address is 31, St. Thomas's Mansions, Westminster Bridge, London, S.E.

Dr. Augustus Samuel Wilkins, Professor of Classical Literature in the University of Manchester, who died at Llandrillo on Wednesday week, at the age of sixty-two, had been closely identified with Owens College and other high educational and social interests in the city since 1869. He belonged to the Congregational body, and having taken a brilliant degree at Cambridge in 1868, was prevented by his nonconformity from obtaining a fellowship at St. John's College, to which he belonged. So it was that he came as Professor of Latin to Manchester. He was a scholar of fine gifts, great teaching power and indomitable energy, a strenuous advocate of the claims of women to higher education, deeply interested in the establishment of a theological faculty in his university, active in many philanthropic movements, and notably at the Ancoats Settlement. He represented the university on the governing body of the Rylands Library and many other public institutions, and took prominent part in the government of the Lancashire Independent College. Three years ago he was obliged by heart trouble to give up his professorship. He bore the deprivation with great courage and cheerfulness, and continued to the end to do what he could.

A Warning.—As a man named Henry Bardsley, of Ashton-under-Lyne, has during the last twelve months on at least four occasions used my name with a view to securing aid of various kinds, I wish to inform our ministers and others that he is known to me only by the same tales he tells them.—William C. Hall.

The essence of ingratitude to God and man is this: what we get we take as a matter of course; what we do not get, even if it be a very small matter, worries our life out of us. It is necessary we should not be able to get a good deal of what we wish that we may learn to be grateful for what we get. It is more important we should be grateful to God than that we should be masters of the whole world.—P. C. Mozoomdar.

LITERATURE.

ABOUT BOOKS.*

By the Rev. E. I. Fripp.

A distinguished man of letters, himself a printer, as well as a poet, once declared, in a moment of righteous indignation against the effects of machinery, that the evils of the modern world were largely due to the invention of printing. Not many of us, I think, will agree with this statement, and perhaps we ought not to take it too seriously; yet if for no other reason than that it was the opinion of William Morris, it deserves our consideration.

He had in mind the losses to culture caused by the substitution of writing for tradition, and then of books for pictures, and again of the cheap and trashy print for the laboriously and lovingly wrought mediæval manuscript.

The first writing was not on paper nor on parchment, nor even on stone, but in the memory. Ancient poets and historians carried their treasures of verse and prose about with them in their hearts, and could call up from their well-trained brains what we now keep on our shelves. I ask you: Is there not a danger of the book-shelf becoming a substitute instead of a help to memory?

Then, in a later age, a book was a rare and a valued possession. It was a work of art, beautiful in its lettering and adornment, the product of the trained and loving hand and the devout spirit, done in quiet hours with tender, reverent care for the advancement of faith and the glory of God. A few weeks ago I was looking at the mediæval volumes in the library of the Convent of St. Mark's, in Florence, and saw the lovely penmanship and exquisite miniature painting of the Dominican friars. Fra Angelico was one of these "brethren" who began as a scribe and a missal-painter and then learned his way to his glorious frescoes. Did you realise that before the destruction of the monasteries there were similar libraries and schools of art at Newstead, Rufford, Welbeck, Worksop, and other places in the neighbourhood of Mansfield?

Reading of course was confined to a few, but this did not mean that the people were kept in ignorance. There is no greater mistake than the common Protestant notion that in the Catholic days the masses were unacquainted with Scripture. They were better taught than they are now, though not by the medium of books. Church walls and altars were covered with pictures illustrating the Bible and the principal scenes in Church history and the lives of the saints. Carvings in the stonework performed the same educational function. The other day I was studying those marvellous sculptures on the west front of the Cathedral of Amiens which are so full of moral and religious teaching that Ruskin entitled his book about them "The Bible of Amiens." But, unhappily, as books multiplied through the invention of printing, painting and sculpture and architecture (the mother of them both) declined. The printed book came in and art went out. Cathedrals ceased to be built, and painters and sculptors worked for the pleasure of private patrons, often satisfying their lower tastes, and for a long time art parted company with religion and righteousness. Books since the Reformation have been the chief instrument of the higher culture of men, and the placing of The Book in the hands of the millions has been its highest achievement. Protestant reverence for books has been at least as widespread and deep as the Catholic. A favourite book in my study is a little treatise on the "Love of Books," by the good Richard of Bury, bishop of Durham in the old Catholic days (from A.D. 1333 to 1345). It was originally written on vellum and had no doubt a very limited circulation—now, owing to printing, it can be had in a pretty form for a shilling. Richard de Bury says many good things of books. "They are our masters," he writes, "who instruct us without rod or ferule, without angry words, even if we lack money and clothes. They are not asleep when we come to them. If you ask them anything they do not refuse you. They do not scold you if you misunderstand them. They do not laugh at you for your ignorance. They alone are liberal and free." He says again: "In books I find the dead as if they were alive"; and again he speaks of war "as more harmful to books than all other plagues." I would like to quote many other passages but only have time for one more. "Ye cannot," he says, "serve books and mammon." Another Catholic writer and lover of books, the author of the famous Imitatio Christi, Thomas a Kempis, said, in days when books were few and sacred, "Take thou a book into thine hands as Simon the Just took the Child Jesus into his arms to carry him and kiss him. And when thou hast finished reading, close the book and give thanks for every word out of the mouth of God; because in the Lord's field thou hast found a hidden treasure." But after books had begun to be printed, and were by the aid of the printing press passing from the hands of scholars into the homes of the people, our Protestant and Puritan John Milton wrote with no less enthusiasm than that of Richard of Bury or Thomas a Kempis, in his Areopagitica, or plea for unfettered printing: "I deny not," he says, "but that it is of greatest concernment in the Church and Commonwealth to have a vigilant eye how books demean (behave) themselves, as well as men, and thereafter to confine, imprison, and do sharpest justice on them as malefactors. For books are not absolutely dead things but do contain a progeny of life in them. I know they are as lively and as vigorously productive as those fabulous dragon's teeth; and being sown up and down may chance to spring up armed men. And yet on the other hand, unless wariness be used, as good almost kill a man as kill a good book. . . A good book is the precious life-blood of a master-spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life."

Already as we gather from Milton's words evil books were taking their place beside good ones through the means of printing, and in these days when a flood of what is superficial or vile is flowing through the shops and the bookstalls we have more than ever to discriminate wisely and "do sharp justice on malefactors." It is the object of such libraries as this to help men in their reading, to assist them in finding their way to the "master-spirits." It ought to be a little model library to guide us in the formation of our own libraries at home. The best result of cheap printing is to enable us to have a library of our own and the best result of a town library is to assist us in making our little private collection. As for the newspaper department I am not enthusiastic about it. I hope the need of it will soon be gone. Everyone can afford a halfpenny a day for a newspaper—and there's no need to spend more—and I hope our premises will ere long be devoted entirely to the reading of books. I think we may congratulate ourselves on having such pleasant and convenient premises. The internal arrangements are admirable. For the outside, as you see, we have been to Athens—by a rather circuitous route perhaps—and have picked up on the way some features not exactly Athenian. Personally I greatly prefer our own Gothic to the Classical, still more to the Renaissance. I should have liked something old English suggestive of Sherwood and Shakespeare, and King Alfred. But Athens was a learned place, and I hope you feel here something of the cultivated atmosphere of the Academy of Plato or the Parthenon.

THE IMPERIAL DRUG TRADE.*

We are not here thinking about the sale of intoxicating liquors, by which the British revenue makes a large annual profit, and the British character an incalculable annual loss. Our title is that of a book recently published by Mr. Joshua Rowntree, dealing with the wicked and degrading traffic in opium between British India and the Far East. It is not the least of the services of the Rowntree family that we should be given this temperate, judicial and informing volume on a subject which is, it is true, an old topic of controversy, but which remains, nevertheless, a problem of national ethics of first-rate importance. At the meeting of the first International Congress of Liberal Religion in London four years ago, one of the most striking and memorable deliverances was that of Mr. Graham Wallas, who pointed out that the first requisite of a world-religion must be the production and dissemination of a world-ethic—a law of conduct and life which is binding on nations as well as individuals. As one reads in this book the record of the chicanery, brutality and greed by means of which an odious and demoralising traffic has been forced upon the millions of China, in spite of the protests of their own rulers, by the representatives of a great "Christian" power—one realises the significance of Mr. Wallas's appeal, and the lame futility of a "Christianity" which has no decisive word to say about such enormities.

The trickery of international politics, the brutalities of "Christian" wars, the wicked license allowed to western traders (and even shared by imperial governments) to corrupt the bodies and souls of defenceless millions in the East for the sake of profit; these things rise up in judgment against our common Christianity when it claims to be a religion for all mankind. A new day, however, is dawning in the East, with the emergence of Japan as a first-rate power. In its treatment of the opium problem this non-Christian people has shown a foresight and humanity far in excess of that of the western powers.

In his opening historical sketch, Mr. Rowntree makes it clear that we have only ourselves to thank for the estrangement of Chinese sympathy from foreign peoples, which degenerates in times of excitement into a fierce hatred of the "foreign devil." Sir Robert Hart says: "Your legalised opium has been a curse in every province it penetrated, and your refusal to limit or decrease the import has forced us to attempt a dangerous remedy: we have legalised native opium—not because we approve of it, but—to compete with and drive out the foreign drug." In a recent life of Professor James Legge, the eminent student of Chinese life and literature, he is quoted as saying: "I lived and went about among the Chinese for fully thirty years. I heard the testimony about it of thousands in all positions of society. I knew multitudes ruined by the vice, in character, circumstances and health. I saw the misery caused in families as younger members of them were led away into the habit of smoking. I knew cases of suicide arising from it. I have been a member of the Society for the Suppression of the Opium Trade from its beginning. It is not pleasant to be called a 'sentimentalist,' a 'fanatic,' or a 'goose,' but to the man who longs for right, such calling of names is, to use an expression of Confucius, as 'a floating cloud.'" Dr. Legge always deplored as a national crime the production of the drug for the Chinese market by the Indian Government.

In 1894 a Royal Commission was appointed to examine into the opium trade, and in 1895 it produced seven blue-books of evidence, and an official report. Mr. Rowntree convicts the commissioners of inaccuracy, inefficiency, and a grave lack of impartiality. It appears, in short, to have been an "official" commission, invented for the purpose of bolstering up the existing system. Certain, at least, it is that merchants who had an interest in the trade and officials whose prejudices were opposed to change were given an undue prominence in the evidence, whilst Chinese evidence was ignored. Mr. Lockhart, the Protector of the Chinese at Hong-Kong, spoke as follows:—"Chinese popular opinion in respect to the opium habit is decidedly against it. There is a common Cantonese saying, 'The Ten Cannots': He cannot (1) give up the habit, (2) enjoy sleep, (3) wait for his turn when sharing his pipe with his friends, (4) rise early, (5) be cured if sick, (6) enjoy wealth, (8) plan anything, (9) get credit, even when an old customer, (10) walk any long distance. That, I think, sums up the popular view of the Chinese with regard to the opium habit." In face of the weight of Chinese opinion against the drug, the neglect by the Royal Commissioners to make mention of it in their report, while enlarging on interested commercial and official evidence, can only be described as deplorable.

The export of the poppy brings in, according to Mr. Rowntree's calculation, some two or three millions a year of revenue to the Indian exchequer. In face of Mr. Balfour's recent declaration that the supposed danger to the North-West Frontier from Russia is now removed, may it not fairly be asked that the production of the drug in British India should be stopped, and the loss to the revenue be made good by a large reduction of the extravagant and needless expenditure upon the Indian army? Indeed, the whole attitude of the British Parliament to the dumb millions of India and China needs re-casting on the basis of a new ethical consciousness of our imperial obligations and opportunities. The real menace to India, as Mr. Augustine Birrell said the other day, is not the defeated and discredited Russian army, but the twin foes, poverty and the plague. And as to China, it is high time that our Government took a different message to its teeming peoples; gave a different impression of the civilisation and religion of the West, than that conveyed by South African Labour ordinances, and the vicious and degrading opium traffic, forced upon China by British arms. Not in these ways will "the kingdoms of the world become the kingdoms of our God and of His Christ."

SIR OLIVER LODGE ON EDUCATION.

Should tasks be imposed at school for the mere sake of discipline, or should study be made attractive to the learner as far as lies within the educator's power? Sir Oliver Lodge discusses this question (and many others) in his little book upon Education,* and there is no doubt in his mind concerning the answer. He says:—"Study should be attractive, of that I am convinced; not superficially but solidly attractive," and he quotes Shakespeare to the point, who ought to know. Sir Oliver Lodge cannot conceive but that knowledge is interesting and the process of mastering it interesting to a happy scholar under happy control. "My belief is that the child, to whom everything is new, is eager to learn; and if in health is docile and intelligent until spoiled." The hours of teaching should be adapted to the child's powers of endurance, and when attention flags the lesson should be stopped. To proceed compulsorily with instruction regardless whether the child can follow is a sure way, in Sir Oliver's opinion, to spoil the child's intelligence. Why are so many children spoilt at school? Because subjects are not taught to be learnt, but are used very often mainly as disciplinary exercises (p. 11). There are legitimate ways of securing attention, but of inattention for the most part, whether in school or university, Sir Oliver Lodge declares that it is "a safeguard devised. : : : to protect youth through long hours of dreariness, to shield it from unprofitable subjects, or rather from subjects rendered unprofitable by their mode of presentation."

Sir Oliver, if we do not misunderstand him, can hardly believe in the reality of study, if no pleasure is taken in it. Can a student's mind be getting to the root of the matter, to the fact, if his investigation fails to stir his interest? We judge that Sir Oliver Lodge would reply in the negative. Yet, although study is to be made attractive, difficulties must be attacked with courage. Difficulties there are necessarily to be accepted as a task, and to these our lecturer is not oblivious. He speaks a good word for the multiplication table, and for the chronology of kings and queens, distinguishing at the same time between the mechanical aids to memory and the living spirit of the communication of knowledge. Teaching should be carried on as far as possible with the help of things as well as words—a council of perfection which will develop into a council of practicability more and more as time goes on. The best way of beginning physics, says Sir Oliver, is to interest a boy in steam-engines, and stars. "The beginnings of Greek language may be hard, and apparently have to be made compulsory lest it die out; but if schools aroused an interest in Greek literature and history, and made boys realise the survival of the Greek spirit and the part it plays in the world, a percentage of them would willingly go through the drudgery of acquiring a fair acquaintance with the language, and a few of them might even go on to become creditable scholars in due course."

Quotation can hardly do justice to the courage and high spirit that are shown upon every page of this little treatise. Sir Oliver Lodge has confidence in the teacher, confidence in the child, and confidence in the possibilities of the school curriculum. He holds up an ideal bracing to the teacher, and beneficent to the scholar, an ideal so sane and practical that it cannot fail to be of use to those for whom it is intended. And they are a large class, for parents as well as teachers should read this book, and indeed all persons interested in contemporary thoughts concerning the human mind. Sir Oliver Lodge joins depth of insight to the wisdom of experience. He has an extraordinarily profound and vital conception of knowledge, the conception held nowadays by most articulate men of science, and this lifts his lectures into the dignity of a real contribution to thought. He conceives the teacher in his humblest office as guiding the scholar towards the knowledge of reality. It is the teacher's object, in his regard, not to communicate facts in isolation, not to administer a discipline to mental or even to ethical muscles, but to introduce the mind of child or student by appropriate stages to the apprehension of the whole, the universe. In every item of knowedge are we not in contact with something organic and infinite? And is not the approach to such an object a greater thing than discipline?

We are grateful for this book, yet Sir Oliver Lodge, we think, loses his grasp upon the magnitude of his own thought when for the moment he speaks of religious education. "The essence of religious teaching it seems to me," he says, "is to get the human being to realise his place in the universe; to realise the grandeur and at the same time the imperfection of things; to feel that he is not a helpless spectator but a competent artisan and co-worker, of whom much is required, and that he can be of real service in his day and generation." But higher than any thought of service stands the sentiment of worship, and the "grandeur of things" perceived by the human mind rests upon a higher plane than their imperfections. The chief end of man is not a utility, even a disinterested utility. Knowledge has a higher value in reverence than even in duty. If we think exclusively of our mission in the world we grow bustling and egotistic. There are ampler thoughts. It is religious to love knowledge itself. All that avails to bring the mind closer to fact must be acknowledged as a religious influence. What is there in man more religious than his reverence for fact, his longing to know the universe? Here we have evidence that man is a born worshipper. If it is true that education in the only worthy thought of it is a search after reality, after the whole, the good and the beautiful, then all education is religious education, and every fact that we learn belongs to the edifice of our religion. Man's desire after knowledge shows him what he is, a born worshipper. His mind seeks the infinite reality through the facts of science, and through all ways of truth; he is a born searcher after God. And the infinite that he perceives is greater to him than his duty, much as he yearns toward the latter in his subordinate situation in the whole.

AN HISTORICAL DOCUMENT.*

"If we wish to understand the pedestrian side of German life in the sixteenth century, I know of no better document than the autobiography of Bartholomew Sastrow." So writes Mr. Herbert A. L. Fisher in his excellent introduction to the book spoken of, and the remark would, for a certain class of readers, furnish almost a sufficient review of it. The zealous student of history welcomes any document which makes past times body themselves forth more distinctly to his gaze, and he is not deterred by any want of grace in the narrative. He is glad of any hint which will help him to thread the maze of policy. He is willing for the sake of truth to wade through any story which brings home to him with any new force the feelings and ideas, the doings and sufferings of past generations. Every reader of Sastrow who comes to him in this spirit will get at least something for his pains. He will get a few new glimpses of Luther, and still more of the Emperor Charles V.—even a picture of this latter august personage being thrashed by a Swabian carter, who thought he was merely taming the pride of an ordinary Spaniard. Poor carter! He could not praise the Emperor too much for his clemency, when, through the mediation of officers who seemed to appreciate the humour of the situation, his life was spared and he only had his nose sliced off. But perhaps such incidents hardly belong to what Mr. Fisher calls the "pedestrian side" of the life of the period. This comes more into evidence when the reader is led through a series of lawsuits which lasted forty years, and were brought upon Sastrow's father by the unjust dealings of a clique of women; or when Sastrow tells of special providences and the activity of the devil, of witches and court fools, of the torturing of prisoners, and of public executions, of image-breaking and of monkish vices, of visitations of the plague, and of the severe treatment of children. True, of none of these things does he write with power or winsomeness. As Mr. Fisher says, "There is no delicacy, no charm, no elevation of tone in these memoirs." Little can be said to their credit except that they bring plainly before us a certain number of facts. And perhaps this notice cannot end better than with a sample or two of their matter and style—which will also show that the translator has produced a very readable version. The following is from a description of an Imperial Diet:—

"Both princes and princesses spent "their incomes in banquets of unparal- "leled splendour. They arrived with "their money-caskets full to overflowing, "but in a little while they were compelled "to take many a humiliating step in "order to obtain loans; the rates were "ruinous, but anything rather than leave "Augsburg defeated and humbled in "their love of display. Several sove- "reigns—among others, the Duke of "Bavaria—had received from their sub- "jects thousands of dollars as 'play "money.' They lost every penny of it." (p. 233).

"On the eve of Maundy Thursday, at "sunset, twenty-four flagellants of both "sexes marched by in their shirts, their "faces covered with pieces of stuff into "which were cut holes for their eyes and "mouth, their backs sufficiently bare for "the birch provided with steel-pointed "hooks to touch the flesh. It was a "hideous spectacle, the hooks tearing "pieces of flesh away, and causing the "blood to trickle down to the ground. "The penitents advanced very slowly, "one by one, in two single files, divided "as it were by Spanish gentlemen of high "degree, each carrying a thick wax "candle. The whole street was lighted "with them. When they reached the "Church of the Barefooted Carmelites the "procession fell on its knees and dragged "itself from the porch to the crucifix in "the choir in that way. Near the "entrance the surgeons dressed their "wounds; rumour had it that two corpses "were carried away" (p. 114).

Not all the proofs of immortality will make a man believe one whit more than he naturally believes: not all the objections against it will make a man believe one whit less. After all that has been proved or disproved, it is faith, and more, it is spiritual experience that shall decide the matter. And what is true of immortality is equally true of God.—*P. C. MODERN BENGALI HYMNS.

An example of a modern Bengali hymn is printed in the Indian Messenger of July 2, in which the following notes on the subject also appear:—"As the opening hymn of our to-day's issue we give a translation of one of the most affecting and popular hymns of Babu Rabindranath Thakur, the most eminent of the living poets of Bengal. We give it specially for the benefit of the non-Bengali readers of this journal. Our Bengali readers, specially those who have heard it sung on solemn occasions such as the requiem ceremony of our departed Maharshi, will miss in the translation the deep pathos and melodiousness of the original. But to readers unacquainted with Bengali, it may convey a faint idea of the hymn, which has given and continues to give consolation to so many souls. As we mean to give such translations of our hymns from time to time, we are not without hope that some devout versifier may even be induced to turn them into melodious verse, and thereby introduce Bengali hymnal poetry to the English reading public.

"Our modern hymnology is most rich and elevating, and for a devout Indian, the Bengali language is worth learning if only for enjoying the sacred sweetness of our hymns. Babu Rabindranath Thakur and Babu Trailokyanath Sanyal, better known perhaps to non-Brahmos by his assumed name of Chiranjiv Sarma, divide our allegiance, or rather reign as joint rulers at the present time in the kingdom of our sacred song. The melting and uplifting influence which these two singers of our church has exerted on us and on all who have come within the sphere of their influence, is simply immeasurable. John and Charles Wesley have not more deeply influenced the Christian life of England than these two men have the devotional life of modern Bengal. Some more or less imperfect account of this influence will, we hope, be some day given by a competent historian. Three other composers of hymns who have widely influenced Bengali society in recent times, and who may be said to be the masters of our present-day singers, are Raja Rammohan Ray, Babu Satyendranath Thakur and Babu Jyotirindranath Thakur, the last two being elder brothers of Rabindranath. The devotional history of the Brahmo Samaj may be traced stage after stage by a study of the hymns composed by these eminent masters of sacred song."

This is the hymn to which reference is made in the above notes:—

The Dawn of New Life.

I know that when the day breaks, the bark of thy mercy
Will convey me to the other shore of the ocean of life, O Lord;
I do not fear; I shall go away, singing
    Thy praise,
And shall stand at Thy eternal gate, O
    Lord.

I know that from age to age, enclosing me with Thy arms,
Thou hast kept me in Thy infinite world,
Thou hast let me be born from light to light,
And hast led me from life to new life, O
    Lord.

I know, my God, that whether in sin or in holiness, my soul always
Is lying before thy eyes, O Lord.
Thy hands are always on mine, day and night,
In all paths, or when I go astray, in weal and woe, O Lord.

I know, I know, that my life will never be fruitless,
Thou wilt not cast it upon wilds full of the fear of death;
A day will come when, in mercy, Thou in person
Will pick it up as a flower, O Lord.

THE URGENCY OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

The sermon preached by the Rev. J. J. Wright, of Chowbent, before the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire on June 21, is now published by direction of the Assembly (Rawson & Co., New Brown-street, Manchester). The sermon is entitled, "Signs of the Times: A Plea for Education in the Art of Right Living," and it is a very earnest plea for attention to the higher things of life, and particularly to the duty of training the young in religion, based upon a true understanding of the practical and moral relations of life. With great force Mr. Wright points to the necessity for the moral education of the young, who are to be the citizens of to-morrow, and then in the following passage brings his plea home to our own community:—

"I ask you, is it too fond a dream that we, of our group of churches—we that are so free to make new departures—so unbound that we can always, if we will, adapt ourselves and our methods to the changing conditions of the times—is it too fond a dream that we, taking religion as the supreme necessity of life, and taking the rising generation as of the first and foremost importance, that we should, perchance, so reduce or re-arrange the incessant demands which, as adults, we make on our ministers; perhaps so alter the emphasis of our religious work as to deal more largely with the young, and, it may even be, so train men in our colleges that possibly those who need him most—our children and young people—will ever be the minister's main charge, and have the first and largest call upon his time and talents? Then we might, indeed, do for the Kingdom of God and the good of man such a work as has not been accomplished.

"Meanwhile, until we care enough to set ourselves to attempt a bigger thing, we can at least, to use the Frenchman's phrase—only with deeper meaning—turn again and cultivate our own garden—the little garden of our Church-life, the garden of our school-life, the garden of our home-life—never forgetting that the children and young people are always the products out of which is to grow much of all that will be good or otherwise in the England just ahead of us.

"Might it not be worth while for all our congregations, even if they had to put aside some other things, so to concentrate attention and effort on their own Sunday Schools that these thousands of children and young people who come so freely and trustfully—and come in such larger numbers than adults come to the churches—would it not be worth while, I say, for our congregations to make it their determined business that these who come to their schools should get—as they can get nowhere else—a sound and practical religious education? Would it not be easily possible were ministers either provided with trained assistants, or relieved perhaps of the grim demand for two sermons a week for adults—whether they are there or not—would it not be easily possible, and delightful, and more satisfactory, to put at least half their best strength, even in the church or chapel, into the special religious instruction of young people? Suppose adults felt it as a supreme duty to come and get all they possibly could out of one service, and then, in the other (later or earlier service), really to help in some way towards the religious teaching, training, or influencing of children and young people—would not the results be more satisfactory, both in adults and young people? At any rate, whether this be the best method or not, we are surely agreed upon our object (the better religious training of our young people) and if we believe in this object, a method should not be far to seek. Moreover, is it too late to plead with parents, with young parents especially, to remember (to use Gannett's words) that while the parent owes the child-body bread; while he owes the child-mind, reading and writing; while he owes the child-heart, love; he owes the child-soul his best thought of God—his best to the date of the asking or telling. For, mark you, 'a father's sincerity often determines for life the ethics of his boy's theology; and a mother's love, the depth and horizons of his faith in the Infinite goodness.'

"Ah, yes, some of us know that, either by actual experience or by observation. Do you remember that lovely Eastern Apologue, wherein someone is speaking words of praise concerning a beautiful garden in which he stands, and the garden itself replies, and says: 'I was only common clay until roses were planted in me.' Yes, and it is, for the most part, only common clay into which we can plant the best we know; and we are apt not to believe enough in the possibilities of this common clay. We do well to recollect that we are all 'common clay'; that it's about the only clay there is; that all things do spring from it; and that we ARE what we are, at our best, because a few good things got somehow planted in us. "Plant, then, I pray you, in this young life so near to us—plant the rose of reverence in even the commonest clay; set the seed of wonder; raise and cultivate the sturdy stem of truth and the scented leaves of gentleness; and the common clay—as we have seen in our homes and schools and churches so oft—becomes a very garden of the better life."

If you have any real mission, do not wait to do it on a large scale, in large places, and grand circumstances. When the grand occasion comes, welcome. If it does not, no place or opportunity or condition is too mean for you to accomplish the purpose for which you came.

A SEASIDE HOLIDAY.—II.

The glorious walk over the moor and down the valley to Brookside farm had given our party of holiday makers a keen appetite, and so, although the farmyard had great attractions for Ernest and Nip, and the garden for Mab and Elsie, they none of them needed to be called twice when lunch was ready, but all fell to work with right good will to refresh "the inner man." Nip did his very best for the inner dog out in the kitchen along with the farmer's collie Scot. Scot was good-tempered and Nip was on his good behaviour; so, for the time being, they got on well together, each showing the other what he could do in the way of cleaning plates.

During lunch Uncle Ned and the young folk all talked eagerly over plans of campaign, and how best to spend the delightful days of their holiday, and it was soon plain to be seen that Uncle Ned had already thought on his plans, and knew quite well what to do, and how to do it. "First of all," he said, "we are going to rest in the garden for a whole half hour." He was a doctor, you see, and knew that after a brisk four-mile walk, followed by a hearty meal, it would be best to rest in the shade in a lovely old-fashioned garden—with its lawn sloping down to the brook, and its beds and bowers on either side filled with most glorious August flowers, and busy with hundreds and hundreds of bees. So out they went, and I wish that The Inquirer was an illustrated paper so that I might show you a "snap shot" of the party—Nip and all—revelling in all the sweetness of that lovely summer afternoon, without a care and with their holiday all before them.

Ah! laddies and lassies, it is a grand thing to have one's holiday all before one! And it is even better still to have one's whole life before one, with its duties and opportunities and joys, and even with its drudgeries and its sorrows and disappointments, which help to make us brave men and women.

But, I forgot! I'm not writing a sermon, but only telling you about a seaside holiday.

I fancy you are wondering when we shall get to the seaside, as Ernest was beginning to do; and after they had sat quietly chatting in the garden for twenty-five minutes, he said, "Uncle Ned, when are we going to look at the sea?" "We will start in five minutes, my lad," Uncle Ned answered, "and I shall require your help, boys, with certain jars and other vessels, for I want to bring back some clean sea-water to put into my tanks." "Tanks! why have you brought tanks, Uncle Ned?" "Because I want you to see our sea treasures all alive and happy. So we are going to have sweet, clean sea-water always ready to receive them as we capture them, and after a good look we will return them to their true home none the worse."

"Uncle Ned, you're a brick," said the boys. "No, he's not a brick, he's a dear old uncle," said Elsie; and Mab agreed with her friend, and claimed him as her uncle, too.

The jars and pails were produced, and each boy took one, and then the party started for the shore by the field path which loved the stream and always kept as close to it as possible. The way led through a meadow for a short distance, and then over a stile on to the sand flats, and then with rather an abrupt turn to the shore, where, suddenly, they found themselves in a little sandy bay, with the sea stretching out before them, and on either hand high cliffs, with broken rocks at their feet, and, amongst the rocks, pools of cool, clear sea-water left by the tide.

It was a lovely sight indeed, and, to inland folk, it was beyond all expression glorious—that great expanse of water, so blue and so marvellous in its ceaseless, lifelike movement! Ernest had never before seen the sea, and it had been a hard trial of his patience to wait half an hour after lunch in the garden, with the sea only a quarter of a mile off. Now at last he saw it, and it was grander and in every way more wonderful than he had expected, so that he wanted to ask Uncle Ned a dozen questions all at once. "What makes it keep moving?" "Why does it not flow over us and drown us?" "It seems alive!"

Just such questions and sayings as these I have heard other inland folk put forth, when for the first time they beheld the glory and wonder of the sea.

And the older ones, who had seen the sea before, yet said that they had never seen it look so perfectly beautiful as now, with the sun shining on it and making its waves and breakers sparkle, and its foam more dazzling even than the great white summer clouds above.

After a long look, Ernest began to run about picking up strange objects which he found lying on the sand—all of them common enough and unnoticed by those who live near the shore, but full of interest and novelty to the boy on his first visit; and before long the whole party were finding marvels at every step, and kept Uncle Ned busy naming and explaining their treasures.

After an hour, which sped by like a dream and seemed but a few minutes, Uncle Ned called them all together and unfolded his plans for the morrow's doings. "In the morning," he said, "you boys and I will come down to the shore before breakfast and bathe. The tide will be in at six o'clock, and we shall have time for a bathe and a walk before breakfast at eight. After breakfast we will arrange our aquarium for the reception of our prizes, and at half-past nine we will all come down to the bay again and follow the ebbing tide and search the rock pools. The tide will begin to rise again at one o'clock, and we will then return to Brookside and, in the afternoon, we will have a good look at our captives."

Uncle Ned's proposals were agreed upon joyfully by the whole party, and, after filling their stone jars with sea-water, they scrambled up a steep and rugged cliff path, where Mab and Elsie found many strange and beautiful seaside plants. Then they rested at the top and waited to see a glorious sunset, and afterwards returned to the farm by another path.

Over their evening meal they recalled the varied experiences of the day, and all agreed that it had been the happiest they had ever known.

DEEPER LIFE WITH GOD.

IN the sermon "Signs of the Times: a Plea for Education in the Art of Right Living," preached by the Rev. J. J. WRIGHT before the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire in June last, and now published, it is noted with misgiving how widespread is the indifference to religion, which ought to be the supreme concern of life, since it is in HARNACK'S striking phrase, "Eternal life in the midst of Time by the strength and under the eyes of GOD"—life, as the preacher said, "moved and guided by the simple principles of faith, and hope, and love; life at its happiest and highest, because it is life lived in GOD, for man, and with the spirit of CHRIST." The great interest of religion so conceived, as the true life for man, was, he said, too much neglected, and among the signs of the times he noted a lamentable weakening in the sense of parental responsibility for the due training of children, and a decay of reverence; the deeper things of life were neglected and disbelieved; there was, in fact, a decay of faith in human nature itself, which must involve the destruction of religion. Partly this was to be attributed to a shallow acceptance of the doctrine of evolution applied to the whole of life, and viewed from the materialist point of view; and it was to be met either by HUXLEY'S protest, who recognised a power in man, on the ethical and spiritual plane, which must resist and conquer the forces of such a purely material order of evolution, or, better still, by a deeper insight into the whole order of the universe, in which the material was seen to rest in the spiritual, and the personal life of man to be akin to the supreme Source and Ruler of all.

This, in fact, was the preacher's faith, and, having noted those signs of the times, he declared his conviction that the spiritual faith was destined to triumph. "The simple fact is, as it seems to me, that what we just want, and what we are just ready for, is a deeper, clearer vision into the heart of things as they truly are!" "Of this I am more and more convinced that we are now on the verge of a more spiritual age." "The day has come to go deeper again, for, after all, it is only in and by the innermost things that man can ever root and raise his life."

"The significance of all the signs of the times to me is that, once again in human history the attempt to 'run' human life upon a materialistic basis, even with an air of science about it; to do without ethics, and to discard all spiritual inlook and outlook, has proved, in our own day, a serious failure and utterly unsatisfying to the human heart by which men truly live. Moreover, man is discovering, once again, not only his need for, but his kinship with higher things. However, the philosophers are going to name it, the great fact is becoming clearer and clearer every day, that what we have called Mind and Spirit and Life (any better terms will do if we can find them)—but that these are the abiding and ever-working Realities, in and through all appearances."

This is the testimony not only of the modern, as of the ancient, spiritual seers, but of such leaders of scientific thought as Lord KELVIN and Sir OLIVER LODGE; and against this such an effort as that of Mr. JOSEPH MCCABE in the current number of the Hibbert Journal appears but an idle labouring with words. Even supposing the whole material order of evolution to be established with scientific exactness of knowledge, and without a flaw according to his conception of it, and the great excitement of the controversy over abiogenesis disposed of once for all by the scientist's demonstration that he has produced life such as we know it here out of matter in which previously there was no such life, it is only the blind of heart who could suppose on that account that the knell was rung of the spiritual interpretation of life. All that it would really mean would be that we had gained some completer and more exact knowledge of the methods of the Supreme Power in the process of creation. The self-sufficient little man, who, having demonstrated the whole material order of the universe in a scheme of exact knowledge, should go on to proclaim that there was no profounder truth, and no further riddle to be solved, would make himself simply ridiculous in face of the deeper experiences of human life. There would yet remain love and truth and purity, honour and courage, self-sacrifice and loyalty to high ideals and all the mystery of great personalities, and the unfolding of human history; such higher elements of spiritual life it is either folly or treachery to set down as merely evanescent products of material order; they demand for a true understanding of their significance a hidden Source, in the one eternal Spirit, without whom no such life could ever have begun to be. Though our science of the universe were perfected on the material side, GOD would yet remain, in all and over all; for the recognition of that supreme truth, what is needed is not more elaborate knowledge of external things, but a better understanding of the inward life of man. In this connection Mr. WRIGHT quoted in his sermon a wise saying of the Bishop of RIPON'S in the April Hibbert: "The only avenue of spiritual conviction is an ethical one; you may reach intellectual assent, theological harmony, neat and compact systems of belief, through other channels; but without the sanction of the moral nature there is no faith."

The Assembly Sermon having dwelt upon this great need for a deeper inward life for the re-establishment of religion in its true power, went on to make a special plea, which we have reproduced elsewhere, for greater faithfulness in the religious training of the young. Here we will simply refer to another witness in the current Hibbert, the Rev. J. A. HUTTON, of the Jesmond Presbyterian Church, Newcastle-on-Tyne, in an article entitled, "Is the Age of Faith Returning?" He shows how persistent in man is the conviction of the reality of spiritual things, though with growing knowledge the forms in which ultimate truth is presented must change. He welcomes signs of a "recovery of personality," as marking a new hope for religion, and affirms, "that we live by faith, in obedience to a profound and unconquerable instinct that, to put it variously, a cosmos cannot have chaos for its crown, that there is a final correspondence between man and the universe, or, in the language of piety, that 'this is none other than the house of GOD and the gate of heaven.'" "The new faith," he further says, "will be a return, a kind of homecoming, to a sufficiently solid confidence, that in trusting those elements of our nature, which urge us and help us on towards what seems best, we are not deceived; that rather, in those so personal intimations and contacts we are dealing with Reality, and with that kind of reality which, for beings such as we are, and placed as we are, is our proper and abiding concern."

What we have got to do is to live, bravely and faithfully, to realise that we are now and for ever folded within the care of the living GOD. All progress, all deeper, clearer vision of the things of GOD must depend on our single-hearted faithfulness to the daily duties of our common life.

WATTS THE PAINTER OF ETERNAL TRUTHS.

II.

LIFE, DEATH, LOVE.

WATTS once said, "I should like to feel that my work conveys the same delightful impression to the eye as music does to the ear. I should like to stimulate to the higher emotions, self-sacrifice, and its sister, Love." This he has done, and, moreover, his own personal influence was of like effect. Sir William Richmond, speaking at the opening of the Watts' Exhibition at Manchester, said of him: "Of all the men I ever knew Watts was the kindest, gentlest, most inspiring. One never went to see that calm old man without coming away as though one had really drunk at the very fount of life. When one went to him dispirited, feeling in the depths of the blues, he would always say in a quiet, tender voice, 'Strive on; fight on; I get miserable, also. Often, when I begin painting in the morning, I feel as if it were the first time I had ever touched a brush—I feel incapable.' But there was no incapacity there. There was a quiet, consistent purpose, from the first painting to the last he did."

The calm, the peace, the music of Watts show themselves in his representations of Life, Death and Love. He meditated much on death and love and life. He did his own full share of work, not through great physical vigour, but by careful and simple living, using his strength wisely and devotedly, and, therefore, the more readily death was present in his ideas.

But death was not repellant to him and is not so represented in his pictures. "Love and Death," shows us the inevitable advance of death; there is no opposition that can avail against that draped, nobly proportioned figure, whose back is towards us in the picture. There is nothing repulsive about it. It is inevitable, but not terrible. Love, represented as a boy, is partially but not completely, overshadowed; a little light is left in the darkest hour. The boy among the flowers, it would seem, is unwilling to leave them so soon. Is it already bedtime? Must this life be left with all its beauty and joy? And yet, perchance, he is sleepy too. Though we cannot see the face of death—and when most bereaved by death, this is the depth of our sorrow—love can see more and is not frightened. And there is something gracious and gentle in the figure whose advance may by no means be checked even by love.

Watts's conception of Death is maternal. "Death crowning Innocence," shows the pitying angel fondly caressing a little child on her lap. "The Court of Death," which was painted originally for a cemetery of the poor, shows Death seated throned on the ruins of the World. In her lap is an infant, claimed before life had well begun, a symbol, as Watts has explained, that the beginning and end of life lies in the lap of death. Two angel figures guard the portals of the unknown beyond the grave, while at the feet of Death are all sorts and conditions of men. The warrior still in the pride of strength and manhood, loyally surrenders his sword; the nobleman with bowed head, lays down his coronet; and the poor cripple comes to crave of death a final respite from pain. A young girl, wearied with suffering, rests her head, as though in sleep, upon the winding sheet, while a little child, half in sport, draws it over his head; and the lion, as the type of physical power, crouches at Death's feet.

There is sadness, the sense of the world's suffering, the calm and relief, and inevitable power of Death. These pictures are like strains of solemn music, and come from the same source of inspiration as Walt Whitman's verses:

"Praised be the fathomless universe
For life and joy, and for objects and knowledge curious,
And for love, sweet love—but praise, praise! praise!
For the sure-entwining arms of cool-enfolding Death.

Dark mother, always gliding near, with soft feet,
Have none chanted for thee a chant of fullest welcome?
Then I chant it for thee—I glorify thee above all;
I bring thee a song that, when thou must indeed come, come unfalteringly.

Approach, strong Deliveress!
When it is so—when thou hast taken them,
I joyously sing the dead,
Lost in the loving, floating ocean of thee,
Saved in the flood of thy bliss, O Death."

Beyond death, Watts believed, begins a greater life, and love he saw to be the controlling force of the world. Whatever eclipse it might suffer, it would shine out with renewed power; though death should call it to repose it would rise refreshed and renewed in the morning.

Love has not an easy time here. It is in Watts's conception no easy-going luxuriousness of mutual selfishness and pampering of appetites—soft couches, zephyr breezes, not we two in bliss together and let the world go its own way—not a little corner shut off and decorated for our little family and friends, while the world wanders and toils and suffers. No; Love leads Life (in the picture Love and Life) up the rugged path from brutality to spirituality. The slight female figure representing life, may at first sight disappoint us—it has not the fulness of female grace which Watts could paint so well; it is "an emblem of the fragile quality in humanity, at once its weakness and its strength." Love, more robust, more nobly formed, leads life up the steep and difficult rocks. He, strong and inspiring with confidence in his power to do all things, yet leaves life to do all she can. He leads her tenderly by the hands, but does not grip them nor offer to her frame the support of his arms. The truest help of love to life is to show the way, develop all life's powers by their use, and offer support only when those powers are inadequate to the need.

Another picture represents Love steering the boat of humanity. Humanity has to struggle with the storms and difficulty of the voyage, but is safe only when Love is at the helm; and love must not depart from the helm to do the work that humanity can do and in doing which it grows strong and wins love's eternal presence.

For, finally, Love is triumphant over death and time. Death and time belong together, and, as Love ascends above them, they lie prostrate and the face of Time no longer seen, that of Death upturned is akin to Love, but temporal. Only Death and Time can die. They are brought to judgment. Love is strengthened. Love is strengthened and developed by their ministrations; sympathy, tenderness, self-sacrifice have been learned under their tuition. Then the soul arises. Love is triumphant through the power of sacrificing the self which is conditioned by time and death.

PRIESTLEY PRIME.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF GEORGE FREDERICK WATTS, R.A.

I.

IN setting down the impressions made upon my mind by personal contact with one of the greatest men of the nineteenth century, my task is attended with obvious risks. It is impossible for me to speak of Mr. Watts as a man without appearing to be immodest. Yet, rather than leave unsaid the things which reveal his transparency of character and the idealism of his aim, I venture to face that danger.

George Frederick Watts had no rival in the department of work in which he was engaged during his long life. His artistic conceptions can only be compared with the great masterpieces in sculpture by Phidias and the paintings of Michael Angelo. The school of painting of which Mr. James McNeill Whistler was the distinguished head would rule the works of Mr. Watts out of the artistic court. Mr. Whistler and his friends have nothing to do with any art which has either a story to tell or a lesson to impress. From their point of view no literature should touch art; no piece of artistic work should need or have any association with anything which is not the art itself. The picture should stand alone, as a piece of decoration, or it fails in its mission as art. The work of Mr. Watts is full of meaning, full of suggestiveness, and therefore does not come within the scope of what should be called art, if Mr. Whistler and his friends have lifted its true standard.

Whether the work of Mr. Watts may be duly classed as Art in the orthodox sense or not, we must look upon it as a unique performance in teaching his generation the highest ideals of life. After all, it matters but little as to the name we give the teacher as long as we profit by his teaching.

I wish I could show that the lofty ideals prevalent in the art of the great painter were also the actuating motives of his life. If it be true that in his work he soared into realms above the level of his contemporaries, it is also true that in life he attained to some of the highest peaks reached by humanity. He was an artist in life as well as in paint. This was quite clear to me, as it must have been to all who came into direct touch with him. But it is not easy to show this as clearly in writing as it was to perceive it in life.

The first occasion on which I had the pleasure of a communication from Mr. Watts was many years ago. I was connected with a London Gospel Temperance Society, and used to write short articles for its weekly journal. Such work was very distressing, as all attempts at the reformation of London drinkers must be. You may persuade men to sign the pledge easily enough; but to get them to keep the pledge they have taken is quite another matter. My heart had ached many times when I had seen men who had been slaves to the drink habit sign the pledge and keep sober for awhile, and then break out again in their old ways. So disheartening had these experiences become that I had almost given up in despair. In one particularly melancholy mood of this description I had wandered into the South Kensington Museum. I had walked aimlessly among the cases of exhibits from India and Japan, and through the lines of old carriages and sedan chairs without becoming at all interested in the interesting objects about which I moved. There was a staircase before me leading to the galleries. Simply for the sake of change I walked up the stairs and paused on one of the landings. There were one or two pictures on the walls which arrested my attention, because of their unlikeness to other paintings I had been accustomed to see. I had been reading some of the chapters of Ruskin's "Modern Painters," and had gathered the idea that Mr. Ruskin considered it permissible to receive suggestions from pictures whether the artist had intended those suggestions or not. With this in my mind I sat down in front of a blue canvas, and was led to think about it, because it was entitled "Hope." It is true that I saw a star, and remembered the old idea of the Star of Hope; but apart from that I saw little in the picture emphasising hope. But I sat still with the picture before me, thinking of my work in East London. Gradually the bent figure upon the globe in the painting seemed to indicate sorrow and disappointment. I thought of the poor workmen who had tried to become sober, and had yielded again and again to the temptation of the beer-houses and the laughing "come on" of their mates. I thought of their sorrow and disappointment on realising the failure of their will-power in the matter of resistance. Many a time had I said that their case seemed hopeless. On looking up, I noted that this picture before me with its sadness and loneliness was not called "Hopeless" but "Hope." In what consisted the difference? The poor weary girl had no friend on the earth to offer her encouragement, and her companion, the harp, has all its strings broken save one. These things represented hopelessness, but the star above her head was surely the reason which justified the title of the picture. The star was in the heavens, so hope must come from the same sphere. Yes, in God was the only hope of despairing humanity; but this painted representative of humanity could not see the reason for hope, for her eyes were bandaged and her head was bent away from the light which came from heaven. It occurred to me that in the picture there was a message for myself in my disheartening work and for my East-end friends who found it so difficult to break away from old habits and associations. I went home and wrote a short article to the above effect. It was printed in the next issue of our weekly Temperance Messenger. I confess I should have been alarmed had I thought it would have been seen by the artist. Yet some weeks after its appearing I received a note from Mr. Watts saying that he had not seen a comment on his picture which so truly caught his spirit as that article and desired me to call upon him and talk over other ideas he had for new pictures. I never knew by what means Mr. Watts had seen my short article; but I need not say that that incident began for me the greatest spiritual influence my life ever possessed.

The artist became deeply interested in my attempts in East London to give hope and thoughts of higher things to those who there continually struggle against so many difficulties. I told him that I used the lantern in my work, and suggested that it would be a wonderful help to have lantern slides of his pictures, so that they could be explained to large audiences. The idea pleased him, and without further ado the pictures were photographed and lantern slides made from them.

He asked me to bring some of the East-end people to see him, for he would like to talk to them and show them his work: Well, we were not long in arranging pilgrimages. On several Saturday afternoons I had the privilege of conducting large parties of people from North and East London to the studio of Mr. Watts in Kensington. The kindness of the artist and his wife on these occasions was overwhelming. Those afternoons are very vivid in my memory now. Tea was served in the beautiful garden of Little Holland House. I can see the laden tables under the fine old trees, and remember the gracious attention of our kind hostess as my friends partook of the meals under conditions so different from those which pertain in East and North London. While tea was being served the great statue "Energy," then unfinished, stood among the trees at the end of the garden, forming a background of wonderful interest and inspiration.

But the event of each of those occasions was the hand-shake of the master, and the kind, encouraging words he spoke to the young people who had come to see him. He talked about his work, and chatted in a fatherly way to even the youngest of his visitors. In the course of his speaking he would use chalks and illustrate his remarks by making rough sketches on paper. And these scraps of paper were much prized by those who were fortunate enough to secure them. I can remember his telling a youth that to draw or paint properly it was necessary to know how the object which you were representing was formed. To explain his meaning he supposed you wished to draw a human leg, and taking a chalk and paper sketched the bones of a man's leg in a bent position. Over these bones he drew the proper muscles, and then marked the skin enclosing all. Knowing the position and action of these parts, you would be able to make the drawing correct, without such knowledge the work would be faulty. In this way the aged artist interested his visitors in matters which might have been considered beyond their depth. But with his sketches and talk he secured their rapt attention.

RELIGION IN DAILY LIFE.

For the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal.

Paul.

Let a man therefore strive to purify his thoughts. What a man thinks, that he is; this is the old secret.

The Maitrayana Upanishad.

I was staying a little while ago in a house where preparations were being made for a garden party given to a local political association. Everything was done and made ready in a spirit of genuine hospitality and kindly interest in the guests, And as I watched my hostess and her helpers, and marked the spirit they were of, it was borne in upon me that it was that very spirit which would make the occasion joyful and an enduring memory to those who came. I said to myself, "It will not be the gardens, for the day is so cold and grey that they will not look half their best; it can't be the tea, for 'eaten bread is soon forgotten,' be it ever so nice and good. It cannot be the events and the prizes, for all cannot compete and but few can win. And all these together, offered grudgingly, would be as dust and ashes, insulting and irritating to the guests." It was the unseen spirit of the host and hostess which was to influence everything, and Paul's word summed it up: "The things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal."

It is true of everything in this life as well as in the hereafter. Hidden in the depths of our innermost being lie the springs of human destiny, unseen by others, not known, perhaps, even to the individual, but there, and working to eternal issues. It is the innermost I which determines how all outside influences, from persons or things, shall affect me, and whether they shall nourish or injure my spirit's life. It is the innermost I which decides how I shall influence all I have to do with to the very outermost edge of my environment—and we can none of us know or imagine how far that is. So it comes back to this, that it is infinitely more important to be than to do. The doing will follow the being, and will be strictly in character with it. And if we think each morning, as we all must, What have I got to do to-day? it ought only to be a prelude to the other and more important question, What ought I to be to-day?

There is a business transaction to be gone through, let us say a bargain to be struck. Is there in the depths of my soul the impersonal justice and goodwill which declares that "a good bargain is a bargain that is good to both parties to that bargain" and which will save me from the blasphemous idea that a just and loving Father in His "providence" could ever intend me to find an opportunity of selfish gain in my brother's need? Is there within me, in saving power, a realisation that a few pounds, or many thousands of pounds, are but "temporal," while brotherly kindness and love will be eternally the stronger or the weaker upon earth according to the spirit in which I act?

There is cleaning or patching to be done to-day; thoroughly and conscientiously done; which it will not be unless I who am to do it am thorough and conscientious. Let me learn from George Herbert that

All may of God partake;
Nothing can be so mean,
Which with this tincture, For His Sake,
Will not grow bright and clean.
A servant with this clause
Makes drudgery divine;
Who sweeps a room as for Thy laws,
Makes that and the action fine.

And when the cleaning is done in that spirit it falls into its proper place. It is but "temporal" after all, and we do not love our cleanliness too well to have patience with the children's "muddles." We shall be as much as possible unlike a lady whom I once heard tell her sons that she could not bear to see them come into the dining-room in their boots. She objected, not because the boots were dirty—if they had been her remark might have been a needed effort at training—but because "they pressed down the pile of the (Turkey) carpet." She was a good woman, but she forgot that even the best of carpets is but "temporal"; but that home should be home-like to the boys, and they secure of a welcome in every part of it, was of eternal importance. Yet we have proof every day that it is the spirit of a place which makes the home whose memory is a joy and a safeguard in life's later journeying. It isn't for their grandeur we recall the tables and chairs, if they were fine; it is for their association with those whose deep underlying love was expressed in word and deed, and sometimes even in severities. Nothing appeals more quickly to the heart of our common humanity, than when some great man turns with love and longing to the little home of his childhood. He is bound to it by the unseen eternal influences of the spirit that reigned there. And that spirit has been an essential element in his success in life.

There are calls to be made or received to-day, and in meeting our friends we would fain be truthful and tactful, entertaining, but earnest-minded, ready to redeem talk if it drifts towards gossip, and yet free from the taint of priggishness. We would be like Mrs. Browning's woman who never found fault with you; never implied

Your wrong by her right; yet men at her side
Grew nobler, girls purer, while through the whole town
The children were gladder who pulled at her gown.

Such a gracious influence as that springs from the innermost spirit of the man or woman of whom the description is true. It is gained by those who pray daily to have created in them a clean heart, that so the inner vision may be purged, that they may see the things of the daily life as they are. They strive to choose, day by day, and hour by hour, in the least matter as in the greatest, the things unseen and eternal. The same choice is laid before us every day and all day long. And our comfort is that the power which ennobles and sweetens one character, giving it to see the reality of things, can do the same for another. "The thoughts of our hearts," also, may be "cleansed by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, so that we may perfectly love God and worthily magnify His Holy Name."

Then so often in life it happens that duty takes the form of renunciation, and Paul's word is a stay and support to us. Sometimes we are called upon by right principle to renounce some concrete advantage of prospects or position, and friends may help or friends may hinder. More frequently some swift decision has to be made within our own souls, influenced only by what we are. And, probably to every one, there comes the hour of renunciation of what seems to make the sweetness and worth of life. In the depths of the inmost being, with no friend but the Heavenly Father to be cognizant of the tragedy, the soul accepts the bereavement or the adversity, relinquishes the joy of life, buries the hopes of a whole career, or takes up the cross which it will carry to the grave. Well will it be in such an hour for the soul which has been nourished on noble and loving thoughts of God, for then its surrender will be full and wholehearted. And then will dawn for it a day which shall bring a grave and noble happiness, in which it shall be seen that the "light affliction" was indeed but temporal, while the powers of a disciplined character are eternal.

SEASONS OF REFRESHING.*

BY THE REV. CHARLES ROPER, B.A.

"Repent ye therefore, and turn again, that your sins may be blotted out, that so there may come seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord."—ACTS iii. 19.

SEASONS of refreshing! How acceptable they are when they do come to us. And let us realise that they are of two kinds. There is bodily refreshing, and there is spiritual refreshing, and the one is almost, if not quite, as important as the other. This is a period of the year when we are wont to think about this subject, especially as it concerns ourselves. Once more I feel very grateful for the rest, and change of air and scenery, I have been able to get; and frequently I have wished that such a privilege was possible for all my fellow men and women, the poor as well as the rich, the toilers as well as the leisured. What a grand thing it would be were we able to transport the denizens of the slums wholesale into the country, amidst the quiet and beauty of Nature, where they could revel in the pure air and sunshine, and live on wholesome food, for a week or a fortnight while the municipal housemaid could indulge in a thorough spring-cleaning in their absence, and sweeten their environment by the time of their return.

It is a marvel to me that so many jaded men and women, even when they have the chance of a period of genuine rest, should prefer to rush into another kind of turmoil, instead of wandering hand in hand with Nature, the dear old nurse, and by her help getting near to the source of all health and beauty and knowledge. I believe that the man who can religiously, and at the same time rationally, enjoy himself on a holiday in the country or at the seaside, inhaling aspiration and wisdom with the scent of new-mown hay or of wild-flowers or of spicey seaweed, is all the more likely to remember his duties to his fellows on his return to the scenes of his daily labours. Carelessness about the glorious opportunities which God has provided in Nature for the strengthening of our bodies and the reinvigorating of our minds and the awakening of our souls is, oftentimes, accompanied by a hard, unsympathetic indifference to the claims of our fellows upon us. Of course, it is not necessarily or invariably so; but I have often noticed that the man who says he cannot manage to take a holiday because of business pressure is so absorbed in mere money-spinning that his sympathies become narrowed, and the needs of his fellows find no large-hearted response from his abundance. Now, uninterrupted mingling with the hard and grinding and competitive conditions of life almost invariably tends to make a man more or less pessimistic. All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy—dull, stolid, despairing, or what is worse, suspicious. I do not under-estimate the value of human intercourse; man's duty is clearly amongst men; learning their triumphs and their failures, their sorrows and their joys, their difficulties and sins and virtues. But there should be in all cases, as far as possible, periods of relaxation, when other sides of the wondrous picture may be seen; when our pessimism shall be driven out of us ignominiously by the sheer joy of living which we feel, and when a season of refreshing shall come to us from the presence of the Lord. For after all that is the point which I want to emphasise.

The seasons of refreshing are not of the highest value unless they occur in the felt presence of God; and when a man really does think he is spending his time in such a way as to truly have God for a companion, what joy on earth can be compared to it? By his own confession, sad confession, the man who has given up his belief in God is not so happy as he was before. Therefore, I am devoutly thankful that in my own mind I am compelled to postulate God in order to arrive at any approximate solution of the mysteries of life. And certain it is that the more I examine and think about the wonders and glories of Nature the more my belief in a wise, creative, and sustaining deity becomes confirmed, though at the same time I am the more compelled to reject the dogmatic and presumptuous definitions of deity which have come down to us from a remote past.

How strange it would be, how confusing and demoralising it would be, if we had to admit that the mysteries by which we are surrounded, and also the glories which are only partially revealed to us, were not wholly understood and appreciated by some mind vast enough to hold them! One of the disappointing things about roaming through Nature by oneself is that when one comes across some scene that is ravishingly beautiful, one has to lament that one's wife or child or friend is not there to whom one can express the sentiments which the contemplation of such a scene provokes. And so, infinitely more satisfactory is it when we can stand on the sea-shore watching the great sea heave and swell under the influence of a mighty and mysterious force, or observe the wreaths of cloud curl round the heads of the majestic mountains, or take in one's hand the flower of the creeping geranium that clings to the moss-grown wall, and feel assured in our heart of hearts that the great permeating spirit of the universe knows all about it and loves it as a wise creator loves any beautiful and wonderful thing he has made!

*A Sermon preached at Moss Side, Manchester, on Sunday, July 23.

Such an attitude of mind and religious trustfulness is incomparably more refreshing than the mere recognition of Nature as a vast piece of mechanism whose wheels grind unconsciously, and which has no soul of like nature to our own though of infinite superiority.

And when a storm arises, and the sea is lashed into furious waves that threaten the lives of the mariners, when thunder-clouds creep o'er the land, and lightnings are hurled hither and thither, sometimes carrying destruction to man and beast, what a moral paralysis it is to think that there is no supreme mind that can see both the beginning and the end, and who knows that for the ultimate design it has in view all things work together for good! There is a comfort and a peace in the contemplation of Nature under opposite conditions past all expression. It brings strength to both soul and body. It makes a man ashamed of any selfishness which may have characterised him; it stirs within him resolves to work more strenuously than ever before; to seek intercourse and friendship with God not merely at holiday time, but always, even in the noise and turmoil of his city life; and to help God to establish there the harmony and joy and peace which we find so largely in Nature.

There God is the great musician. From early morning till late at night we hear no discords. The birds are singing, the bees are humming, the winds play through the trees and grasses like Æolian harps, and yet amidst the myriad sounds of Nature we can hear no discords; there is one continuous, delightful oratorio in which God is praised, and in which the spirit of hope reigns supreme.

And so the ambition with which one comes back from a holiday amidst the beauties of Nature, when one's refreshing has been in the felt presence of God, is to do what one can to sweeten and purify human life, to bring joy to those who are sore distressed, to place high ideals before those who now grope in darkness, to give hope to the despairing, faith to the doubting and to teach all to sing sincerely and heartily the angels' song, "Peace on earth, goodwill to men."

Friends, have you yet fully realised how grateful you ought to be when you return from your annual period of rest amidst God's glorious sunshine and flowering hedgerows and leafy woods and murmuring seas, with your skin tanned and your nerves re-strung and your heart young again, with your step elastic as the fawn's, and your whole system in tune like a harp of many strings? You can never repay God for the privilege. Build him a cathedral, and it is poor recompense; give your body to be burned, and it may please him not; but the one way, and the only way, to show your gratitude is through your love of the brethren, love that faileth not, love that makes the true music of life, love that smooths out the wrinkles of care, and that makes pain itself bearable and profitable. I know no other gospel that can compare with this. Seventeen years I have preached to you; and all that time I have sought in sciences and philosophies for the highest and noblest truths which I might place before you; and I have to confess, and I confess it gladly, that the simplest theme is also the greatest and strongest for the regeneration of souls, and that there is nothing so great or so divine in this world as love. And remember when you look upon God's works in the coming holidays, and regard him as a being to be adored as well as worshipped, that no man can love God whom he has not seen who has not first learned to love his brother man whom he has seen.

Let me once more briefly turn to my text: "Repent ye, therefore, and turn again, that your sins may be blotted out, that so there may come seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord." Yes, that is the order—repentance and then atonement and finally peace. The stubborn man, the arrogant man, who claims that he is perfect and incapable of improvement, that he has done nothing or omitted nothing that needs forgiveness of God, is not likely to have those seasons of refreshing come to him. Where there is true love there is humility, and the felt need of personal improvement. Pharisaim is not religion; even the despised publican was nearer the mark. Do not all honest men have visions of what might have been if ——! Ah well, let us not stultify our powers and opportunities by nursing vain regrets. Let us truly and manfully repent and turn again and pray God to forgive us, and help us to more fully and profitably live in the days that are in store for us. Let us seek reconcilement with God, strive to live in obedience to His laws, seek to harmonise our wills with His, worship Him in the beauty of holiness, trace His love as well as His power in everything, and then seasons of refreshing will assuredly come to us, and through us to our fellow mortals also. May the time hasten on when society as well as Nature will be filled with divinest harmonies.

"ARE THE CONSOLATIONS OF GOD TOO SMALL FOR THEE?"

A SHORT time ago the writer received a letter from a friend, a lady of wide culture and deeply religious spirit, closely attached to the Church of England. In this letter she referred to Unitarianism, speaking with appreciation of the rectitude, sincerity, and public spirit which characterises Unitarians, but adding that while she had always admired them for these reasons, she had always felt the deepest sympathy with them for their cold and joyless creed. It seemed to her that we Unitarians could not find in our religion that support and consolation which the orthodox faith gives to the devout believer, and it was a real grief to her that we should deliberately refuse the light and easy yoke of the true faith, and take upon ourselves the heavy burden of a creed which, however bracing to the moral sense, cannot comfort us in the hour of affliction, nor support us under tribulation.

Such ideas are far from uncommon. Constantly we hear references to the coldness of the Unitarian faith; we are told that we appeal to the intellect alone, that we have nothing to give in answer to the cry of the heart for help and comfort. Our teaching is said to be for the few who have the leisure and the education needed to appreciate and enter into metaphysical speculations and abstruse reasonings on ethical problems, not for the toiling, suffering many, who ask for a faith which shall comfort them in their trouble, and cheer them in their difficulties. People cry out for the bread of life, and it is said that we give them the stone of cold intellectualism.

We must admit that a religion which cannot afford consolation to the suffering multitudes of mankind will have but a limited influence. Such a religion was the Stoicism of ancient Greece and Rome; a religion noble and bracing, but as cold and hard as were many of the men who accepted it. It made no appeal to emotion or feeling; it taught the duty of crushing such emotion as completely as possible, and so it was and always remained the creed of a very few. Faith is the outcome of the necessities of life, not of the mind's reasoning, says a recent school of thinkers; and religion must recognise and meet these necessities if it is to have any vital influence. All the great world religions have sought to do so. One great source of the immense influence and power of the Catholic Church is the help and consolation it affords to the devout believers. How real is this comfort can be best known by those who have been much amongst the poor in such countries as Ireland, where the bulk of the population are at once very poor and passionately attached to their Church. I remember a pathetic little scene that moved me very much. At the foot of a lovely glen in Tipperary stands a wooden cross, raised by some good Catholic, in order that the passer-by may pause a moment, and be reminded of the suffering which was borne nineteen centuries before for the sake of humanity. As I stood looking at the cross, an old woman came slowly up the road, bent under a heavy sack carried on her shoulder. She put her load down by the road, and knelt before the cross for a few minutes in prayer, then rising took her load again, and went on her way up the glen to the little cabin on the mountain where she and her old husband won a scanty living from a patch of barren ground. But if the look on her face told the truth, the load was the lighter, and the steep road up the glen the less fatiguing for the few minutes' prayer. I was reminded of this only lately when reading of a brilliant scholar and man of the world, who joined the Catholic Church, not primarily because he believed its doctrine contained a greater measure of truth than those of the other Churches, but because in his Irish home he saw so much of the power of that Church to comfort, help, and console the poor peasants about him.

The appeals that this Church makes to her children contain in themselves the secret of her power. Cease to disobey, she cries: submit utterly and entirely to my discipline and rule, and then, since Christ died for you, and the Virgin Mother and the saints will intercede for you, you shall be forgiven. Do you doubt the reality of the love of God? See the proof of it, in the image over every altar, where God Himself is shown enduring the agonies of death in order that we may be saved from our sin. Do you doubt whether God cares for your sorrow? See the picture, to be found in nearly every pious Catholic home, where the mother of God stands, her heart pierced by seven swords, typifying the Divine sympathy with our earthly suffering. Do you fear to approach the All Holy and All Perfect in prayer, lest your petitions by reason of your sins should offend His ear? Then turn to some one of that choir invisible of saints, who will intercede for us at the Throne of Grace, and through whose merits, not through our own, our prayers will be answered. So the Catholic Church comforts the sick and sorrowing. It is in the doctrine of the Incarnation that the orthodox Protestant, in his turn, finds support in trouble. The writer heard a clergyman, now a distinguished professor, in one of our northern universities, say once that when he contemplated the spectacle of the sufferings and sins of humanity, suffering often apparently undeserved, sin often apparently incurred through want of knowledge or through the degrading conditions of life, he would find it impossible to keep his faith in the love of God if it were not for his belief in the Incarnation. Believing as he did that Christ was Incarnate God, he could trust in the love which was revealed in that life lived centuries ago in Palestine; he could turn in confidence to the Divine sympathy of one who blessed the little children, and said that to those who loved much, much would be forgiven. For such reasons they suppose that we Unitarians must find our creed such a hard one. We have no mediator between ourselves and God; no assurance of the love of God given by one who could say, I and my Father are one.

But is it really so? As I watched the peasant-woman kneeling before the Cross, it seemed to me that I, too, might kneel there, though it were with another meaning. The figure on the Cross to her was the symbol of Deity itself, showing how near the Divine will approach the human. To me it was the symbol of perfect humanity, and showed how near the human can approach the Divine. The Incarnation that we believe in is an Incarnation in the whole human race. Not in Christ alone was the Divine Spirit made manifest, but in every soul on earth is some portion of that Spirit, some ray of that light which lighteth every one that cometh into the world. No man calleth Christ Lord but by the Holy Spirit, for were the Spirit not in ourselves, how could we recognise that supreme manifestation of it which is in Christ? He is the Son of Man, that is the title he uses so often of himself, because though he is so infinitely above us, yet he is our elder brother, and had we the strength to follow his leading more faithfully, we would at length attain to the fulness of his perfect life.

What has all this to do with comfort and consolation, it may be asked. It has everything to do with the question. We need the belief in the love of God to enable us to bear our troubles. Now, this belief in the love of God must be based in the last resort on the love in our own hearts. By this Christ brings home to us the Father's love. He urges us not to torment ourselves by anxious cares, not to lose our true life, the life of the soul, through constant care for the outward things, which, though requisite and necessary, are not all, nor the best that is needed. And he bids us thus trust in the Divine love because we know what our limited human love would do if it could for those dear to us. We would give good gifts to our children, we would not refuse their cry for bread; how much more will our Father in heaven give good gifts to those who ask Him? Christ does not say "Believe in the love of God because I tell you He does love you." He says, "Believe in the love of God because you yourselves love." The love in our hearts is the truest and most abiding revelation of the love that is in the Father's heart. That is why the pure in heart are blessed with the perfect revelation of the Divine, because with such souls the love is pure and mirrors more perfectly that Divine love which dwells in them. But there is some spark of that love in us all. If we do not see it it is because we have not been "made wise to trace love's faint beginnings in mankind." When we look a little deeper we can trace the faint beginnings of love even in the storm and tempest of war, even in the strife and pressure of industrial life, even in the misery of the great cities. In that welter of blood and horror round the Eastern fortress city the Red Cross flag was sacred to both combatants, and once the awful struggle ceased, the wounded on both sides were cared for by the victors. In the fierce competition and the passionate quest for wealth which characterises much of our business life to-day, there are many who hold wealth as a trust, whose great possessions are as talents whereof they will have to give an account to their Lord. Even in the darkest regions of the great cities there are devoted souls keeping the lamp of love burning, sacrificing their own comfort and leisure if so they may bring some light to those who sit in darkness. It may be true that the creation groaneth and travaileth in pain, but we do not despair, for we are co-workers with God, working out our own salvation and that of the world.

But what of our own little lives? We may not despair of the world, we may see in history a slowly moving onward, an advance which, though often checked, is never wholly stopped. But we want more than this. We want some help to enable us to bear our own private burdens, our own small sorrows, small, yet great to us. Comfort can only be found through faith in ourselves and faith in God. And it is because our Unitarian creed teaches this faith that we can find a consolation, a joy in it, a support as real as that which the Catholic finds in the elaborate forms and ceremonies of his Church. We believe that we are saved by hope. We do not talk about poor fallen humanity. We believe that no matter how often we may fail in our effort to live a true and worthy life, no matter how far short our achievement may be of our aim, we shall be saved by hope. Is this not the teaching of Christ? He does not look to the magnitude of the service we can render, he looks to the effort we have made. In the great vision of the Last Judgment in St. Matthew the stress has been laid in the wrong place. It is not the division between the sheep and the goats that Christ wished to emphasise, not the eternity of the reward or of punishment meted out to the good or the bad. The emphasis should be placed in the lines that tell how the service has been rendered unknowingly even unto the least of these. Those who had fed the hungry or clothed the naked had thought little of this service, but "All service ranks the same with God: with Him there is no last nor first." That is at least one of the lessons of that scene.

The only thing that can keep a soul from God is despair. Our failures, our very sins cannot keep us away from God so long as there is alive in us the spirit that can say, "I will arise and go to my Father." Even if we have wandered into the far country, wasted much of our best powers and talents, yet there is hope for us when we come to ourselves.

But it is not only our failures and our faults that weigh us down. We are burdened by sorrow which seems to come through no fault of our own, by troubles which seem too many for us. To bear these trials we need the faith in a Living God who is all Power and all Love. This is the God in whom we Unitarians believe.

The poor Catholics may find their consolation in the thought of the redeeming love of Christ, of the tender sympathy and ever-ready intercession of the Mother of Sorrows. But we should find equal help in the thought of the Loving God with whom there is no need of mediation or intercession, who forgives much to those who love, who meets the prodigal while yet afar off. The love that was in the heart of Mary, that drew her to the side of the Cross and kept her there through those awful hours; the love that was in the heart of Christ when he sorrowed over the city that had rejected him and was about to put him to death—this love is but the evidence and sign of the greater love in the heart of God. We believe in the God who sends His rain in mercy on the unjust as well as on the just, whose sun shines on the wanderers as on those who tread the straight path, the God who by the mouth of His prophet said, "All souls are mine." And it is a Living God in whom we believe. If my friend finds such comfort in the thought that God so loved the world that He sent his best-loved son to reveal Himself to the world and to draw us to Him, surely I can find more comfort in the belief that God has been revealing Himself to us throughout all history. The clearest and most beautiful revelation was in the life and teaching of Christ; but not an age, not a people, has been left without His witnesses. He has made every nation on the earth to seek after Him, if haply they might find Him. He is not far from every one of us, and in Him we live and move and have our being. He has communed ever with the simple and loving and trusting heart. He is not the God of the dead, but the God of the living. He is working everywhere to-day, and whatever things are true and right these are from Him.

Is this a cold and barren creed? If we believe the love of God is so strong that no failure and no fault can ever estrange us from it; if we believe that the life of God is so real that we live in Him and He in us, and that He is close to us in all our sorrows, and that help will come if we will but lift our eyes to Him, surely we can find support in this belief. The consolations of God will not seem small to us if we have this faith in Him, and His word will deal very tenderly with us.

STATE INTERFERENCE.*

Sir,—Mr. Simon is certainly a very bold controversialist. He insists—as all Conservatives do—on the great improvements that have taken place in the condition of even the poorest of our people, but he declares that hardly an instance can be cited in which any of this improvement can be attributed to Governmental interference!

I have not the time, and you probably have not the space, for any adequate argument of the matter; but just take one or two of these improvements. The general health conditions for poor as well as rich are undoubtedly better than they ever were. Partly, no doubt, this is due to the advance of science; but has not sanitary legislation enforced the application of science for the general good? Our people are better educated; but does Mr. Simon seriously maintain that Governmental interference has had nothing to do with that? Within living memory half-naked women were playing the part of beasts of burden down in the coal mines, and young children's working hours in factories hardly left them time for sufficient sleep, to say nothing of play, and boys were sweeping chimneys by climbing up them, often under the stimulus of lighted paper beneath their naked feet. Does not Mr. Simon know that it was no moral suasion that effected improvements in these and a hundred similar matters, but the resolute interference of the State? Has not the State interfered for righteous weights and measures, for wholesome food, for better dwellings, for humane treatment of lunatics and the sick poor, and even criminals? And does Mr. Simon imagine that he disposes of all this by talking about "comparative non-interference"?

No doubt he would reckon among the greatest of our industrial advances the general rise in wages; and here, at least, I have no doubt he would say that the improvement has all been effected without legislative interference. Well, in a sense, it has, but only in a very limited sense. The State has not directly interfered to prescribe the rate of wages or working hours; but it has fully recognised the equity and expediency of such prescription, and it has deliberately empowered the workers to form trade unions and to decide these matters for themselves, as they never could have done so long as they were a mere disorganised mob, every man fighting for his own hand.

The fact is, it is not only untrue to say that hardly an instance can be cited where Governmental interference has been beneficial, but the real truth is almost the converse of this. It is extremely difficult to point to any great advance in our social conditions which has not been directly brought about by State legislation giving effective power to the enlightened conscience or the community. That has been one mode of progress in the past, and there is not a problem now confronting us which, if solved at all, will not have to be solved in the same way.

THE MEETINGS AT GENEVA.

Sir,—The representatives and visitors from Great Britain and Ireland will be interested to learn that the religious service in La Chapelle des Maccabées, Geneva, on Sunday afternoon, August 27, at five o'clock (Swiss time), will be conducted by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, of Leeds, and the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham.

The list of members from the British Isles (Scotland is now represented) is at the printers, and if any of your readers will be in Switzerland at the end of August, and would like to attend the meetings, I shall be glad if they will apply for their membership tickets not later than Thursday next, August 10, so that their names may be included in the list when printed. There are now, I am glad to say, 200 names on the Essex Hall list.

Railway tickets, programmes, "Pension" addresses, &c., will be posted from London to all who have paid for their tickets on Wednesday, August 16. The Essex Hall party will depart from Victoria Station on Friday, August 25, at 10 a.m., travelling by way of Newhaven, Dieppe, and Paris, and arriving at Geneva on Saturday morning at 7.21 a.m. The Rev. F. W. Stanley, Chairman of the General Purposes Sub-Committee, will be at Victoria Station, as well as myself, soon after 9 a.m., and we shall be pleased to render any assistance in our power to members of the party. As the party is now much larger than I anticipated, it is important that everyone should be at the railway station in good time, especially those who desire to register their luggage.

THE LATE REV. ARTHUR HARVIE.

Sir,—A few friends of our late devoted and earnest co-worker, the Rev. Arthur Harvie, knowing the consecration of his life to all good things, and also the needs of his bereaved family, have made a private appeal to some generous souls for a fund to supplement any aid that may come from the Ministers' Benevolent Society; and they have met with a kind and generous response. But the time has arrived when that fund, which is not as large as could be desired, must be closed. Before that day comes there may be friends throughout the country who hitherto have not known of this effort, and who would wish to be associated with this ministry of helpfulness. If so, and they will communicate with me, I shall gratefully acknowledge their contributions.

IMMORTALITY.

Sir,—As another old reader of The Inquirer, I ask leave to say with how much interest and sympathy I have read Mrs. Hind's letter on "Immortality" in your issue of July 22. Of the "series of changes" to be passed through subsequently to this life, of course we know nothing; but that the "soul," or active principle of thought and life in each of us, derives from the primal Fount of being, has long appeared to me to be the only view consistent with reason and with our present knowledge of the universe. I must, however, demur to your own verbal (?) correction, which your correspondent has so courteously though, I venture to think, rather hastily accepted. It is, I presume, intended to suggest that for the production of each one of the many million "souls" that are coming into existence every day, there is required a distinct act of creative will. But is not this just one of those unverifiable propositions in which it has been said theologians are fond of indulging? I do not see why it should be desired, nor do I think it is possible, to reconcile the two opposing theories of creation and emanation. It has been said that the doctrine of the Immanence of God is the special gain of the nineteenth century. With this the theory of emanation is surely more in accord than that of special creation.

Robert B. Drummond.

[It was no question as between special creation and emanation that prompted our note to Mrs. Hind's first letter, but a question of the abiding relation of the soul to God, and this we were glad that our correspondent at once recognised.—Ed. Inq.]

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Bedfield (Suffolk Village Mission).—On Sunday, July 16, Mr. G. A. King, of Norwich, conducted the anniversary services in connection with the Sunday-school. The little chapel, which was erected during the ministry of Rev. A. Amey, looked very attractive, standing in its own piece of ground, which showed quite a wealth of roses and summer flowers. The rain had passed over, and the sun shone brightly as the scholars, teachers, and some parents assembled in the building on the Sunday afternoon. Mr. Smith presided at the harmonium, and the scholars rendered their hymns most creditably. Mr. King, in his address, told anew the story of the good Samaritan, urging the young people to follow its lessons. After tea a march was made to Monk Soham, where on an open space outside the old smithy, kindly lent by Mr. Elliott, a service was held, when short addresses were given by Mr. Newell and Mr. King. The singing was very hearty and was lead by a concertina under the skilful handling of Mr. Smith.

Cirencester.—The annual Sunday-school sermons were preached on Sunday, July 23, by the Rev. Henry Austin. Special anthems were sung by the choir and children, and the church was prettily decorated for the occasion.

Park Lane, near Wigan.—On Wednesday evening, July 26, a crowded meeting was held in the rooms of the Y.M.C.A., at which a beautifully illuminated address was presented to the Rev J. E. Stead, who has now left the district and taken charge of the Christian Church, Mossley, near Manchester. The address is surrounded by photographs of the President, Col. Rd. Pilkington, M.P., C.B., and all the members of the committee. The several speakers referred to Mr. Stead's connection with the institution since its formation, and of the manner in which he had taken a most active interest in every branch of its work, and also in its various amusements. He had shown that a Unitarian can do Christian work and manifest the truly Christian spirit in his intercourse with the young men of that Association, and his departure from their midst would mean a very great loss to them all.

Portsmouth: St. Thomas's-street.—On Sunday last the members of the local friendly societies attended a special service, the Ancient Order of Foresters and the Buffaloes being in regalia; about two hundred were present. The service, conducted by the minister, Mr. T. Bond, was most inspiring and helpful. Mr. Bond welcomed the visitors on behalf of the trustees and congregation. Being a worker himself for nearly fifty years, and holding a most responsible office as treasurer of the Portsmouth district, Ancient Order of Foresters, he could bear witness to the good work done by associations such as those represented that evening, and as they had secured stability through the work of their predecessors, so he felt sure that their successors would benefit by their experiences. A legacy of £25, less duty, from a friend of Mr. Bond's, has recently been received by the congregation.

Stannington (Farewell Presentation).—The Rev. Iden Payne closed his ministry at Underbank Chapel on Sunday last, when large congregations assembled. His ministry at Stannington has lasted 21 years, and his whole term of service has been no less than 63 years. He commenced in 1842 at Rolvenden (Kent), and subesquent ministries were at Deal, Northampton, Southampton, Congleton, Holbeck, and Stannington. He is now in his 84th year, and retires through failing health to a well-earned leisure, which all his friends up and down the country will wish he may enjoy for some years to come. He intends to take up his residence in Sheffield. On Wednesday a farewell tea was held in the schoolroom, which was very largely attended, and was followed by a public meeting in the chapel. Mr. M. J. Hunter, acting chairman of the trustees, presided. The devotional service was conducted by Rev. A. H. Dolphin, of Sheffield. Apologies were read from the Revs. Chas. Hargrove, Wm. Stephens, and J. Lee (Congregationalist, of Loxley). The Rev. C. J. Street, of Sheffield, spoke first on behalf of the congregations and ministers of the district. The Rev. Samuel Parks (vicar of Stannington) and Mr. A. Mallinson (Wesleyan local preacher) both spoke as old friends and fellow-workers during the whole of Mr. Payne's Stannington ministry. Mr. A. Vickers, a local trustee and member of the congregation, testified to the excellent work he had done and to the respect and affection in which he was held. The Chairman then, with a few appropriate words, made a presentation to Mr. Payne of a cheque for £247 7s., representing the gifts of members of the Stannington and district congregations, as well as contributions from various friends, and particularly from the places in which he had formerly ministered, and explained that of this sum £24 14s. would continue to be paid annually during the lifetime of Mr. Payne. The intimation of these facts was received with satisfaction and applause by the meeting. The Rev. Iden Payne then made a touching response, in which he said that his whole ministry had been happy and a work of love; and, while he thanked with all his heart those who contributed to this testimonial, which would relieve his declining years of anxiety, he prayed that God's blessing might rest upon the whole congregation, and that by their lives they might show forth the glory of the faith which they professed. A vote of thanks to the Chairman was proposed by the Rev. Wm. Blazeby and seconded by Rev. Wm. Mellor (son-in-law of Mr. Payne), who expressed the thanks of the family. The benediction was pronounced by Mr. Payne.

Taunton.—The annual Flower Show in connection with the Mary-street Sunday-school was successfully held on Thursday, July 27, and was kindly opened by the Mayoress, Mrs. J. Lewis. A musical programme was rendered during the afternoon, to which the children contributed three songs. The prizes were distributed by the Rev. J. Worthington, formerly minister at Mary-street. The Rev. Rudolf Davis and Mr. Charbonnier, of Bristol, were among those present. Mr. G. Philpott proposed, and Mr. J. Duckworth seconded, the vote of thanks to the Mayoress; and Mr. Worthington proposed the vote of thanks to the secretaries, Miss Venner and Miss A. Philpott.

"Never writer wrote with deeper conviction than George Gissing; every sentence has come straight from the heart, and this fact alone, apart from its artistic merit, gives a poignancy and strength to his work which separates it at once from the common ruck of novel-writing. These books are terrible arraignments of life—their peculiar characteristic is this poignancy, this parting of life at its moments of unbearable crisis. Between misery and despair lies a whole world of difference; misery is what can be endured—despair is the unbearable, and George Gissing is the spokesman of Despair."—Jane H. Findlater, in the National Review.

"Fate set him for his life-task the study of the swarming miseries of our human ant-heaps and the pettinesses of our mortal nature. 'The Nether World,' 'New Grub Street,' 'Demos,' 'The Odd Women,' 'The Whirlpool,'—these are all monumental titles, mighty themes. None of his contemporaries in England—only Zola and Tolstoi anywhere else—even attempted to wrestle with such big canvases, and if Gissing did not always rise to the height of his great argument, the conception was at least Herculean."—I. Zangwill, in To-Day.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Editor requests that during August all correspondence may be sent to the Office of THE INQUIRER, and not to his private address.

IT is very gratifying to hear that the first 500 copies of Mr. Carpenter's "James Martineau" are disposed of, and there are several fresh orders waiting. A second issue of this book will be ready in a few days, and will contain a full index. Purchasers of copies of the first issue can obtain the index separately on sending 1d. for postage to Essex Hall.

CORRESPONDENCE in The Times on the subject of the Athanasian Creed has produced some sufficiently definite expressions of opinion. Mr. Berdmore Compton, on August 8, supplemented an earlier letter of the Dean of Lichfield's by noting in the Anti-Athanasian party a desire "to ignore the glory of God in the punishment of the faithless," which he declared was "part of the Christian's hope of glory." To this Archdeacon Wilberforce replied on Wednesday :—

"I do not anticipate that you will open "your columns to a practically defunct "theological controversy; but, as one of "those described by Mr. Berdmore Comp-"ton as Anti-Athanasian, permit me to "express my conviction that Atheism itself "is less irreverent and less harmful to the "Christian Faith than the blasphemy "against the responsible Originator of all "things contained in the statement that "the 'glory of God is promoted by the "punishment of the faithless.' The objec-"tion to the Quicunque Vult, however, "extends far beyond the absurd and "uncharitable damnatory clauses."

THE August number of Sermons for the Day (Liverpool Booksellers' Co. 1d.) contains a sermon by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong with the title "Unspotted from the World." The sermon was preached in Hope-street Church, Liverpool, June 26, 1904. The monastic ideal, the preacher said, had not availed to keep men unspotted from the world; not so should we attempt to escape the dangers of living in the world; the natural relations of family and corporate life were to be accepted, but a man must be watchful, and use the safeguards within his reach against contamination by the evil he would inevitably meet. To cherish a high and pure ideal of life was one such safeguard. Another was thus described :—

"You must have quiet converse in quiet "times with quiet thoughts and affections "touching the holier things, or you will "be engulfed in the stormy waters and "your soul will go down to the depths. He "whose duty takes him among foul odours "and insanitary surroundings is far more "likely to keep his health if, in the "evenings, he has a quiet home amid pure "air and balmy scents than if night and "day alike he breathes the fœtid atmos-"phere. And he who has to encounter in "his daily business the diseases of the "social state, avarice and dishonour, "untruth and impurity, is far more likely "to keep 'unspotted' if daily or weekly "he has his still times of reflection, his "converse with a wife who loves him, "or children who can chase away his "cares, or chief of all with God, the silent "Friend, who is ready always with His "counsels to the seeking soul."

THE Methodist newspapers, and others that are not Methodist, speak with great respect of the late Rev. F. W. Bourne, who for about fifty-four years was a Bible Christian minister; who served the denomination to which he belonged in many capacities and with much ability and faithfulness, and passed away the other day at the ripe age of seventy-five years. The work by which Mr. Bourne is chiefly known outside Methodism is the curious little biography called "The King's Son, a Memoir of Billy Bray." It abounds in delightful stories illustrating the Cornish Methodist's simplicity and shrewdness, his faith and his faithfulness, his belief in the marvellous, and his own marvellous doings. It is not a story, one would be inclined to say, that could give much scope for literary art. Yet there is true Boswellian talent in the way in which Billy is allowed to be his own biographer; and the sober remarks of the editor as he introduces or closes one of Billy's stories, are really effective as a sort of framework in which Billy's strange character is presented. How many copies have been sold will perhaps be presently ascertained. The copy on our desk, dated 1886, is marked "Twenty-fourth Edition," and the little book continues to sell amid all changes of thought and fashion.

AGAINST THE WAR SPIRIT.

SIR,—In a recent speech before the Lads' Drill Association, Earl Roberts urged that arms and ammunition should be supplied to schools by the War Office, and that rifle shooting should be made a part of the educational course. The noble lord also suggested that the cost of this special training should be paid for out of educational funds. The Committee of the International Arbitration and Peace Association feel bound to protest against this fresh and audacious attempt to introduce military ideas and ideals into the schools of this country, and to misapply funds granted for legitimate purposes of education. Surely the time has arrived for training the youth of the nation in regard and esteem for the people of other countries, in hatred of war and bloodshed, and in a knowledge of the triumphs of arbitration as a substitute for the arbitrament of the sword.

The Committee believes that one of the most effective steps which can be taken to check the encroachments of the military party is to enlarge the scope of historical teaching, at present woefully narrow, in schools, and it is confident, that by learning more of the history of other nations, the youth of the country would be led to respect and admire the achievements of those nations, in literature, science and art, and would thus turn with horror from the bloodstained glories of the battle-field, purchased by the humiliation of others, to the peaceful triumphs of civil life by which all the peoples of the earth are alike benefited.

We shall be glad to hear from any sympathisers willing to help in the work of opposing the dangerous new departure advocated by Earl Roberts.

FELIX MOSCHELES, Chairman,
J. FREDK. GREEN, Secretary.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

"INTERNATIONALISM must become the very foundation of concord." So writes M. de Pressensé at the conclusion of his article on "England, France, Germany, and the Peace of the World," with which this month's Contemporary opens. It is an article of the greatest interest, in which the writer clearly expresses his conviction that M. Delcassé brought his country very near to a great disaster, and rejoices in the triumph of wiser counsels. He points to the ruinous military and naval budgets of this country. "More than seventy-two millions sterling are annually thrown into this abyss." And in other countries there is a similar wasteful burden heaped up. Referring to the proposal for some agreement to check the fatal rivalry of armaments, he says:—

"There was a time not so very far "back when England would have taken, "along with France, the lead in so "glorious an undertaking. Unhappily, "Imperialism is born. The fatherland of "Adam Smith and Cobden is become the "favourite hunting-ground of the sophists "of Protection and Reciprocity. The "nation which seemed the first to be "cured of gross militarism, of the spirit of "conquest and territorial expansion, is "now drunk with the opium of a new "Imperialism and of a warlike Jingoism." [Not the whole nation, happily!] "Mr. "Chamberlain preaches to all and every-"one that Germany is the predestined "rival of Great Britain in commerce, in "industry, in naval power, in war, in "everything, and that sooner or later a "conflict is unavoidable between two "locomotives launched at full speed on "the same rails in opposite directions. "Such prophecies have a knack of getting "themselves realised by sheer iteration. "It is for France a sacred duty, while "working heartily for a sincere friendship "with both nations, to develop all her "strength against a dreadful encounter. "Times are ripe for a higher, broader "policy. We cannot satisfy ourselves by "a one-sided agreement with one or the "other of these two great empires. We "must have before our eyes a greater and "nobler ideal." M. de Pressensé's hope is set on the sanity of the working classes in all three countries. They have declared for peace and have affirmed their solidarity. "Democracy has given to the world a splendid proof of her maturity and of her wisdom." The ideal he finds in "the United States of the World, the free federation of peaceful, self-governing, and social democracies."

Next in this number we have the lecture delivered by M. Paul Sabatier last June in the Kensington Town Hall on "The Evolution of Religion in France." The lecture gives most welcome insight into several notable movements, having their origin not in the churches, but in the moral impulse of earnest and quite unorthodox people, and making for nobler and fuller religious life in the future. The Dreyfus Case M. Sabatier regards as marking the point of departure, and a profound crisis, in the moral life of the people. It was, he says, "a test of the conscience of a new France." The first place among these new and more hopeful movements he gives to the Union pour l'Action Morale (with its headquarters at 152, Rue de Vaugirard, Paris xv.). For the past thirteen years this Union has issued a monthly bulletin (eleven francs a year), and unites in its efforts many remarkable men—Paul Desjardins, author of Devoir Présent and other works, which M. Sabatier urges us to read; Deherme, the journeyman printer, who edits the monthly Coopération d'Idéas (six francs a year, 234, Faubourg S. Antoine, Paris xiii.); Gabriel Séailles, "the chaplain of free-thought in France"; Charles Wagner, "the exiled pastor from Alsace, good, true, simple, and jovial as a mountaineer from the Vosges, vibrating with enthusiasm, life, and youth, to whose pulpit steps come Catholics, Jews, and free-thinkers in greater crowds than the Protestants"; the Abbé Huvelin and many other priests, "who at the Union feel, as one of them said to me, that they are growing stronger, more human, and more capable of marching forward." Other workers in this cause M. Sabatier names, but these are sufficient to indicate the breadth of its range. Its watchword, printed on each number of the Bulletin, is "We are forming in broad daylight, without reserve and without mystery, an active union, a lay militant order for private and social duty, the living kernel of the society of the future." The Union, says M. Sabatier, is neither a coterie, nor a party, nor a sect, nor a church, nor an academy, nor a society. Yet there is a deep unity amongst all those men, "collected from the opposite quarters of the intellectual, political, social, and religious horizon." They all believe in duty, "a superior instinct which must be awakened, a joyous and living harmony because it conforms to our true nature"; and they believe in science and in the future. "To put it all in one phrase, they have the scientific brain and the religious soul." For the other movements classed with this (which include that of the Abbé Loisy) we must refer our readers to M. Sabatier's most instructive and eloquent lecture. Among other articles in the Contemporary we note "Hora Mortis Nostrae," by F.R.C.S., which should be comforting to any who are afraid of the physical fact of death, "Occupations of the People," by J. A. Hobson, and "The Spiritual Side of Mr. Swinburne's Genius," by George Barlow.

In the Nineteenth Century and After the Rev. Dr. W. St. Clair Tisdall writes on "The Hebrew and the Babylonian Cosmologies," suggesting that it is by no means proved that the Hebrews got theirs from Babylon, and Mr. Stephen Paget on "The Influence of Berkeley," of which the secret is said to be his love of common sense. Perhaps the article most worthy of public attention in this number is that by Mrs. Huth Jackson on "Housekeeping and National Well-being." It should lead educated women to ask themselves some searching questions. Note that it is written by a woman. We simply quote one passage:—

"This want of common knowledge "among the poor has been, I know, "widely deplored and commented upon, "especially lately; but I think those who "condemn their working-women sisters "scarcely realise their own deficiencies. "There is but one way to improve the "physique of the children of the nation, "and that is to teach the women all the "old domestic duties which were the "pride and joy of their grandmothers—"to teach them to bake, to sew, to cook, "and, above all, how to treat a baby, and "how to treat themselves before the said "baby makes its appearance. This could "very easily be done if the well-to-do "women were willing to teach them; but "how many of the women of the middle "or upper classes do know any of these "things? And is it fair to expect the "lower classes to be thrifty housewives "and wise mothers when we, who are so "much better educated, better nurtured, "and better housed, are, many of us, "such a dismal failure? For we do fail, "on the whole, though there are doubtless "individual exceptions."

The Independent Review has a very interesting article by Baron Suyematsu on "Japanese Education," and a most refreshing summer article by Hilaire Belloc "On Making Hay." Mr. Lathbury, writing on "Liberal Intolerance," pleads for a Catholic university for Ireland which will be such as to satisfy the serious demand of the people themselves, and Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson calls attention to "The Newest Philosophy," apropos of Mr. Santayana's "Life of Reason," the Pragmatism, Humanism, "perhaps most aptly described by Mr. Schiller's shameless pun as a 'Trialectic,' a 'Try-it-on.'"

In The World's Work and Play, one of the illustrated articles is on the Japanese "Ju-Jitsu: The New Exercise." The serial, "Education of an Artist," which has some fine illustrations, takes its enthusiast through Paris to Italy. An article on "What the Public Libraries are doing for Children," by Mr. Ernest H. Baker, furnishes some very gratifying information:—"Just forty years ago a "public library took the first step in the "work of providing special books for "young readers. In 1865 Birkenhead "began to issue books to children, and in "1881 a children's library was set apart, "with a catalogue of its own. In 1882 "the first separate children's library was "built at Nottingham, through the "generosity of Mr. Samuel Morley, M.P. "In 1884 the public library at Leeds "placed small collections of books in the "board schools, and ten years later gave "the same privilege to the children in the "voluntary schools. But one of the "most energetic pioneers in the work of "cultivating the juvenile reader was the "Bootle public library, which in 1891 "undertook to supply the children in the "primary schools with books from the "central library by means of a fortnightly "delivery." And then the article goes on to tell of the admirable work done at Cardiff through lectures to children at the reference library, illustrated by books, pictures, &c., and in the establishment of school libraries, and there is further information about children's reading rooms, as in Manchester and Liverpool. Reference is also made to what is done in America.

LITERATURE.

A SOUL'S AWAKENING.

Hard to receive is the dogma, whatever is, is best. Yet nothing can more effectively wrest from us a recognition of its truth than to see how things ignoble, by attracting retribution, perform their own purification. The last prose work,* written while in prison by that perverse and aberrant genius Oscar Wilde, bears witness to the power of punishment in making clean the foul places of a man's life. A convict's cell does not usually bring the thought, "This is none other but the house of God, and this the gate of heaven. Rather do the indignant lines of Coleridge's "Dungeon" recur to the mind :—

> "And this the place our forefathers made for man!
> This is the process of our love and wisdom,
> To each poor brother who offends against us—
> Is this the only cure? Merciful God!"

The author of "De Profundis" knew by experience how the prison turns the hearts of men, like its own cold, bare walls, into stone. And he looks, like Coleridge, to the great simple primeval things of air and sky and earth and sea, for the healing of his own wounds as of other wandering and distempered children of nature.

"Nature whose sweet rains fall on unjust and just alike, will have clefts in the rocks where I may hide, and secret valleys in whose silence I may weep undisturbed. She will hang the night with stars so that I may walk abroad in the darkness without stumbling, and send the wind over my foot-prints so that none may track me to my hurt; she will cleanse me in great waters, and with bitter herbs make me whole."

This passage will serve to show that the craft of weaving beautiful words, the magic of style that distinguish his poems, dramas, and prose essays have not been lost; it will also illustrate the fact that a different man is uttering this agonised cry out of depths, from the inordinately clever, witty, and brilliant writer who promulgated a new standard of values in accordance with which art must shun the true and the natural. As declared in his Intentions, "all bad poetry springs from genuine feeling. To be natural is to be obvious, and to be obvious is to be inartistic."

The painful charm of "De Profundis" is the pitiful naturalness of its intense humanity. Every mask is torn off, the soul in uttermost anguish laid bare. "I allowed pleasure to dominate me. I ended in horrible disgrace. There is only one thing for me now, absolute humility."

And this change came by way of the convict's narrow dungeon. "Prison life makes one see people and things as they really are." In that lonely silence of the darkened cell, in the hours of reflection wherein is no whirr of the wheels of time to drive away the vultures of remorse, the treasures men waste through a too familiar use, grow dear after a season of deprivation; the fame and honour they too easily win, and too lightly hold, assume a nobler worth let fallen in the mire as things of naught.

Wilde did not and could not regard his sins in the light that St. Augustine or John Bunyan viewed their more slender faults. But in what he calls the "ethical evolution" of his character, they wrought upon him a similar psychological effect. The book is a confession, yet a confession in which the necessity of his sin is seen. His aim had always been to seek self-realisation and the road of sensuality had brought him into self-abasement. It was a bitter experience, but carried with it its own repudiation.

With perfect candour he unmasks the heinousness of the wrong he had done himself. There is no more pathetic passage than one in which he relates how a friend came to see him, avowing belief in his utter innocence, only to receive the shock of disillusion from his hero's own lips.

In time, the cleansing fires burnt out his shame. The chastisement of suffering made clean his heart. "People who use phrases without wisdom sometimes talk of sufferings as a mystery. It is really a revelation." With the falling of the scales from his eyes came a new courage to accept his punishment; to submit to his lot; and with that acceptance a new energy rose within the soul which brought a new spirit and began for him a new life.

That new spirit, though somewhat too eloquently set forth to be so named, he calls humility. There are periods that savour a little of the megalomania of the Decadents, but one must charitably suppose them to be inspired by a sense of the greatness of the height from which their author deemed he had fallen so low.

He had, moreover, to teach himself not to be ashamed of his imprisonment, for "if one is ashamed of having been punished, one might just as well never have been punished at all." Then he had to learn to be cheerful, the duty of happiness. From this lesson a longing to do fresh and better work is engendered, but death prevented its realisation. With a recognition that suffering has its use in the world, came a great sympathy for those whom sorrow hath marked out for her own, and an understanding of one who became the mouthpiece of those who are "dumb under oppression, and whose silence is heard only of God."

Each monotonous day is by him begun by reading in the Greek Testament a portion of the "four prose poems" in which the life of Christ is chronicled. "He understood the leprosy of the leper, the darkness of the blind, the fierce misery of those who live for pleasure, the strange poverty of the rich." In very tender and gracious words that are as a sweet incense offered in reverence on a ruined shrine, he speaks of the Man of Sorrows, with whom "all who come in contact, in some way find that the ugliness of their sin is taken away and the beauty of their sorrow revealed to them."

Of the morality of society and the religion of the churches he does not conceal his contempt. "Neither religion, morality, nor reason can help me at all. I am a born antinomian." Nevertheless, the morality of Jesus, which is sympathy, constrains him. When he gives frank expression to the new mode of self-realisation he proposes, the first aim of which is "to free myself from any bitterness of feeling against the world;" and adds that though completely penniless, and absolutely homeless, he will not mind, provided he has love in his heart, we acknowledge that he has not missed the secret of Jesus.

Professing to be of those who cannot believe, the Confraternity of the Faithless, he comes as near to belief as it is possible without believing. Surely the limits of Agnosticism have been overstepped when the agnostic can say that "love of some kind is the only possible explanation of the extraordinary amount of suffering that there is in the world," and that he cannot conceive of any other explanation because in no other way could the soul of man, for whom the world was made, reach the full stature of its perfection.

The perusal of "De Profundis" as a chapter of self-revelation won through suffering, helps us to understand the remark sometimes made to young unbelievers by aged folk, "you have not yet suffered enough."

"The fact that God loves man (says Oscar Wilde) shows us that in the divine order of ideal things it is written that eternal love is to be given to what is eternally unworthy" (p. 103).

"I am conscious now that behind all this beauty, satisfying though it may be, there is some spirit hidden of which the painted forms and shapes are but modes of manifestation, and it is with this spirit that I desire to become in harmony" (p. 149).

To this anchorage, which is in essence the anchorage of religious faith, after many vagaries in weird waters and visits to forbidden lands, after slothful ease in becalmed seas and facing of wild tempests, did this strange ship of a soul come at last to rest. But only for a while, for the one clear call came from across the bar, to put out to another sea, whereon, we may hope, the fires of sense flare not at all, and a benigner sun gleams, unsetting.

HYMN-BOOKS WITH TUNES.*

We congratulate Mr. Garrett Horder on having been able at last to issue his well-known hymn-book in an edition with tunes, an edition admirable in every way, the music, for the size of the page, wonderfully clearly printed, and the selection of the tunes, so far as we have been able to judge, most excellent. First published as "Congregational Hymns" twenty-one years ago, the collection was considerably enlarged by the addition of a supplement in 1894, and after that received the name of "Worship Song." For this new edition with tunes, it has been again carefully revised, a good many of the hymns less suited for public worship "in this new century," being omitted, and some fresh material being added. The book now contains 803 hymns, of which one section of nearly 50 hymns is devoted to "The Young," and another, of over 30 hymns to "People's Meetings." "Worship Song" is used both in Congregational and Baptist churches of the more liberal sort. "I strongly suspect" George Macdonald has said, "that this is the best of the hymn books." Lovers of hymns, to whatever church they may belong, will find pleasure in this book. It is admirably adapted for home as well as congregational use.

Side by side with Mr. Horder's book we place "The New Hymnal," which is anonymous, but is offered as a successor for the new generation, to Dr. Martineau's "Hymns of Praise and Prayer," for the use of the adherents of Liberal Christianity, in the Broad Churches of Nonconformity. A circular which has been issued respecting the book announced that it "has been compiled by a few friends for use in Churches of the Liberal Faith," and this is signed on behalf of the compilers by Joseph Wood, Chairman; George H. Leigh, Treasurer; and Henry Gow, Secretary. It is a new book of 658 hymns, and in the fellowship of our churches naturally challenges comparison with the Revised Essex Hall Hymnal. A full notice of the book, both as to the hymns and the tunes, we reserve until after the summer holidays; but note in passing that some account of the book will be found in this month's Seed Sower. Here, at the moment, we would simply bespeak for the "New Hymnal" serious and sympathetic attention. The editors express the hope that their book will be found of great service in family gatherings, and that, we believe, will certainly prove to be the case. It is a great thing to have a really well-edited hymn-book, with the tunes on the same page, and the editors of this book, no less than Mr. Garrett Horder, are to be congratulated in their achievement.

We will take this opportunity of adding a list of errata for the index of authors. A good many of the entries appear to have been copied from other books several years old, and have not been brought up to date. The following dates of the death of authors should be added:—

Mrs. C. F. Alexander, 1895. (And the year of her birth, according to the Dictionary of National Biography, is 1818, not 1823.)
William Bright, 1901.
J. W. Chadwick, 1904 (not 1905).
J. J. Daniell, 1898.
W. C. Dix, 1898.
Thomas Hincks, 1899.
W. W. How, 1897.
A. A. Livermore, 1892.
W. Tidd Matson, 1899.
T. B. Pollock, 1896.
Godfrey Thring, 1903.
Lawrence Tuttiett, 1897.
Richard Wilton, 1903.

The following dates may also be added:—

Mrs. E. D. Cheney (1824–1904).
A. C. Coxe (1818–1896).
T. G. Crippen, b. 1841.
Mrs. Hemans, b. 1793 (not 1794).
C. M. Packard, b. 1839.
M. Rinckart (1586–1649).

For Marcan read Marean.

Add: L. Guggenberger, 515.
P. M. Higginson, 511 (wrongly given in the index to T. W. Higginson).

Strike out the name of William Lamport, and add the hymn 632 to W. E. Hickson.

In the INQUIRER of October 22, 1898, we gave some account of this national hymn, "God Bless Our Native Land."

The New Hymnal appears to have copied from the recent edition of Dr. Hunter's "Hymns of Faith and Life" the mistake of attributing this hymn to the Rev. W. Lamport. There can, so far as we see, be no shadow of doubt that the hymn was written by Mr. Hickson, as first published in his "Singing Master" (London, 1836). There are at least two other independent hymns of the same form and first line, but of none of these was Mr. Lamport the author.

SHORT NOTICES.

Letters Home. By Charles Hargrove, M.A., Minister of Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, Delegate of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to the Unitarians of Australia and New Zealand, 1904. In this little book of 148 pages Mr. Hargrove has reprinted the letters he sent home to his congregation in the course of his voyage to Australia, during his missionary journey there and in New Zealand, and on the way home by way of the Pacific and America. These letters include the most interesting journal of his unexpected detention on the island of Tutuila, Samoa. And then follow the twelve letters sent to THE INQUIRER—the first from Perth, Western Australia, May 15, 1904; the tenth from Wellington, New Zealand, October 4, 1904; the last two written at Leeds in January of the present year, after Mr. Hargrove's return, telling of his departure from New Zealand on October 15, with something of what intervened, and his safe arrival in Liverpool on Saturday, December 17. The letters, as our readers are aware, contain a most interesting record of the journey, and it is pleasant to have them gathered up in this form, to keep. (Leeds: Henry Walker. 1s. net. And at Essex Hall.)

Short Sermons for Children. By Three Cousins. New Edition. In 1882 the first volume of these sermons appeared, and received so warm a welcome that two years later a second was issued. Each contained eighteen sermons, and the three Cousins, finding that their addresses, originally given from the superintendent's desk at the Sunday morning service in the Portland Schools, are still valued and asked for, have consented to this new edition in one volume, selected from the material of the other two. Now, also, the names of the three cousins are given, which was no secret before. Eight of the addresses in the new little book are by Miss Mary Martineau, four by Miss M. C. Martineau, and six by Miss Gertrude Martineau, who, to readers of our Children's Column, is a special friend. "Little Duties," "Undaunted," "Love of Justice," "Light in Darkness," "Heroism," "Sacrifice," "The Good Samaritan," "Firm to Resist," "Returning Good for Evil," "Faithful Unto Death" are among the [subjects] of [the [addresses. Those who have long known and valued these "Short Sermons" will give a cordial welcome to the new edition, and will be glad to let others know how helpful it may be both to those who have to take children's services and for home use. (Sunday School Association, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 1s. net.)

The Life of John Knox. By the Rev. Thomas M'Crie, D.D., is appropriately re-issued in a cheap and clearly printed edition in this year, the four hundredth anniversary of the birth of the great Scottish reformer. Dr. M'Crie's work, which is spoken of in the "Dictionary of National Biography" as "a work of genius and erudition," was first published in 1812. He himself died in 1835. (T. CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

THE REV. T. P. SPEDDING ON THE OPEN BROTHERHOOD WHILE PLEADING FOR HIS "UNITARIAN VAN."

SIR,—Mr. Spedding appears to have gone out of his way in his zealous advocacy of his new machinery, to throw somewhat ungracious ridicule on others who, in their own way, are endeavouring to serve God and man as conscientiously as he wishes to do, under their, perhaps, more Christian association in Open Brotherhood. Some of his statements appear to me to be not true, and others certainly misleading. In effect, he says that those people are of necessity sectarians, moved by sectarian zeal for sectarian triumph.

He accuses them of breathing out threatenings against Unitarians, and appears to stigmatise by what he nicknames cosmopolitan those who plead for Open Brotherhood, and whom he seems further to characterise as "anti-Unitarians within the fold." He further informs your readers that he loves the world, but loves his own home better, and therefore will have his Unitarian Van, and that it shall travel for Unitarianism, and that its addresses shall be positively Unitarian, without being controversial. I think my summary is about correct.

I, too, with him have received occasionally pamphlets relating to Open Brotherhood, but Mr. Spedding seems obviously to misconceive his facts. I am happy to find myself with others in that Open Brotherhood.

So far as I know, it has no separate agency, no constitution, no officers, no list of members; it has no meetings, and never discusses sectarian matters, and never attempts to impose any laws or any reasoning of its own on the mind of any brother or anyone else. So far as I understand, the O.B. unites any who plead for the open door to our national conferences on religious matters, and who would invite to them both the Unitarians and the Trinitarians (how I do hate those unreligious dogmatisms), and who would hail alike subscribers to creeds as well as those who will not so commit themselves, leaving the onus of refusal with those who would not come.

Now Unitarians, if they will really faithfully act up to their pretensions and their often proclaimed principles, can do this as no others yet even desire to do.

By day and night for ever the door of personal worship and personal benevolence must remain open, in unaffected piety and every benevolent contribution of talent.

Mr. Spedding cannot possibly show that O.B. is sectarian. Perhaps he is himself incapable of hearing any other appeal; but that is his misfortune, and by no means any fault of companions who only and always claim to associate in love.

The O.B. never breaks out into "threatenings against Unitarians."

The only appeal made by it is against any recognition of the dogmatic bonds or fences invented by men now long dead. You could not sectarianise the O.B. if you tried. The elements which constitute it do not lend themselves to such crystallisation, beautiful as it may seem, and fatally mineralised. The cunningest chemist can neither organise nor reduce them, however determinedly he keeps the company and the lessons of the Scribes and Pharisees—whom the Master so exposed and dismissed.

Mr. Spedding figures his "cosmopolitan" as a citizen of nowhere, who, he adds, essays to embrace the world with his feet that are never on the ground. Does he so comfort his Unitarianism?

The fact is quite the other way. The Christian Cosmopolitan of O.B. can truly say with the old sage:—

> 'Tis not one town, nor one poor single house
> That is my country, but in every land
> Each city and each dwelling seems to me
> A place for my reception, ready-made, and like Wesley he can say, "The world is my parish."

O.B. needs no van to take a living gospel to its neighbours, Wherever they may be, together or severally, and in whatsoever company they make life a living epistle from heart to heart, which the natural man on either side shall realise, whatever the mere talker with tongues may try to put in his way. It is not true that O.B. feet are never on the ground!

If there be a better way of carrying a soul-saving gospel to those within and without Christian fellowship, pray, sir, entreat Mr. Spedding to show it.

What does he mean by his "anti-Unitarians within the fold"? There are many Unitarians who refuse to acknowledge a Unitarian fold at all; who will neither be led nor driven into it; who are content with the fellowship of their own home or their own meeting-house, and refuse to recognise in either temple sullen dogmas of extinct theologians. By what liberty does any more righteous person assume to insult men and women who refuse to work for God or man by any noisy sentimentalism, by utterly false imputation of anti-Unitarianism.

Mr. Spedding, pleading for his van, says that "he loves the world, but loves his own home better." I presume he assumes to speak as a minister of the gospel, and at the same time to fortify his sectarian van?

Is not this a very reversal, a very rejection of the very essence of the gospel of Jesus? That is to say, personal sacrifice for the good of others. Is it not a palpable rejection of the second great commandment, for which Jesus Himself laid down His life? Does it not actually plead to love oneself more than one's neighbour?

Mr. Spedding talks about avoiding controversy in addresses from his van. All very well! His address may possibly be so free. But what about that silent preacher, the painted or perhaps gilded "Unitarianism," in front of which he takes his stand? The Unitarian van itself will always be, and is int nded to be a perpetual challenge to every curate and every local preacher.

What a fine sight it will be when the orthodox missioner and the heterodox missioner challenge each other in the market place. The O.B. will have none of that sort of thing. Practically and theologically I am a Unitarian, but I have no Unitarianism, I will not carry it about, and I will only offer to the best of my power what I believe to be very much better, "the open brotherhood, the Christianity of Jesus, and the Kingdom of God within," in which stand the faith, the hope, the love of the brothers, for some of whom I now sign,

R. D. DARBISHIRE.

BEDFORD COLLEGE FOR WOMEN.

SIR,—The correspondence on Bedford College and its needs, carries my memory back to the days, more than a generation ago, when the idea of a women's college first appeared on my horizon with all its social and intellectual opportunities. "Going to college" was a sort of apotheosis of boyhood, and the very idea of a "women's college," to which she might go, was like a dream of Elysium to many a high-spirited girl fretting against the limitations of her life.

I am thinking of about the time when Aurora Leigh came out, with its noble and stimulating discontent and rebellion against the inferior intellectual position in those days allotted to women by men, and its insistence on their being tried by the same standards, and not having allowances made for them as for inferior creatures, of whom nothing great could possibly be expected. I know absolutely nothing of the present-day politics of Bedford College. I am a sort of Rip van Winkle, without even the advantage of revisiting the scenes of his youth, but reached in his sleepy hollow by echoes from the world through his INQUIRER. These echoes have awakened old memories, and I should be troubled indeed if Bedford College, whose infancy I so well remember, and which is now in its lusty youth, were to be crippled or die. There must, I think, always be a function for women's colleges, even when women are admitted to the others, and I should think there would be a gradually increasing sphere for them in the future. The great ambition of girls in the old days was to prove that they could learn all that was expected of men, and for that it was essential that they should learn the same things, and pass the same examinations. But now that their capacity to learn is proved up to the hilt, now that they have proved what they can do, they will gradually study more and more to find out what they had better do, so that in all probability the education of men and women will tend rather to differentiate than to assimilate in the future.

But however that may be—and prophecies as to future developments can only be surmises—Bedford College has proved its right to live, and deserves to live. The absolute freedom from religious tests is a point that should appeal especially to readers of the INQUIRER, and its importance cannot be exaggerated.

Many of the colleges for men owe large endowments to the bounty of women in the past, and it is to be hoped that in the present emergency some women of wealth may be moved to endow one for their own sex, and that, on the other hand, some men who have profited by the generosity of ancient dames at the old universities, and have prospered since, may redress the balance by repaying the women what they and their peers have received from them.

One aspect of the case which has escaped notice in this correspondence strikes me very strongly. We are told that the present dilemma of Bedford College is caused by "the refusal of the ground landlord to renew the lease or to sell." Is it right that this arbitrary power should rest in the hands of one man? This incident should surely set us thinking of the economic problem of the enormous wealth accruing to ground landlords in towns at the expense of the community, by the falling in of building leases.

Liverpool. CLARA ARMSTRONG.

THE GENEVA MEETINGS.

SIR,—Mr. Bowie's leaflet of instructions to those who are going to the meetings at Geneva, is very good. May I add a piece of advice to those who are visiting Switzerland for the first time, as experienced travellers do not stand in need of it. It is, keep well. I have been away with large parties twice, once to Palestine, and once to Hungary, and on both occasions I found that five per cent. of my fellow travellers took ill. On the journey to Hungary in 1901, two of our friends were ill at Vienna on the way out, and had to remain in bed while the rest of us were enjoying ourselves, one, if not both, had to have a doctor.

Now, illness may be avoided by a little care and forethought. For the first few days we should live as nearly as possible as we live at home. The sea voyage —however calm—the long railway journey, the excitement of a large party, and the loss of rest are very fatiguing, and the change of climate and strange food have an unsettling effect on some people. After a long journey it is very tempting to partake of a good square meal. Well, they do it at their peril. What they require is a good rest and light food. Don't despise tea and bread and butter. Don't touch for the first few days any dish that is at all mysterious. Some people have a horror of water anywhere out of England. I believe the water of Geneva is good, but to make assurance doubly sure, ask for hot water at meals. It is readily supplied at hotels and pensions. After lunch and dinner, a cup of very weak tea without milk, but with plenty of sugar, is refreshing and wholesome. With a slice of lemon in it, it is delicious. After four or five days less caution is needed.

If these precautions are taken I can promise all who have not previously visited Geneva a glorious time.

Stalybridge. W. HARRISON.

WE scarcely believe what we see of the triumphs of the Cross. This is the most disastrous unbelief of our times. I am pointed now and then to an infidel, as he is called—a man who denies Christianity. But there is a sadder sight. It is that of thousands and millions who profess Christianity, but have no faith in its power to accomplish the work to which it is ordained, no faith in the power of Christ over the passions, prejudices, and corrupt institutions of men, no faith in the end of his mission, in the regenerating energy of his spirit and truth.—Channing.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. A. B. HAMILTON.

THE Rev. A. B. Hamilton, of Banbridge, co. Down, who passed away on the last day of July at the age of forty-seven, was a native of Saintfield, in that same county, where his father was an orthodox minister. His mother also was a minister's daughter, so he doubly inherited the impulse toward that calling in life which he ultimately chose. Trained at Queen's College, Belfast, and Trinity College, Dublin, where he graduated, gaining also the degree of LL.B. in the Royal University of Ireland, Mr. Hamilton at one time practised as a barrister at Dublin, but in 1891 became minister of the First Church, Banbridge, where he remained to the end. One service he rendered to his congregation was to obtain by means of a Chancery suit the sale of the meeting house of the second congregation, which had been closed, of which the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong was at one time the minister. Mr. Hamilton had served as President of the Non-subscribing Association, and as Moderator of the Remonstrant Synod, of Ulster. The large attendance at the funeral, which took place on Wednesday, Aug. 2, testified to the sense of public loss. Among those present were some twelve brother ministers, and the Revs. R. J. Orr, T. Dunkerley, and S. H. Mellone took part with a local clergyman in the service. The interment was at Saintfield.

WALTER LEWIN.

MANY friends will grieve to hear of the death of Mr. Walter Lewin, of Birkenhead, at the early age of fifty-two. For some months he had been in declining health, suffering from heart trouble, and on Monday last, at his residence, Park View, Bebington, he passed peacefully away.

Walter Lewin was the son of Mr. S. Lewin, of Wallasey, who was in business as a wine merchant in Liverpool, and the great-grandson of the Rev. Robert Lewin, minister of Benn's Garden, and afterwards of Renshaw-street Chapel, Liverpool, who died in 1816. For some years he was in business in Liverpool, but at heart he was always a man of letters, and for the past twenty years was able to devote himself to his chosen pursuit. His first published article, which he wrote as a boy of eight, appeared in the old Sunday School Penny Magazine.

A friend writes of him as follows in the Birkenhead News, with which he was for some years connected:—

"His life had been lived so quietly, and his work—even the best of it—was accomplished with such modesty and lack of parade, that hundreds who have read his words and been influenced by his thoughts never came to know in any real sense what manner of man he was. Such must inevitably be, more or less, the lot of the anonymous journalist.

"Walter Lewin was a journalist of high ability. Perhaps it is permissible to one writing in these columns to say that his connection with any paper meant the importation of intellect, tone, and personality which were bound to give added character and vitality to its pages. His individuality was undeniable. An article by Lewin, whatever the topic, was like no one else's; it was his own, and whether agreeing or disagreeing with the argument, one laid it down with respect for the writer. In life and habit almost a recluse, in thought and outlook he was a strenuous citizen of the world. He was at once a pronounced Radical, a keen individualist, and a fervent humanitarian. He never shrank from the advocacy of causes which, however unpopular in themselves, enlisted his sympathy; hence his adhesion to movements like the Anti-vivisectionist, of which he was always a loyal henchman. He had the gift of a terse and trenchant style, and few could excel him in putting a case—for the added reason that with him his case was always his conscience.

"But Lewin was not only a journalist; he was a man of letters. Probably few men in this country had so intimate a knowledge of American literature. His claims in this connection received frequent recognition from such journals as the Spectator, the Academy, and the Bookman. To all of these he was, from time to time, a welcome contributor, while quite recently he reviewed in the Hibbert Journal the 'Life of Moncure D. Conway.'

"As regards his personality, though at many points it was so elusive, nothing could exceed the geniality of his disposition and his unvarying kindness of heart to all with whom he came into contact. One might differ from Lewin; one could never quarrel with him. And now that he is gone, I am strangely reminded of his own words, written of another, a dozen years ago. They occur at the close of the introductory chapter to his 'Life of Clarke Aspinall,' and seem to me to embody much that was essentially characteristic of himself:—'His life, full as it was of energetic purpose, was not what is usually termed an eventful life. He was self-contained. His individuality was marked and intense. Wisely or unwisely, he lived his own life, and was the echo of no other. Much as he liked to be approved, he went, not any conventional way, but always his own way, through life.'"

"Method, simplicity, and modesty," another friend notes as his chief characteristics. He was a great lover of his books and of his garden, a devoted Emersonian, who had made a special study of the New England Transcendentalists; much in their methods and spirit was congenial to his own idealist sympathies. He was an editor of fine taste, as may be seen from his work on the "Camelot Series of Classics" and the "Canterbury Poets." THE INQUIRER also was indebted to Mr. Lewin for valued contributions, and we must join with other friends in a tribute of respect to his memory and of sympathy with his relatives.

I CALL that mind free which sets no bounds to its love, which is not imprisoned in itself or in a sect.—Channing.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A SEASIDE HOLIDAY.

III.

By the time our holiday makers had returned to Brookside the twilight was deepening into dusk, and they were quite ready for their evening meal, and then for a good night's rest, after a long day of delightful experiences—a day to be remembered all the rest of their lives as one of the happiest. So, with challenges and promises to be "the first to get up in the morning," they bade each other "good-night" and went to bed—all, except Uncle Ned.

When the others were well out of the way Uncle Ned set to work to unpack a large wooden case which he had most carefully seen gently placed in the carrier's cart on their arrival at the station, and of which he had warned the driver to take special care—lest, if its contents were in any way injured, he might have to pay heavy damages.

This case, which was rather heavy, contained some empty jam jars and small glass tanks, and three glass cake covers with knob handles, such as confectioners place over their piles of cakes or sandwiches to keep them fresh. These covers, when turned the other way up and placed on wooden stands, make excellent aquariums, and, along with the small glass tanks and jam jars, they were destined to hold sea-water, and to display to the greatest advantage the wonderful and beautiful living creatures placed in them.

Then there was a box containing a microscope, and some other apparatus needful for the capture and investigation of creatures which live in the sea in countless myriads, and which are too small to be seen without the help of strong magnifiers. Packed all around these things were some yards of "mull" muslin and white bunting, and knots of stout cordage and whip-cord. In one corner was a small box of tools along with rolls of copper and galvanised iron wire. Indeed, I hardly think I could tell you, in the whole space of a "Children's Column" all the things so neatly tucked into that wonderful case. There were specimen tubes, and half a dozen bottles full of queer-looking and queerer smelling mixtures, some of them labelled POISON. There were strong needles and stout thread, and strips of twilled calico; and, lastly, there was a small hoop of iron such as little boys are content to trundle along the streets until they get too big and "must have a cycle."

All these things were unpacked in a room on the door of which Uncle Ned fixed a card, on which the following notice was plainly lettered:—

THE OGRE'S DEN!

PRIVATE!

No admission except on business.

"Abandon hope all ye who enter here"

Signed—UNCLE NED.

This room was Uncle Ned's work-room and museum, and, as he explained next day, admission to it was conditioned on perfectly good behaviour. It was to be considered a great privilege to be allowed to enter it, as in it would be displayed all the good things captured in the domains of Father Neptune (that is the sea, you know).

Uncle Ned knew from experience the ways of some boys (and girls too!)—not of all, mind you—but of some, who, when they get near a microscope, or other delicate piece of workmanship, want to handle it and "see what's inside," or, if they see a living creature, want to stir it up with a stick and tease it, "just to see what it will do."

Uncle Ned had taken great pains to get all these things ready, and to transfer them to Brookside, not for himself, but for the boys and girls whom he loved dearly; and he wanted them to have the best possible chance of seeing the most and the deepest and the best they could, and to realise how wonderful is this world of life in which we live, and how magnificent are the sights to be seen in it if we will but truly see them. But Uncle Ned well knew that such sights are only to be seen by those who are earnest and reverent—not by those who are merely triflers, idly inquisitive; so, to enter his workroom was a privilege to be gained and kept only by being worthy of it.

Quite two hours he spent in emptying the case of its contents, and in arranging the things on two strong deal tables. One table was placed in front of the window and the other on the opposite side of the room. There were also sets of plain deal shelves fixed against the walls, and in these he set out the bottles labelled poison, and the specimen-tubes, and some books on sea-life and plant-life.

When all these were duly arranged he proceeded to pour the sea-water, which the boys and girls had brought back, into the glass aquariums and tanks, and then, all being in readiness for the morrow, he retired to rest, well satisfied with the first day of his holiday.

Next morning the boys, who slept in a large room overlooking the farmyard, were awakened by the barking of Nip, who was having his first lesson in the work of a farmer's dog. Scot was helping his master to bring in the cows from the meadow to be milked, and Nip, who already looked upon himself as one of the farm staff, was doing whatever he saw Scot do—only, Scot saved his legs and his lungs, and went about fetching the cows in a quiet, business-like way, whilst Nip ran wildly here and there, and barked and yelped as if he were mad. Every now and then he got nearer to one old cow than she approved, and down went her head threateningly, and down too went Nip's tail between his legs, and off he scampered, evidently with the idea that a dog "who barks and runs away will live to bark another day."

As soon as the last cow was well in the yard Scot knew that his work was finished for a while, so he threw himself down on the ground in the bright morning sunshine, and lolled his long pink tongue out, panting and displaying his lovely white teeth, with a good-natured dog's smile; and Nip, who by this time considered Scot the cleverest dog in the world, laid down by his side and lolled his tongue out, and panted and smiled, and made sudden snaps at the flies which came round in a buzzing crowd to admire and tease him.

Then Maggie Banks—the farmer's daughter—set to work milking the cows, and it would have done you dwellers in smoky towns good to have heard the sound of the milk streaming and hissing against the side of the brightly polished tin as she milked.

On the other side of the house the two girls were sleeping in a room which overlooked the garden and the brook. This room had lovely old-fashioned lattice windows, which had been wisely left opened by the girls, and the bright sunshine, streaming in and falling on their faces in the morning, awoke them to a glad new day. The scent of rose, honeysuckle, and mignonette came in at the open window, and to be awakened to the joy of another such day seemed to these town-dwelling school-girls too good and sweet for this earth. They could hardly spare time to dress, for first one thing and then another claimed their attention, and they would run to the window to wonder and admire. Now a flock of white-winged tern flew past in wheeling circles; then a big dragon fly, fresh from the brook, flew in at the window and frightened them a little, though they admired his blue and green coat of mail and his four wide-spreading gauzy wings. They were greatly interested in one very big bird with large fan-like wings which flew up the stream towards the woods, flapping its great wings slowly and gracefully, stretching its legs out behind to balance itself, and curving its long neck. Neither of the girls knew the bird, though Elsie guessed it might be a stork; she was wrong, however, for it was a heron.

Just as they were ready to go downstairs they went to the window for another look-out, and saw Uncle Ned and the boys starting off for their morning dip in the sea, and along with them ran Nip and Scot. Scot had got a holiday! And this was how it came about. When the bathers were leaving the farmyard by the field-path, Ernest whistled for the dogs to follow them. Nip did so gladly enough, but Scot stood quite still, his tail wagging slowly and apologetically, as if to say, "I'd like to come, but I may be wanted in the yard," and so Ernest might whistle and call as much as he liked, but Scot would not budge. Then Farmer Banks, seeing how matters stood, explained to the boys that the dog knew that his duty lay in the farmyard, to be ready to take the cows back to the field after milking.

"He's a good dog, is Scot," said the farmer, "and he could teach many a boy and man what fidelity to duty is." Then he patted the good collie affectionately on the head, and looked down on him and said quietly, "Would ye like to go wi' 'em, lad?" and Scot wagged his tail and barked joyfully, which means "Yes," and the farmer answered him, "Good dog, go!" and pointed towards the others, and then Scot knew he had got a seaside holiday too, and bounded after them in great glee, Nip tearing along at his side as glad as Scot himself.

As there is no more room in this week's column, I must save the rest for next week.

WILLIAM RATHBONE.

A LIFE of WILLIAM RATHBONE by his daughter was sure of a warm welcome from a very wide circle of friends, and it is not surprising that a second impression of Miss ELEANOR RATHBONE's book * should have been called for in a month after its first publication. The preface refers to the "familiar pitfalls that lie in the path of anyone who attempts to write about the life of a very near relation." We have read this book with growing admiration for the quiet strength and clear insight and the unfailing tact with which a difficult task has been performed. One cannot, indeed, be unaware of the touch of reverent and intimate affection; it would have been unnatural and a distinct loss to the book if it had not been so; but this is never allowed to interfere with the sound judgment of the competent historian. The book is not simply a personal record for private friends, it is a memoir in which the life of the nation and the great movements of the time are pictured in true proportions, as necessary for the adequate portraiture of such a man.

No one will grudge the first fifty-four pages devoted to a brief record of four other WILLIAM RATHBONES of Liverpool, a most remarkable succession in direct line from father to son, each in turn head of the firm established by the first of them early in the eighteenth century. This WILLIAM RATHBONE was a native of Gawsworth, near Macclesfield, where he was born in 1696 (his father also was WILLIAM) and he died at Liverpool in 1746. He had been brought up a churchman, but, some sixteen years before his death, became a convinced member of the Society of Friends. His father also not long afterwards "received the truth." His grandson was decidedly unorthodox in matters of doctrine, though staunch as ever to the true spirit of life in the Society; and his great-grandson, father of the WILLIAM RATHBONE of the Memoir, married a Unitarian, ELIZABETH GREG. Thus two noble traditions of integrity, of good citizenship, of earnest Christian piety, and practical beneficence of a very high order united in the moulding of this one life, of which the record proves how ample was its fulfilment—true always, with a genuine humility, to the inward light and rich beyond most in its achieved beneficence.

Of other influences upon the young man's life the most fruitful was undoubtedly that of the ministry and the friendship of JOHN HAMILTON THOM, who became minister of Renshaw-street Chapel, where the RATHBONES were members, in 1831, and seven years later married a daughter of the family. His future brother-in-law had early felt the power of direct appeal in his ministry. Many years afterwards he told how deeply he had been moved by that sermon which Mr. THOM preached on Christmas Day, 1835, out of which sprang the Liverpool Domestic Mission. The test of discipleship he found in CHRIST'S own words, "The poor have the Gospel preached to them," and then asked them to consider what their own Christianity was worth.

"I was then just entering on the world's work," Mr. RATHBONE said, "with all the hopes and aspirations of seventeen, and I felt so strongly the truth of the preacher's words that, had I not doubted my power of influencing others by speech, I believe I should have abandoned the desk for work in the streets and courts of our town. I remained in the work for which circumstances seemed to destine me, and am grateful for success beyond my deserts or most ambitious thoughts. But I feel now as I felt then, that had I possessed the necessary powers successfully to carry CHRIST'S Gospel of peace and hope and purity to the toiling and suffering, it would be a success far nobler, worthier, and more to be desired than any other whatever."

While Mr. RATHBONE did not abandon his work as a merchant, his whole life, both in business and in public service, was quickened and directed by that lofty spirit which found such persuasive and searching expression in Mr. THOM'S ministry as he interpreted to his hearers the "Laws of Life after the Mind of CHRIST." Towards the end of the Memoir, Miss RATHBONE gives a true and beautiful description of her father's religion, from which these passages are taken:—

"Of what his own religious life meant to him the reader will, if is hoped, have gathered something as he went along from the preceding narrative of the incidents and work of his life. For it was in these, rather than in words, that he revealed most of himself and of his religious beliefs. He interpreted his own discipleship of CHRIST very literally, as something that should not only govern the inward spiritual life, but should condition and direct his activities of every kind. The ultimate implicit aim of all public work, conducted in the right spirit, was, in his view, to make the conditions of national and civic or individual life a little less out of harmony with the ideal of a kingdom of GOD on earth. To keep this end ever before the mind as the sole end; never to allow considerations of personal advantage, or ambition, or credit, to influence by a hair's breadth decisions in work undertaken ostensibly for the public benefit; never even for the sake of securing an advantage for the particular cause or object at which he was working, to consent to sacrifice to it wider interests or principles of right and justice—all this seemed to him implied in his religious profession. It would probably be hardly too much to say that every important decision he had to make presented itself more or less consciously to his mind as a question of right and wrong.

"Except to his children and to those for whom he felt a direct responsibility, he did not speak often or easily on the high theme of religion, although he had none of the unconquerable reticence about it which makes speech almost a physical impossibility to many people. But no one could work with him or live near him long without feeling the presence of the hidden springs that were the source of his energy and his strength, and without catching glimpses of the foundations upon which his faith and hope for humanity, and his charity towards men, were based. Many types of goodness are independent of a definite religious faith, and seem to flourish as well without it, but his type was not one of these. It was his belief in the providence of GOD and in the immortality of man that justified his unfailing optimism, that made his perennial hopefulness different from the mere buoyancy of high animal spirits, and made the almost universal charity of his judgments different from that which proceeds from a facile and shallow good-nature. The principle upon which he so often insisted, that whatever ought to be done can be done, was to him a necessary deduction from his religious faith, and there can be no doubt that it was his unhesitating reliance upon this principle that enabled him to accomplish so much. It gave him faith in his cause and confidence in himself; and his confidence, visible through the medium of his natural humility, kindled in others who knew nothing of its source a faith resembling his own."

The story of Mr. RATHBONE'S working life as here recorded is of the deepest interest, and can hardly fail to waken in others the desire—as by his personal devotion and enthusiasm he did so constantly during his lifetime—to give of their best for such unselfish service. It is all told in clear, unaffected narrative—the story of the first strenuous years of his business career, the beginnings of his social work, his service as an ardent politician in Liverpool and then for twenty-seven years in Parliament; his great work as originator of the system of district nursing (fruitful of such untold blessing to the poor), how he was instrumental in reforming the nursing in workhouse infirmaries, and what he did in the establishment of training schools and homes for nurses, crowned by the great success of the "Queen VICTORIA Jubilee Institute for Nurses"—work done in such a spirit that when he passed away FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE sent a wreath inscribed: "In remembrance and humble love of one of GOD'S best and greatest sons"; what he did at the time of the Cotton Famine in Lancashire and for the cause of peace and national honour in the anxious days of the Alabama and LAIRD'S rams; his practical interest in true principles and methods of charity administration, his more than thirty years of service as Guardian of the Poor on the Liverpool Select Vestry, his work and influence as a private member in Parliament and as one of the founders of the Liverpool University College and afterwards of the University College of North Wales. As one reads, the impression grows that this was a very noble life, steadfastly devoted to unselfish ends, faithful in many quiet ways of lowly service, and therefore ready when the great occasions came.

There are two points in this record to which we should be glad to draw special attention—the principles of expenditure which, with the possession and the prospect of increasing wealth, Mr. RATHBONE early laid down for himself, and the significance in his life of the lowly service which, in more ways than one, he took upon himself. Of the former we shall hope to find another occasion to speak more fully; as to the latter, we note especially that for years in his early married life, when he was closely engaged in the growing business of his firm, he acted regularly as a visitor for the Provident Society, every week going from house to house in certain streets of a poor district collecting the savings of the people. Thus he gained an intimate knowledge of the conditions of life among the poor, which not only quickened his sympathies and directed the efforts of his wise and generous helpfulness, but gave him experience which was of the highest practical value for his later work in Parliament. So also when the system of District Nursing was established in Liverpool he once did for about a year the work of one of the Lady Superintendents, going with the nurse weekly to visit her patients, attending to the accounts, and in other ways coming into close touch with every detail of that service. It was thoroughly characteristic of the man, ready and willing in the humblest path of duty, to use to the utmost of his strength whatever talent was committed to his care, and so by the discipline of service constantly increasing in himself that power of helpfulness which only sympathy and love can give.

There are other things we should have been glad to say about this book, but must be content with a final word of sincerest gratitude for such a gift, and a confident endorsement of the hope that the reading of this Memoir of WILLIAM RATHBONE may "encourage others, especially young men and women in his own city, to trace out for themselves more definitely, and to follow more boldly, a career of public usefulness."

BEDFORD COLLEGE FOR WOMEN.

THE correspondence that has taken place in our columns on the subject of the appeal for funds to establish Bedford College on a basis of permanent independence naturally raises many reflections on the changes that have taken place in the last half-century. Those of us who are old enough to retain a vivid impression of the moral and social atmosphere and aspirations of those days and these, may question many things, but will hardly challenge two impressions—firstly, that in middle-class life in England mere snobbishness is an immensely less effective and aggresive force than it was half a century ago; and, secondly, that the middle-class girl has larger opportunities, and is encouraged to indulge in nobler ambitions than she was then. The connection of these two things is obvious, and they may, perhaps, both be included in the statement that whatever ground for misgivings there may be in the social and moral conditions of our age, and however much we may fear that for the last fifteen or twenty years we have in many respects been going through a period of moral and social slackness and reaction, it is nevertheless true that there has been a steadily growing number of young men and women in middle-class England who have started life with personal wishes and personal conceptions of the life they desire themselves to lead, which are neither sordid nor vulgar. Whether or not this is an age of great moral passions and aspirations, it does at least seem—in spite of all we hear of bridge parties and the doings of "our betters" generally—to be an age in which an ever-increasing number of Englishmen care for things worth caring for, and wish, at the lowest, to be rationally happy rather than ostentatiously to display the material symbols of wealth and prosperity.

It seems probable that the improved education of women has been a factor of immense importance in securing this result: While much remains to be done, we have at least made a beginning towards taking a girl's intellectual life seriously, and believing that her spiritual ambitions are not mere self-indulgence or wicked discontent with the blessings which an unappreciated providence has heaped upon her in the smug comfort and opportunities for frivolity provided for her in her home.

Some five-and-twenty years ago a number of women were discussing the problem of female education, and one of them declared that it all really hinged on the question of an extra fire in middle-class homes. In other words, the girls' studies were not taken seriously. They were to be conducted in the midst of family discussions and interrupted by family demands. Sewing machines, rolling-pins, and calling-cards were to be her organa, and it would be monstrous extravagance to light a fire in order to give her a quiet room to study in and ensure that her intellectual occupations should be respected: Have we changed all that? No, and perhaps we never shall. A certain serviceableness and willingness to follow the pressure of the communal wants of the small domestic society seems to be a permanent factor in the typical female character, in contrast with the stubborn and relentless self-assertion and refusal to be deflected that characterises men folk, strenuous and self-indulgent alike: We have not changed it all, and perhaps never shall. But we have changed some of it, to the enormous advantage of all concerned. And in this great work Bedford College has borne a noble part.

It would be tempting, did space permit, to compare some of the hopes and fears which greeted the dawn of the movement for the higher education of women with the results that are already discernable from it. It would be tempting, again, to dwell on the reminiscences suggested by the list of early teachers. De Morgan, of deathless memory. Scott, whose personal influence was so immeasurably deeper than any tangible record which he has left can explain. Newman, whose explanations to a backward student were so enlightening that those who followed him most easily were always glad when a less intelligent companion had to be brought into line; for the further exposition would not be a mere repetition, but a taking up of the thing from some new point of view, a fetching of light upon it from some new quarter, that would enlarge and confirm the knowledge of those who had best understood. Later on, Kinkel and George Macdonald, names less illustrious in the annals of scholarships, but still cherished in many a grateful heart, and associated with first conceptions of the worlds of art and literature, and first fascinating glimpses down the vistas which they revealed; and Beesley, amongst whose many services to his time not the least is his unconsciously impressing upon hundreds of English girls the value in the formation of character of severe and unpretentious scholarship. But enough! The theme will not end, so we must cut off the discourse.

Bedford College was started by Mrs. Reid with £1,500. If the fifty years and more that have since elapsed have not multiplied by a hundred the conviction of the beneficence of the work and its vital significance to our national and personal well-being, England is hard to teach. The £150,000 to establish the approved work ought to come at least as easily as the £1,500 that launched the noble experiment.

WATTS—THE PAINTER OF ETERNAL TRUTHS.

III.

MAMMON.

"THE utmost for the highest," was Watts's motto. This he applied not only to the pictorial visions expressing his faith, but in his practical relations with men. He served not Mammon, but God.

Watts was grieved and saddened by the dreariness and unhappiness of much of the life he saw. The ugliness of the ordinary surroundings of the lives of the people, and the things they used, impressed him deeply. He had no special or grievous trouble of his own, but the great trouble of humanity put things for him in a minor key.

He tried in many ways to cause the appreciation of the beautiful, and to give opportunities for its enjoyment. For example, he offered to paint the hall of Euston railway station with frescoes without payment, but the directors of the London and North Western Railway Company refused. He offered to decorate the north end of the great hall of Lincoln's Inn with a fresco representing "The School of Legation," and did so, producing a fine work. The Benchers made him a gift, but he wanted nothing for his labours. His "Time, Death, and Judgment," is in mosaic in a panel above the fountain as St. Jude's, Whitechapel. He and Mrs. Watts devoted themselves to the Home Arts and Industries Association, whose object was the resuscitation of the old handicrafts. Pottery works were established near his home at Limnerslease, and a school to teach young people to make goods artistic and adapted to use. The effort here and elsewhere was to awaken the artistic instinct which has been smothered by modern machine manufacture and by steam power. He desired to restore home handicrafts, shearing and carding wool, spinning, weaving, dyeing, bleaching, the making of linen, the growth and use of flax. The women who did such work had the pride of their art, endeavoured to make their work as good as possible, put themselves and their artistic sense into it, worked for use and with joy; not for selling, not for making money, profit, and trading it away for gain.

He saw and tried to restore to his neighbours the joy and grace and glory of common things. He wished we could be like the ancient Thebans, and think of, and do, whatever things are pure and lovely, and of good report.

The downright ugliness of dress, the long rows of dreary suburban roads, and workmen's dwellings, in modern towns; the terrible violation of beauty in crowded places of public use, such as railway stations and "pleasure resorts" he deplored. The influence of these things on health, morals, and spirit, he saw to be very great. People are insensibly affected by them. In these things he felt deeply with Ruskin, and set to work to teach by his pictures—his best way of expression—and by such means as those already mentioned, a better way, and to do something to bring into being a fairer way of life, to restore joy and creative delight to men.

At Compton, near his home at Limnerslease, Watts provided money for laying out grounds and building a home of the dead. The Home Arts and Industries Association assisted. He earned the money by painting pictures. Mrs. Watts took a great part in the work, and she explains that the symbolism, &c., was all designed to give on the walls some fragments of "the story of the spiritual life, on the wing of which,, in the passage between the mystery of birth and the mystery of death, material life is lifted to the glorious consciousness of its affinity with the infinite," Villagers did the work of this mortuary chapel, brick-making, beating iron, &c., by hand with simple materials, producing artistic results, and developing their natural powers, while Watts was the chief director of their efforts, and his wife took great part in the enterprise.

No one could ever hire Watts or induce him to work under conditions untrue to his own ideal. He was full of sympathy and admiration for others' methods, but did not adopt them.

The painting of portraits was his largest source of income, but it is noticeable that his subjects include men and women of high character and national significance. He has not given us a gallery of portraits of people whose main distinction was their wealth, and their ability to pay. A truly national portrait gallery has received many additions from him. He formed the plan of painting the most famous of his contemporaries, and presenting the portraits to the nation. He seems to penetrate to the meaning of life, and to give the character more impressively than the features; and he carefully divided his time between the work that produced income—portrait painting, and the allegories of spiritual realities. The latter he was not anxious to sell. Many he gave away. He kept them long in his studio where they were open to the view of any who made an effort to see them; and many of those he valued most, and to which he gave his time and care most thoroughly, he reserved to present to the nation.

Several of his pictures are powerful in the denunciation of the slavery to money profits, which he saw to be a terrible and far-reaching evil. How sad to see the young rich man turning away from the way of life because he has "great possessions" and cannot withdraw his heart from them! Watts says that this picture and "Jonah" and "Mammon," are especially addressed to modern philosophy.

"Greed and Labour" shows the toiler strong, enduring much, carrying his heavy load of tools and materials, powerful in frame, brawny armed, overstrained (as his features show) wearied with the day's work, but with eyes that can look upward, and bravely face man and destiny. Behind him, greed, with the money bags, niggardly, with closed eyes, cunning and cruel, is his master in temporal things, slave-driver, intent on the profits. The worker is warm with his work, but the wretched money grubber needs furs up to his neck, and is still cold at heart.

"The Minotaur" shows us a creature half man, half bull, on the look-out for his tribute of maidens and youths, who shall satisfy his inhuman hunger. There is manifestly a connection of ideas between this and the most appalling of all Watts's pictures that I have seen: "Mammon." There is the same wrinkled skin about the neck of Mammon that is seen in the Minotaur. But Mammon is worse. Surely there was never a figure in human form and feature more inhuman than this. Coarse, strong, heavy, he sits in his chair whose decorations are two skulls; he is crowned and plumed; money bags are in his lap. His deep-set eyes are frightful, they can see nothing but selfish gain. His heavy jaw, firm set protruding lower lip, and broad nostrils show the creature that has sunk below the animal. The animal may rise, has glimmerings of higher things. He is dead—living death. Under his heavy arm rests the head of a fair girl, who is kneeling beside him—alas! it would seem she must have gone there willingly. But now that heavy hand is upon her, she is doomed. Beneath his foot, prostrate, is a well-formed youth; his vitality is gone. Unlike the compelled slave of greed, who is preparing for a great inheritance even in his oppression, these two worshippers of the modern idol are the most pitiful and hopeless objects Watts set before us. "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon!"

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF GEORGE FREDERICK WATTS, R.A.

II.

ON one of those occasions Mr. Watts lifted two small unfinished canvases, and pointed out the ideas he had in painting them. The incident was most appropriate, and will live long in the memory of those who were present. Previous to the arrival of my friends I had been talking to the artist about the depressing surroundings of the lives of the majority of London toilers, and of some of their heroic attempts to rise. When we were all in the studio together, these canvases were brought out and stood upon a table. I have not heard of their exhibition to the public, neither have I heard that titles were given to the paintings. They both deal with one subject, or perhaps it would be better to say they represent two phases of one subject. The background chiefly consists of a large tree trunk. At its base a man is seen in shadow. In the first picture his body is contorted as though in agony. He is writhing on account of some sorrow which is agitating his mind. His head is bent low towards the ground, and he makes no attempt to rise. Above him there are a number of figures represented as pressing clouds down upon the drooping man. They are evil influences which are the cause of his sorrow and despondency. The other picture was that of a similar scene; but in it the man was lifting himself, though with difficulty, and the figures above him were not pressing clouds upon him (as in the first picture), but lifting their arms as if in gladness. From the man's side there was rising a female form. Mr. Watts told us that he had first called this picture the "Birth of Eve." But that title limited his subject somewhat, and he wished us to think of his two pictures generally as evil and good influences. How appropriate it was that the artist should show these pictures to the visitors of the afternoon; and how clear was the lesson he would have us learn from them. The one portrayed our depressing environment with its many clouds and evils preventing our oppressed beings from rising even to upright postures; and how like the bulk of toiling humanity was the figure with head turned to earth and back bent with toil and fruitless attempts to rise. But on looking at the other picture we received our thought of encouragement. In this the man has not allowed the evil influences to remain, for he has shaken himself free from their oppression, and in his attempt to rise has given birth to the spiritual part of his nature. Eve rises from his side, and is welcomed and encouraged by the heavenly powers that are hovering over the man. Mr. Watts was always a man of few words; but the few he used on this occasion, as he was showing us these pictures, were sufficient for us to know that he wished us to take courage by the thought that, if we but make the attempt to lift ourselves from depressing and evil influences, we shall not only get help from the spiritual world, but shall also realise a new life developing from our own. The incident formed a beautiful method of urging us to continue our spiritual efforts towards a higher life. It was as though the master said to us: "You will have help from heaven if you persevere, for the spiritual forces are waiting for your resolution to struggle against all that is lowering and debased."

On another occasion I was seated in the studio of the master, and he was asking about the Sunday-school work at Stepney, wondering whether the Board School influence was being at all perceptible on the rising generation, and whether its effects were to be seen at work on East London boys and girls. It was then that I told him of our feeble guild efforts at College Chapel to do something in the way of giving the young people something better to think about than their sordid surroundings. Our guild, with its very slight results, was described, when, to my surpirse, the artist suggested that I should get the rough boys to decorate their schoolroom. To carry out the idea at first seemed quite impossible. I pleaded the boys' ignorance of painting in any form, but was met with the assertion that that was the chief attraction of such a notion. If the suggestion could be made to them that they were capable of producing something they had no idea was possible, they would be at once interested. Mr. Watts urged that as I knew something of the rudiments of painting and could draw a little, I should get them to attempt a copy on a large scale of some well-known, good picture. I could correct their drawing, and when that was near the intended design they should be shown how to handle brushes and oil paints, and allowed to fill in the colour. Oil was to be the medium, because mistakes could be rectified by overpainting. I was not to expect a work of art, or to imagine I was going to make artists of my boys. The experiment should simply be one to interest the lads in things above their ordinary way of life, and produce an element of attachment to their Sunday school. On that occasion I left the aged artist with very mixed feelings. I was not optimistic, but I decided to try the experiment. The idea was certainly a good one. It was one also that had been tried with success in the village chapel at Compton by Mrs. Watts and himself. The result was that after many disappointments the youths painted two large oil paintings which now hang in the schoolroom at the back of College Chapel. I may mention that since my removal to Ipswich a similar experiment was tried; and with much less difficulty the guild has succeeded in decorating the schoolroom with large frescoes and panels. I am persuaded that the ideal is a correct one. It amounts to the plan of arousing a society of young people to the thought of something necessary to be done on a large scale. Then, with enthusiasm and perseverence, good is bound to be the result.

Mr. Watts has always been considered a man of delicate constitution; but he struck me as being of remarkably good health. His body was very small, but he had great endurance, and seemed to be very strong. One morning I was privileged to take a long walk with him amongst the Surrey hills. The delicate artist of seventy soon tired the healthy youth of little more than twenty. But I would not admit myself tired in such surroundings, with such a companion. When but a young man he recognised that he had not a robust frame, and studied the question of his physical condition with the help of a physician, deciding that a very temperate method of living on a carefully prescribed diet was the best way to preserve his strength and health. Knowing what was the right thing, he adhered to it to the end, and the result in his long life of hard work has fully justified the means adopted. He rose very early in the morning and retired in the evening.

I have seen the master at work on some of his great canvases. Two special occasions shall be mentioned. On one occasion, when I was a guest at Limnerslease, I was about the house as early as six in the morning, imagining I had the house to myself. I wandered into the studio, and, to my surprise, saw the artist at work. He told me he had been painting since four o'clock, and always endeavoured to rise with the sun. He used no palette, painted with a large flat brush, dipping from large dishes of mixed paint on a table by his side. He seemed to possess wonderful steadiness of arm, for he used no mahl-stick. He was painting "Love and Life." I remarked that I thought this picture had been finished some years ago, and he admitted that it had. But it had then returned to his studio, and it had occurred to him that the delicate girl on so lofty a height appeared to need shielding from the winds that would there be felt. So he was putting an extra row of feathers on the wing of the Angel of Love, which would give the picture the look of greater protection for life.

The other occasion which shall be mentioned was when I saw him working on his picture called "Faith." The picture is well known. Faith has left a scene of carnage and battle. The destroyed city is still burning in the distance. She has crossed a lonely plain and is seated on some rocks by a clear pool. She is unbuckling her sword, having discovered it to be an unconvincing argument, and is about to throw it aside. She washes her blood-stained feet in the cool water, and listens to the song of birds, while simple flowers are in her lap. The picture stood on the easel when I looked at it for the first time. The artist said, "I think I have a modern subject there. The ancients believed in war. By killing enemies and sacking cities, they considered themselves the victors. But to-day we are learning that such violence settles nothing. So I have tried to picture modern faith turning her back on the old methods and learning of nature." That was years ago. One would like to know what the aged man would have thought of modern faith after the Transvaal and Port Arthur.

LUCKING TAVENER.

GEORGICS—ROMAN AND ENGLISH.

THE maker of holidays, clerical or lay, is wont to seize diversion with discretion, and to mortify the lust of indolence with a crust to bite on. The new translation of the Georgics, by Lord Burghclere, is an invitation to pleasure, mingled with profit, and one might suggest a less agreeable method of beguiling the quiet hour for a few days with a country-loving family than to read it through aloud. If pained no longer by early memories of classic inspiration under the insistance of the ferule, some few demand the very tongue of "the best poem of the best poet," as Dryden esteemed it, they will gratify their learning in their own sanctuaries. The rest of us will be only too glad to avail ourselves of a translation worthy of all praise of a Latin poem which proves its capacity and greatness by appealing to our most native instincts as no English poem on the same subject has ever done. In his serious, simple, winning interpretation of country life, Virgil has had to wait for his equal as an artist, for François Millet, who, by reason of a still deeper insight into soul and suffering, has in his pictures given us the epic of the peasant. The only literary work in our own language which we might be tempted to set up by way of comparison is Thomson's Seasons. But this can only be set up to be at once knocked down again. The cold, florid verse of the young Scotchman who came south, like others of his countrymen, to make his way up in the world, has long ceased to appeal to us in the smallest degree. But it is from Thomson's age that we have the one version of Virgil's Song of the Farmer, which was worthy to survive and to represent the original—Dryden's translation with Addison's introductory Essay. We always listen gratefully to Addison, and we must not turn aside from his preface. It is not the less instructive in that we shall dissent from almost every sentence in it. For once Addison is wrong. We must make this fact clear, for Addison's view is that of a great many people to-day, and until we disperse his sentence, the Georgics, and a great deal more besides, will remain a sealed book for us. His definition of a Georgic as "some part of the science of husbandry put into a pleasing dress, and set off with all the beauties and embellishments of poetry," at once places us at his point of view, which he makes more and more clear as the essay proceeds. It is, that beauty and nobility are not inherent in husbandry, but only in some artificial description of it. That peasantry is void of poetry; that the sultry body of the former is only for the nonce decked out in "a pleasing dress," cut from cloth woven on the loom of letters; that poetry is a sort of nice green paint on the gardener's wheelbarrow, and on the spiked iron palings round the park. This beloved philosopher appears tricked out in a stage dress, when pointing the art of the future poet of nature, he advises the insertion of plenty of moral reflections and elegant embellishments of the fancy; he would let the subject "rest awhile" now and again in favour of a "pleasant and pertinent (sic) digression," and reluctantly confesses that in a work like this, boldly bearing a vulgar title, yet seriously dedicated to the Emperor Augustus by the first poet of his age, "we should never quite lose sight of the country," and along with the author shall "remember that agriculture ought to be some way hinted at throughout the whole poem"; but he pulls himself up again with the saving word of warning to the aspirant for laurels in a rickyard "in particular to be careful of not letting his subject debase his style and betray him into a meanness of expression, but everywhere to keep up his verse in all the pomp of numbers and dignity of words."

Now this is plain and ugly paganism of the literary pedant. Judging the writer by his own words, we should be forced to conclude that he would have been ashamed to be seen with a spade in his hand, and would have blushed to discover any member of his household feeding the chickens or milking the cows. We may candidly confess that we have among our neighbours some whose ideas are hereby faithfully represented. They demur to the idea of the ancient writer whose Creator brings his work to an end by planting a garden and setting a man in it to keep it. Garden or farm, they will have none except about their own immediate abode and for their own personal convenience. The country they have an eye to with a bumptious sense of possession and a vision of many pheasants. The countryman they detest, with all his works and ways, and have evicted him from his cottage in this land quite as effectively as they have his fellow from his cabin in Ireland. It is only the perspective afforded by distance that enables us to see the tyranny exercised over the water more clearly than we can in our own shires. There is a sharp division between the two classes of those who believe in the country and those who amuse themselves with it. The one sees in it the field where man's most natural wants may be most rationally and beneficially satisfied; the scene of his most chastening struggle with forces which fly with the wings of Ariel, yet swing the hammer of the giants. The others have followed another course, which has led them into the precincts of high and beautiful arts, which they affect, but commonly understand not. Along the paths of civilisation reality and love and immortality are prone to vanish and life to become an embarassment and death a great fear. There is nothing to stand on, nothing to trust. Man has with showy cleverness made for himself a world of substitutes—substitutes for earth, substitutes for physical toil, substitutes for love, for health, for goodness. He finds it out in time, and wearies of his own inventions. To the former of these two classes of individuals poetry is good because it tells the truth about things. It is good in the measure in which it is true. To the other it is an ingenious palliative of the ugliness of reality, of truth. Singularly, Addison speaks the doctrine of this class. As he puts it, the words of his master are more desirable than the things they refer to, and which, though he fails to realise the fact, moved that master to write so songfully.

We would fain suggest a corrective to this artificial mode of offering insincere compliments to the earth we live on by recalling our own latest Georgic—one sunny task with which even Virgil was not familiar.

Haymaking is neither a mercenary trade, nor a thin background for tasteless and unreal pastorals. It is itself an idyll. It stands in need of no magazine to give it publicity. Man's necessity and nature's benignity have together composed it, and they issue a fresh edition every summer.

It is ten minutes to four by the clock, and the sun but half above the horizon, when the mower throws from his scythe the chime of his prelude. The notes flow, they tinkle as they flow like the tinkle of a stony brook. It is the hymn of a cascade on the mountain—rocky chine, singing water, echoing pool, all are there. It is a stream singing. Now the mountain stone and iron give out the glee which they once silently learnt from their leaping comrade. It is curiously liquid, this song of the whetstone, and in that it is significant of all the movements of the mowing and the haymaking. Watch the mower; note the curve of his back, the bend of his legs. Strength and sharpness pass down the tense brown arms and over the arching sneath and out through the sweeping blade. It is altogether like boughs bending in a strong wind. Man and scythe, which for the time is part of himself, flow through the grass, as one has watched the rapid current of a river coil and curve about the abutting pier of a bridge, and flow on through the archway. And the river will mow the stones of the bridge down too, as surely—just like that, only it can work in league with time instead of against time as man has to in the field. Listen to the swish, swish of the cutting stream through the dew-wet grass. See the lengthening foam of the swathe that is left behind. And as the hours follow one another with hotter breath from the crystal cold of the dawn to the stunning rebuff of noon, when the mowers surrender awhile to rest, you watch, you listen to the enthralling monotony of the flow. This steady, urgent haste of strenuous men, the strong throbbing hearts, the beaded sweat, the swinging arms impose silence, and the rush of the scythes is only broken from time to time by the mountain tinkle of the whetstone.

Then to less urgent duty come the women helping to toss and turn, while the sunshine and the wind stream through the loose-flying threads. There is breathing and time for jest, and the children come for a rollick. Yielding its sweetness as it dries, the mow is now drawn into long, loose waves. The men and women with their rakes might be rowers in that safe inland sea, whose surf they gather in bands, until the waggon comes into the field, drawn by two sturdy horses tandem, the carter at the leader's head. Chains clink and wheels creak. Blue-painted is the waggon, and built on a massive frame, yet graceful with its lines curved like a ship, with its ladders fore and aft for an upper deck, and its four stout corner staves for masts.

Working from daylight—for the barometer was falling, and the wind had shifted ominously—it was nine o'clock before the last fork-full was passed up on to the top of the stack. Village politics suffered that evening. for the meeting to which several of us were called was attended by so few that it had to be adjourned. All the countryside was of the same mind. Hay, like pilchards, is a fleeting bounty, for the receipt of which, not politics only, but the offices of religion must sometimes be deferred. Rather this becomes the policy and religion of the hour. "Well, Reuben," I said at last to one of the men, "you've got it up in fine condition." He paused, and, sticking his fork in the ground, leant on it like a Roman soldier leaning on his spear, and then, after the customary interval, during which he winds up his deep thoughts out of the well in which they slowly collect, he replied with a sort of brotherly warmth in his voice: "I reckon we ought to do our best; it's about all we can do for them, and they do enjoy it when it's sound and sweet."

Some men's thoughts would be running on the market value of the crop, and some would feel a bare satisfaction that that job was done. But Reuben's thoughts were with those for whom "He causeth the grass to grow." I cannot but believe that when he stalls his cows at night, and fills each rack with a crisp armful into the midst of which he likes to bury his own face and sniff the sweet odour, the Master Herdsman is at the same time proferring His gift to the kine, saying: "Take, eat, this is my body, which is broken for you."

THE WORTH OF SONG.

IT is recorded in a ballad, dating, as those who are curious in such matters assure me, from the later days of the nineteenth century, that a certain monarch, Henricus Rex, had three sons, all of whom he disinherited and banished from before his face by reason of their disobedience to his high commands. There is no evidence to prove that they worked treason against his throne or bore themselves unworthily either in council or upon the battlefield; one and all were sent about their business BECAUSE THEY WOULD NOT SING. They had not music in their souls, and were therefore fit for all the enormities to be expected from persons lacking in that respect." The paternal severity was fully justified; the heir-apparent became a miller, stole other folks' corn, and met with a watery grave in his mill dam. The second prince, who was a weaver, was hanged in the yarn that he had appropriated (a sad warning to all literary men); and as for the third, a tailor by profession, his rogueries brought upon him a fate more dreadful by far than that which had befallen either of his brothers.

The fable, perhaps, errs upon the side of severity; nevertheless it contains a salutary moral. Observe, the princes would not sing; they laboured under no physical infirmity that prevented them from doing so. Hence their deserved downfall; but a gentler moralist than the bard would rather dwell upon the delights of song and the benefits accruing to the singer than upon the penalties in store for the perversely silent. Let it be understood, however, that in speaking of song he declines to limit himself to the discussion of sounds strictly musical or even melodious, for a capital ditty may come pleasantly from a cracked voice, if it spring to the lips from the heart, as all good songs must do. For singing, look you, carries us back to the elemental things of our nature; it is but a little younger than laughter and tears. Wherefore, if we pretend not to the science and art of music, but only to a little work-a-day philosophy, it is plainly a small matter whether notes are musically rendered or no.

Singing and dancing are, of course, closely connected; for ages they were inseparable one from the other. Yet of the two, song has proved itself superior to the dance; and in witness thereof we may observe that while we still sing to give our feelings vent, dancing has not been able to contend successfully against the sobering influence of civilisation, and so to-day, the once wild muse Terpsichore has become the polite handmaid of society. 'Tis pity, but 'tis true. Now and again in great glee we may cut a caper when nobody is looking; but, generally speaking, our modern environment—the mere proximity of tables and chairs is sufficient—has abolished the dance as an expression of the emotions. But Song is not to be so bound down by convention. Whenever men meet together on festal occasions they sing; when they are alone in the wilderness, with no audience more appreciative than the crows (there are many less so), they sing. I am almost ashamed to preach such stale stuff; but King Henry's degenerate offspring have left descendants, and there are still some who look askance upon the ancient and laudable practice of vocalism.

It is always pleasant to hear folks singing; and he who sings at his work has been held up as an example to countless generations. Of course, circumstances must alter cases; it is not likely, for example, that a solicitor would enjoy the confidence of a large body of substantial clients if he were addicted to singing whilst drawing up a will or preparing a mortgage. But it is undeniable that manual labour is immensely lightened by song, and brain-workers have found in it a relaxation and a restorative not to be equalled. Mr. Gladstone was a hearty singer—it is said that he used to sing in his bath of a morning—and did not Professor Blackie compose songs, songs so long that he must needs have sung them himself since nobody else could ever have remembered half the verses? And are not students all the world over renowned for the zest with which they carol?

Singers may be broadly divided into two classes. There be those who sing in chorus and those who sing alone. Now, singing in chorus is a highly commendable practice, though scarcely so admirable as solitary performance, as I shall endeavour to show. It is of great virtue in that it tends to raise low spirits, and associates us in pleasant union with our fellows. Moreover, it is as a haven of refuge to the weaker brethren who would fain sing but dare not because, forsooth, their voices are by nature harsh and untuneful, unless merged in a volume of sound. Let them join in a chorus, therefore, and grasp such delights as they may; it is quite possible that they may so be led on to singing by themselves. Never let us be foolishly censorious when, of summer evenings, the brakes rattle into London from Burnham or from Epping, each with its happy cargo of passengers lustily trolling some inane ditty of the music-hall. You say that they produce an unpleasing sound. Well, that is likely enough, to your ears at least, but remember that they sing for their own pleasure, not for yours or mine, and they have probably no intention whatever of creating a musical effect. If there should be one amongst them who persists in singing a "second," the odds are that he is an egoist, and his proper place is on the stage, not on the char-a-banc. Out of the lightness of their hearts do these good people raise their voices, and he wants sympathy who jeers at them.

And let us not be hasty to set down such singing, boisterous though it be, to evil causes, attributing to intemperance that which is due to honest merriment alone. There be some who would brand all song as disreputable that is not heard in the concert hall or in the drawing-room. The free exercise of voices has something too much of original humanity in it to be agreeable to them. But it will be a poor day for civilisation when cheerfulness dies at its door.

Good though it be to sing in chorus, it is better still to sing solus. Though the terms are similar to the ear, I draw a distinction between "solo-singing" and "singing solus," the latter expression being intended to convey the idea of a song sung in solitude for the private edification of the performer. For, observe; a man is under the pressure of a great calamity—his bank has broken or the water pipes have burst. He goes forth among his friends; as they sing together his spirits rise a trifle, until by and by he casts away care, and joins in a catch. It is well done; he has exerted himself and won back a measure of happiness. But what if he remain at home, and, face to face with his evil fortune, viewing his useless cheque-book or the gushing fountains in the back-yard, can still sing, "A Thousand a Year" or "The Meeting of the Waters"? Does not such a man command the admiration due to the Stoic? It is to be feared that few have souls so stout; but this extreme instance goes to show that, while the chorus may be merely the result of exhilarating circumstances acting from without, the song sung in solitude is the mark of a contented and cheerful disposition within.

Enough, perhaps, of the singer; something may surely be said of the song. Words and music are not the real essentials in singing, for they are largely matters of taste and education, while the spirit that leads up to their production should be the same in gentle and simple alike, and show equally in lyrics by Ben Jonson or by —— it were better to avoid the use of names, but it is no disparagement of the anonymous author to rank him below the Elizabethan. Nevertheless, the better the song and the air to which it is wedded, the better the effect upon the singer; and it may fairly be argued that if we held closer by our old minstrelsy, nor sought after novelty with an eagerness rather becoming Athenians than Englishmen, we should realise more fully than we do the power to cheer and comfort possessed by the verses and music bequeathed to us by our forefathers. The best of all songs, perhaps, are our own island ditties, English, Welsh, Scotch, and Irish: there be many that are good in the German tongue, while no one can say that Latin is a dead language who as a student has swelled the noble chorus of "Gaudeamus Igitur." But as for your modern drawing-room production—no, i' faith, we'll have none of it.

So much leviore plectro; yet, after all, song has noble uses, and may be thought on gravely, if lightly dealt with. And, therefore, it may not be amiss to say one word of Song in its highest aspect—when it is employed most rightly and wisely as a medium of Praise. It is a pity that this, its noblest use, is not more general. We cannot all be musical, and often a dread of causing annoyance to those that are so by a weak performance closes the lips of many who would gladly sing. And so a silence that is far from golden frequently prevails at a time and place where voices raised together should most fittingly be heard. To some the question may seem controversial; to him who looks upon Song as a natural expression of emotion there can scarcely be a question in the matter. For surely if Song be good at all seasons of joy, no considerations based upon our deficiency in its production should deter us from singing on those occasions when, gathered together for one common act of praise, the rarest music is not so acceptable as the untaught manifestation of a glad and thankful heart.

ROBIN ROSCOE.

POETRY.*

All is full of poetry:
Tinkling of the sheepfold bell,
Twinkling glowworms in the dell,
Sprinkling dews on heathery fell—
All is full of poetry.
Lying on the flowery grass
Watching swallows flickering by,
While the trailing cloudlets pass
In a variegated sky;
Listening to the rippling stream
Prattling on its seaward way,
While the nodding rushes seem Pleased with what the waters say—
What is this but poetry?
Cataracts that loudly roaring,
O'er the crags their deluge pouring,
Lash the pools to tiny billows,
Sputtering round the solemn willows,
Are heroic poetry.
Poetry in every measure
For all moods of grief or pleasure,
Nature keeps among her treasure.
Oh! we need no books to read it,
Grant us but a heart to heed it!

. . . . . .

He who hears the silent voices
Thrilling thro' his soul, rejoices
If he may but give expression
To one word of their confession;
He who feels the music soundless
Quivering thro' his spirit, tries
From a harmony so boundless
Just to seize, before it dies,
Here a bar, and here a line,
Of a concert so divine;
Seizing write, and written show it
To the world, which names him "poet."
Oh! no poet ever sings us,
Half the message Nature brings us,
Half May's smiling springtime glories,
Half stern winter's kindly stories,
Never sings us, paints us, spells us
Half each cycling season tells us:
Ne'er reflects one-half the light
That has made his own soul bright.
Words are feeble; men are weak;
Less than half who feel can speak;
Less than half who speak can show
Half the half of what they know.
All is full of poetry.
If you seek good poetry,
Leave the house and shut this book up.
Wander thro' the fields and look up;
Look behind, before, about you,
Look within and look without you—
Look and listen; listen gently;
Look, not hardly, but intently;
Thus you'll hear and thus will see,
Wheresoever you may be—
On the mountains, by the sea,
In the city's squalid gloom,
'Mid sweet dells of heath and broom,
In the garden, in the park,
In broad daylight, after dark,
Anywhere, at every time,
Poems, music, more sublime
Than was ever writ in rhyme,
Or than any could rehearse,
Or has prisoned in blank verse;
Try, and you will sing with me:
All is full of poetry,
Everything is poetry.

MUSINGS.

By a Minister.

XXVI.

More than one old writer has told how, some sixteen centuries ago, a group of children, playing by the sea-shore, fell to enacting the rite of baptism. One of them, chosen to be bishop, baptised by immersion those among the rest who were not already Christians, putting the right questions, and using the appointed words. The boy-bishop was the renowned Athanasius. Keble glances at the story in one of his poems on children's sports,

"some serious brow,
In love and patience lowly bent,
Some youthful Athanase, e'en now
Upon his future task intent," evidently holding that Athanasius acted more in earnest than in sport. This, I suppose, is the right view. When children play at solemnities, the solemnity is more to them than the play. What thoughtful child has not gravely played at preaching, preaching (contentedly) to empty pews? Kingsley's first sermon was delivered when he was four years old, Ruskin's even before that age. But children preach best when, like birds and flowers, they preach without words. Lessons of hope and contentment are best taught by bright looks and untroubled eyes. Elia speaks of the little chimney-sweepers of his time as "clergy imps, preaching a lesson of patience to mankind." Was it the blackness of their lot that taught patience, or the brave white grin struggling through? Children are living illustrations of those lighter graces, on which we of sadder countenance only comment and reflect. The Lyre of the Innocents is best touched by the Innocents themselves. Therefore, "he took a child and set him in the midst." To those who saw it, it must have seemed a playful act; and so in truth it was.

The boy-bishop appears again in history. Later on he is a singing-boy in cathedral or parish church, elected by his fellows, and vested with cope and mitre. He holds office for three weeks, and during that time, with his youthful chaplains about him, may say any service except that of mass, and even give the blessing to the people. Colet in one of the statutes of his school orders that his scholars shall every Childermas day "come to Paulis Churche and hear the Chylde-Byshop's sermon." Did it all come, I wonder, out of the honour paid to childhood in the Gospels—the child amongst the doctors, the child set in the midst, the children in the temple, the children in the market place, the children brought to be blessed?

More difficult to explain is the ecclesiastical burlesque which made the play of grown men. Such religious farce was the Feast of Fools, in which the sub-deacons chose their bishop, under whose leadership, as a writer of the twelfth century relates, coarse songs were sung in the choir, games were played and puddings eaten round the altar, incense was made from old burnt shoes, and the noisy uproar went on through the church, and through divine service, until a mock benediction closed the scene. Another such parody was the Feast of Asses in France, in the thirteenth century. An ass was brought into the church, a Latin hymn was sung in his praise, and the singers danced and brayed round him. In England the ass was of wood—"Upon Palme Sondaye they play the foles sadly, drawinge after them an asse in a rope, when they be not moch distant from the woden asse that they draw." Scott, in The Abbot, describes the pranks in church of the Abbot of Unreason. By these frolics, he says, the people indemnified themselves for the privations and penances imposed on them at other seasons. This is only a guess, and hardly touches the philosophy of the matter. We shall know more about the borders between the religious and the profane, when we know what it is that separates tears and laughter, genius and madness, the ridiculous and the sublime.

The Athanasian story goes on to say that the Bishop of Alexandria, looking from his window, saw what the children were doing, sent for them, and straitly questioned them. Finding that all had been rightly done, and duly said, he consulted with his clergy, and in the end pronounced the baptism to be valid. Dean Stanley sees in this a curious mingling of freedom and superstition—the superstition, to his mind, showing itself in the connection of validity with an act so lightly performed. That is the adult way of looking at it, but it may be wrong. In the divine order, the least are often greatest, and the things done lightly may sometimes be the most holy. "The child Samuel ministered before the Lord," though in what way he ministered, is not told. He ministered, some one has said—by being a child.

There is a full account, I see, of the Festum Stultorum in the June number of the Nineteenth Century and After. The learned writer does not attempt to explain the unreasoning ease with which our forefathers passed from the pious to the impious, from the grave to the grotesque. On further reflection I am inclined to see in rice-throwing at church-doors, and in other alternations of piety and levity not unknown, the faint working of some once salutary law of reaction—nature's way of breaking a prolonged strain. Not the less may we hope that before very long both the need and the remedy will have passed away.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Birkenhead.—At a special meeting of the members of the congregation of the Unitarian Church held recently the treasurer and vice-chairman, Mr. Arthur W. Willmer (in the unavoidable absence of the chairman), announced that the debt on the new church, which a few months ago amounted to upwards of £1,040, had now been cleared off, and the church and schools could be declared to be absolutely free and independent of debt. Mr. Willmer pointed out that this result was greatly due to the efforts of their minister, the Rev. James Crossley, and to the very kind and timely help received from Sir John T. Brunner and other friends outside the congregation. He commented on the beautiful church in which the congregation now worshipped, and on the ample school accommodation provided, and concluded with the hope that the extinction of the debt would but mark the beginning of a new era of progress. The following resolution was then passed unanimously:—"That this congregation hereby places on record its grateful sense of the kindness and sympathy of many friends in Liverpool and elsewhere who have contributed to the building fund, and tenders its best thanks to Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., and all others who have so generously helped to extinguish the debt on the new church."

Bury.—The Centenary of the Bank-street Sunday-school is to be celebrated on September 23, 24, and 25. On Saturday there will be a re-union of old teachers and scholars, and on Monday a scholars' party and entertainment.

Oldbury.—A successful garden party and sale of work was held on Monday, July 31, at The Dingle, Rounds Green, the residence of Mrs. McKean, by the members of the Oldbury congregation, to raise funds towards the memorial they are to place in their chapel of their late minister, the Rev. Henry McKean. The memorial is to be a new organ. The Rev. W. G. Topping presided, and called upon the Rev. Henry Eachus, of Coseley, a very old friend of Mr. McKean's, who with him was one of the first students of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board in Manchester, to open the sale. The Revs. W. C. Hall, of Small Heath; J. B. Higham, of Wolverhampton; and A. Thompson, of Dudley, were among those present, and apologies for absence were received from several other ministers and leading laymen of the Birmingham district. Mr. Eachus spoke with much feeling of his friendship with Mr. McKean, and his interest in the congregation, and wished them every success. Councillor Growcott proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Eachus, which was seconded by the Rev. W. C. Hall. There was a very large attendance, and in the evening the garden was effectively lighted. The Oldbury Brass Band rendered a programme of music. Thanks were also accorded to Mrs. McKean and her family and Mr. and Miss Probert for their kindness in allowing their grounds to be used for the purpose.

London Teachers' Excursion.—On Monday last, by the kindness of Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence, a party of Sunday-school teachers and ministers, numbering nearly 250, spent a very pleasant day at King's Ride, Ascot. This was the twenty-sixth annual excursion of its kind, and it is safe to say the beauty of the place and the generous hospitality of the host and hostess, were never more thoroughly enjoyed. After tea at the farm a few words of welcome were given by Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence, and Principal Gordon, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, and the Rev. J. Toye expressed the thanks of the visitors. As in recent years, Mr. Toye acted as conductor of the excursion.

Todmorden.—On Sunday last, Mr. Fred Duxbury, of Manchester, preached morning and evening to good congregations. In the afternoon he gave a sacred recital in the Sunday-school—in place of the ordinary lessons—and there was a very large attendance of scholars, parents, and friends. Mr. Duxbury's services both as preacher and reciter were very much appreciated. As showing the good feeling existing between the different churches, it is pleasant to record that the junior superintendent of the Sunday-school, Mr. Graham, gave the address at the Oldroyd Methodist Sunday-school Anniversary at the morning service on Sunday last. There was a large congregation. He has also been asked to take the morning service at one of the Methodist Free churches on Sunday next.

Windermere.—The services are being taken advantage of by a considerable number of residents in the district. The Rev. Dendy Agate, who preached last Sunday, had an increased congregation, including visitors from America, Ireland, and various parts of England. The attendance of friends who may chance to be in the neighbourhood will always be welcome. Service is held at 11 o'clock in the Institute.

THRIFT, sobriety, industry, these are good; but these alone do not make a great nation or a happy people. Nor can they ever be securely taught where courage, self-sacrifice, devotion to country, the consecrated service due to freedom and to truth are not taught alongside of them as part of the equipment of a citizen of earth and a child of God.—R. A. Armstrong.

DEATH.

LEWIN.—On August 6th, at his residence, Park View, Bebington, aged 52, Walter Lewin, third son of the late Mr. S. Lewin, of Wallasey, Cheshire, and great-grandson of the late Rev. Robert Lewin, for many years minister of Renshaw-street Chapel, Liverpool.

"Never writer wrote with deeper conviction than George Gissing; every sentence has come straight from the heart, and this fact alone, apart from its artistic merit, gives a poignancy and strength to his work which separates it at once from the common ruck of novel-writing. These books are terrible arraignments of life—their peculiar characteristic is this poignancy, this parting of life at its moments of unbearable crisis. Between misery and despair lies a whole world of difference; misery is what can be endured—despair is the unbearable, and George Gissing is the spokesman of Despair." —Jane H. Findlater, in the National Review.

"Fate set him for his life-task the study of the swarming miseries of our human ant-heaps and the pettinesses of our mortal nature. 'The Nether World,' 'New Grub Street,' 'Demos,' 'The Odd Women,' 'The Whirlpool,'—these are all monumental titles, mighty themes. None of his contemporaries in England—only Zola and Tolstoi anywhere else—even attempted to wrestle with such big canvases, and if Gissing did not always rise to the height of his great argument, the conception was at least Herculean."—I. Zangwill, in To-Day.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE names of the representatives and visitors from Great Britain and Ireland to the meetings of the International Council at Geneva have been printed in a convenient alphabetical list, containing 222 names. "Pension" accommodation has been provided for 150; the others are staying at hotels, or making their own arrangements; 160 will travel together on Friday next, August 25, from Newhaven by the new turbine steamer Dieppe, arriving at Geneva early on Saturday morning. Tickets and other papers were issued from Essex Hall on Wednesday last, and the Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association desires to say that he cannot undertake the responsibility of making arrangements for any more applicants; moreover, the cost of board and lodgings is now higher than it was ten days ago, and several of the hotels are full. We wish everyone a safe and pleasant journey; and we trust that the meetings will prove abundantly inspiring and informing. A brief programme of the week's proceedings will be found on another page.

VISITORS to Geneva, who follow the guidance of this year's Baedeker (Switzerland), may look in vain for the "expiatory monument" to Servetus, erected in 1903. Baedeker says it is the "Place du Champel (Pl. C., 7)"; it is really on the hillside above the Hôpital Cantonal (Pl. B., 8), at the sharp corner where the Chemin de Beau-Séjour comes down to the Chemin de la Roseraie, and close by the lower end of the Rue Michel Servet.

THE peace negotiations between the Russian and the Japanese diplomatists are still being carried on at Portsmouth (U.S.). The fact that there has been no sudden interruption of relations may be set against the more pessimistic of the forecasts which have floated through the press and are said to emanate from the money markets. Russia, through M. Witte, has refused to consider the cession of Sakhalin or the payment of a war indemnity. So at least, rumour has it, and such is the opinion of the correspondents. But in spite of this the two Governments continue to discuss other and less thorny points. The question of Korea, the original ostensible pretext for the war, seems to be settled, and the preponderant influence of Japan recognised, and an agreement is announced on various other points. There are elements of hope, others of doubt. Perhaps all that it is safe to venture at present is this—until war is resumed, peace is not impossible.

AFTER a career of nearly forty years the Echo has, we regret to record, ceased to appear. Our regret is based both on personal and public considerations. The last manager and Editor of the paper, Mr. F. Pethick-Lawrence, is a writer too deeply imbued with enthusiasm for social reform to be lightly spared from the ranks of journalism to-day. He has made a gallant fight to keep a clean and honest newspaper at the service of the multitude whose halfpence have so greatly changed the aspect of the daily Press in recent years. The struggle has not been without considerable success, but at last it has been given up, and evening sensationalism and turf advertisement has one competitor the less. That Mr. Lawrence will still write in labour interests is a satisfaction. The Echo it was that began halfpenny journalism in London, being issued by Messrs. Cassell in 1868. Its spirit and methods did not always win approval in high quarters; the dignified morning journals—they were very dignified a generation ago—looked down on the "snippety" style introduced in its columns, and growled at its too facile echoing of their "special" news. Others disliked its gossip and personalities; but in the main it secured approval from those who shared the democratic enthusiasm of the days before the Home Rule Bill. Its list of writers is a brilliant one, including Sir Arthur Arnold (the first Editor); Mr. William Black, the novelist; Cardinal Newman, and the Rev. H. R. Haweis; and we shall be pardoned for adding in a place apart, Miss Frances Power Cobbe, who has told us in her autobiography the story of her pioneer work as a woman journalist. Since her day many women have entered this field, and that fact, if no other, must keep us from being too pessimistic, either as to the present state of journalism or the future.

THE Churchmen's Liberation League (Chairman of Committee, G. W. E. Russell, Hon. Sec., Rev. Arthur Symonds, Over Tabley Vicarage, Knutsford) has issued a manifesto on Disestablishment, the striking and direct character of which will appear from the following extracts:—

We stand for the principle of "A Free Church in a Free State."

We desire to liberate the Church of England from the control of the State, because we believe—

(1) That State control enfeebles, and tends to destroy, the spiritual life of the Church, by encouraging her to lean on the support of, and to accommodate her teaching to, the Secular power.

(2) That the Church of England, as a religious society, has a right of self government, free from the interference of Crown or Parliament, and subject only to the Divine law.

(3) That, in a country where there are many forms of religion it is unjust and invidious that one should be maintained by the State in a position of privilege and pre-eminence. (We know that the sense of this injustice is keenly felt by Christians outside the Church of England.)

(4) That the maintenance of an Established Church is harmful to the spiritual life of the nation; because it tends to foster a false conscience, and to make people think that national righteousness consists in the legal establishment of the Church, rather than in the personal religion of individual men and women.

(5) That the subjection of the Church to the State is an invasion of the Sovereign rights of the Lord Jesus Christ as King of the Universal Church and Master of His own house.

In the strong conviction that "the wilderness" is the only way through which the Church can reach the Promised Land of Freedom, we earnestly solicit the co-operation of our fellow-churchmen in the endeavour to which we are ourselves committed.

WE heard only through a recent note in the Chicago Unity of the death of Dr. Orello Cone, which took place on June 23, in his seventieth year. Unity speaks of Dr. Cone as the foremost scholar of the Universalist denomination. He was known in this country as a New Testament scholar, the author of "Paul the Man, the Missionary, and the Preacher," published in 1898, and editor of the series of International Handbooks of the New Testament, of which Dr. Drummond wrote the volume on the Pauline Epistles, and he himself the volume on "Hebrews, Colossians, Ephesians, &c.," published in 1901. Dr. Cone was at one time president of Buchtel College, and had been professor of Biblical Theology in the St. Lawrence University.

IT had to be announced in the Wesleyan Methodist Conference that the circulation of periodical literature continues to be unsatisfactory. The London Quarterly barely keeps stationary; the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, notwithstanding the best efforts of recent very able editors, still declines in circulation. As people will go into a hall who will not commit themselves by going into a church; as they will stand in the market-place and listen, but will not surrender their liberty by joining a society or congregation; so they refuse to read a paper that avowedly wishes to do more than to amuse or entertain—that wishes to persuade, to convince, to seize them. If the Wesleyans cannot meet with the response that they desire—and, one may say, deserve—it must be still more difficult for any half-organised church to compel attention to its utterances and to secure the hearty allegiance of its readers. But such a time as this is not one for yielding to the whim of the multitude and the humour of the hour. It is rather a time when he who has a word to say should say it with all definiteness and persistence, and conquer now, if by no other means, by his continual importunity.

THE Union of the three Methodist bodies that have for some time been engaged in preliminary negotiations is beginning to be considered practically certain. It seems to have come as a surprise to the Bible Christian Conference itself that the vote in favour of going on with the negotiations had been passed with absolute unanimity. When the secretary announced that on that day he was going for the first time to vote in favour of Union, his speech was a presage of the coming victory, which, when it came, so perfect and complete, filled every soul with thankfulness and joy. It may be noted that the Bible Christians report a net increase of 2,100 members, with an increase of over 800 on trial and of 657 juvenile members. Such an increase, it is said, has only been twice equalled in the history of the connexion.

THE Garden City is a centre of many interesting experiments, and among these may be reckoned the undenominational place of worship, the foundation of which has been laid by Rev. F. B. Meyer. Mr. Meyer has no patience with the little rival chapels which do so much to prevent village life from stagnation. According to the hopes entertained, Garden City is not to have its Congregational chapel, its Baptist chapel, its various Methodist chapels and so on, but its free church to embrace them all. This is a bold attempt to establish the unimaginative average. But what shall happen to those who are extreme—extreme right or extreme left?

THE increasing press of our outward life can only be safely borne when there is an increased intensity of our life with God.—C. J. Perry.

DR. M. J. SAVAGE.*

THE Rev. Minot Judson Savage, D.D., of New York, who is to preach the English Sermon in the Cathedral of St. Pierre at Geneva, on the third morning of the International Council meetings of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers (August 31), has for many years held a leading place among American Unitarian ministers.

Born in 1841, in the northern state of Maine, Dr. Savage was brought up among orthodox Congregationalists, and at the age of twenty-three was ordained as a Congregational minister. His early experience as a preacher was in California and afterwards in Chicago. He still belonged to his old connection when, in 1873, he published his first book—"Christianity the Science of Manhood"—which was accepted as satisfactory by the leading orthodox papers, but by the radicals was declared to be in substantial accord with the teachings of Theodore Parker. So it came that in the following year he accepted a call to Boston, as a Unitarian, and for twenty-two years was minister of the Church of the Unity in that city. In 1896 he joined Robert Collyer in the ministry of the Church of the Messiah, New York, where he still preaches in the fulness of his powers.

Early in his ministerial life Dr. Savage acquired a remarkable power of extempore speech—remarkable in his command of clear and concise utterance and well-ordered thought. For more than twenty-five years his sermons for nine months of the year have been published from week to week, and have required, we believe, before publication very little revision of the shorthand report which is regularly taken. The long series of Dr. Savage's books consists for the most part simply of sets of these sermons on consecutive subjects issued in volumes. In their separate weekly form the sermons have had a great circulation, and have found their way all over the world, thus exercising a wide ministry of enlightenment and helpfulness among people grappling with the problems of present-day thought. In book-form also the sermons have come to be very well known in this country as well as in America.

His second book, "The Religion of Evolution," published in 1876, already clearly marks out the broad lines of the position he has occupied ever since, and his great service has been to show that an earnest religious life is open to those who whole-heartedly accept the teaching of evolution as interpreted by Herbert Spencer, and that, in fact, the only permanent foundation for religion must be found in the present facts of life and of the Universe as seen in the light of modern science. "The Morals of Evolution" followed in 1880. "Beliefs About Jesus" in 1881, and "Belief in God" and "Beliefs About Man" both in 1882. These books set forth with great freshness and persuasive power Dr. Savage's conception of religion—a rational view of the Bible and of the life of Jesus, in a spirit of reverent and grateful discipleship, with a firm conviction that the whole order of the world, including the progressive life of man, is a demonstration of the constant presence and the good purpose of the living God; and the central truths of his faith are expressed over and over again, and illustrated afresh and applied to the practical aspects of life, in many subsequent volumes, down to the last, which are quoted at the beginning of this article.* There are more than twenty-five volumes of sermons altogether in Dr. Savage's list.

Latterly, in his rigid application of scientific method to the problems of life, Dr. Savage has been persuaded that the phenomena with which Spiritualism is concerned, and the facts collected by the Society for Psychical Research, prove that we are "on the eve of discovering the Other Country, as really as Columbus once discovered America," and that then we shall have positive knowledge of the fact of life after death as we have never had it before. He will not call himself a Spiritualist. In his volume on "Life Beyond Death," he says in the appendix: "I am not a Spiritualist not because I am afraid of any name or would shun any stigma that might attach to a particular association; but the word 'Spiritualist,' as ordinarily used, covers so many things which I do not believe, so many methods with which I am not only not in sympathy, but to which I am strongly opposed, carries with its popular significance so much unreasoning credulity, the general movement so opposes itself to any scientific investigation, has covered and defended so many proven frauds, that I should misrepresent my position if I were willingly to be known by the name. At the same time I am perfectly willing to say that I believe that there is a great truth at the heart of the Spiritualistic movement."

Dr. Savage has written another little book, "Can Telepathy Explain?" (Putnam, 3s. 6d.) and his conclusion is that the theory is not sufficient to cover all the facts recorded, of which he himself has had some personal experience; he holds, on the contrary, that spirits belonging to "the Other Country" do frequently intervene in the affairs of our present life, and that the world they inhabit is here, separated only by a thin veil from ours. Our own feeling in the matter is, that, however fascinating the interest of Psychical research, there are great dangers, especially for people of highly-strung temperament, connected with it; and that as regards our conviction of life beyond death, absorption in such questions as are raised by alleged communications, received from departed spirits, tends (so far as religion is concerned) to put emphasis in the wrong place. That was strongly our feeling in reading the latter part of Dr. Savage's book "Life Beyond Death." He seems to us to make far too light of the grounds of conviction to be found in the implications of our present moral and spiritual life in communion with God, and, on the other hand, to draw unwarrantable conclusions from the psychical phenomena he records. If, as he says he has found, there is even among religious teachers in the different churches, orthodox and heterodox alike, a lamentable uncertainty and weakness of faith in the life beyond death, the true way is, we believe, not "to seek after a sign," but rather to turn with more complete self-surrender and fidelity to the claims of present duty and affection, in quietness with God, to trust the intimations of His Spirit, bearing witness with ours, in pure aspiration and in love, which is, indeed, stronger than death. Enduring faith must be based upon that personal surrender to the Divine will, that more perfect entering into the meaning and power of our life as it is now is, for ever in the presence and the faithful care of the Eternal. If they "hear not the prophets"—the inward prophetic word of the deeper life with God, can they have clear vision of spiritual things, and would they really believe, though one rose from the dead? The sermon on "The Divine Inspiration" in the volume "Pillars of the Temple" contains some reference to this subject, describing some of the psychological facts, which set one thinking, and repeats one remarkable story about Mrs. Livermore, told also in "The Life Beyond Death." We must not attempt to argue the matter further here, and only suggest once more that the most certain and the most essential facts are to be found in the normal path of wholesome daily duty, and that great caution is to be observed in dealing with the abnormal.

Apart from these questions, however, there is abundant help in Dr. Savage's Sermons, making for the upbuilding of a true religious life, and we cannot better conclude this notice than by two quotations from the volume on the "Passing and the Permanent in Religion," of which we are glad to welcome most cordially the Sixpenny People's Edition (of seven of the thirteen sermons), issued by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

The first is from the sermon on "Worship":—

"And so in every nation, in all ages, under every sky, men have worshipped beauty or truth or the ideals of human service, of human goodness; and, loving thus the high and fine things which are the manifestations of God, they are then worshippers. And, whether they are in the woods with Bryant, who says that the woods were God's first temples; whether they are in some pagan temple and have never heard of our religion; whether they are in Rome in St. Peter's; whether they are in a Quaker meeting-house, where the form of worship is so simple that often it consists of sitting and waiting for the moving of the Spirit—wherever they are, if they admire whatever is lovely, true, and noble, and are lifted and moved by a desire to help on and benefit the world—these are the true worshippers of Him who is Spirit, and who desires to be worshipped in spirit and in truth.

"But, while they who admire beauty or truth, they who are awed by mystery or lifted by music, they who admire heroic deeds or consecrate themselves to human service—while these are true worshippers of God, and far above those who are punctilious in ceremonial while lacking the love which is the great essential, there is one thing which is better yet. These admirers of the external manifestations of the Divine may be only in the outer courts of the temple. There is an inner holy of holies, into which the great spiritual leaders of the race have shown a way. Blessed are they who find the door, and are admitted to the presence chamber of the king—better yet, who are folded close to the loving heart of the Father."

This other is the conclusion of the sermon on "Prayer," with which the Popular Edition ends. Having referred to the teaching of Jesus on the subject, and his own prayer, "Father, not my will, but Thine," Dr. Savage adds:—

"He did not ask for a great many things. His prayer was gratitude and trust. So it seems to me that as we get older, as we think more deeply, as we get closer to God, we leave behind us that old attitude of begging for selfish advantages. We find that the grandest and sweetest things for ourselves do not come along those channels. Science, in its latest word, is in that utterance of Tennyson, where he says:

> Speak to Him thou for He hears; and spirit with spirit can meet—
> Closer is He than breathing, and nearer than hands and feet.

"We can speak to Him; and so I trust myself to speak to Him without caring whether my words are always overwise and carefully selected or not. When my little boy, playing on the floor at my feet, at last tired out, climbs up on my knees and prattles and talks to me, and tells me what he wishes, do I care whether he is wise or not or whether he asks me for things that a philosopher would ask for? I do not want him to be a philosopher. I want him to be my boy.

"And so, if God be our Father, I think He would get tired of us if we were always posing as philosophers in His presence. Let us pour out our hearts, and love Him, and believe He loves us, and learn to trust Him, so that we may be patient if the burden does crush us. Only let us get hold of His hand; then we will bear the pain; we will walk, if it is ever so dark. We will not trouble. We will wait until the light breaks. Only let us get hold of His hand and feel His touch, which is life and peace."

ROUSSEAU.*

GENEVA was the birthplace of Rousseau, the most famous, if also the most enigmatical, of many famous sons of that beautiful lake city. In "Rousseau and Naturalism in Life and Thought," Professor W. H. Hudson has produced in a comparatively small compass an account equally judicial and judicious of a mauvais sujet, as Rousseau undoubtedly is, in both senses, to an English pen. Professor Hudson has achieved a remarkable success. He has given such a calm, clear, and withal kind portrayal of Rousseau as a man, and such a luminous presentment of his work and influence as a writer, as to render any great reading of Rousseau himself practically superfluous. We experience the feeling that whether we had read Rousseau or not all that is necessary and essential to know about him and his epoch-making influence has here been said. "What charming frankness runs through the 'Confessions'!" Professor Hudson quotes Samuel Rogers as writing to his friend Sharpe: "Of the frankness," he says, "there can be no question, though whether it is always charming will be a matter of individual taste. . . . His autobiography is full of things which, in Pliny's phrase, must be introduced with an apology, even if they are touched upon at all." "I have felt the full force of a remark which the late Mr. Grant Allen once made to me—that it is impossible to give an absolutely accurate picture of Rousseau in any book written in English for popular perusal." The writer therefore chooses to "imply rather than to particularise." It is to be feared, therefore, that Rousseau could not have subscribed to the last two lines of the following verse which was recently singled out as the best thing in a book of minor poetry by a newspaper critic:—

> My verses are not much, I grant,
> Not mine to cater for the crowd,
> But what I sing my maiden aunt
> Could read aloud.

One cannot help sympathising with a generous critic of Rousseau's, who exclaims, with some impatience, about "the long, slow, sordid story" of Rousseau's life, revealed in the "Confessions." "Qui la saurait s'il ne l'eût révelée?" (who would have known it had he not himself revealed it?) His genius alone would then have been known, whereas now the world is apt to reflect that "if he had genius, that was all he had." Had Rousseau turned out to be a saint instead of (it is to be feared) a madman, the clean heart created within him might have justified a publication of a book of "Confessions," and made the wearing of the unclean heart on his sleeve a tolerable spectacle, but, as it is, this obtrusive confessional everywhere interferes with a patient reading or an unbiassed judgment of this epoch-maker. His life seems a regular, or rather irregular, collection of immoral and unmoral and some moral curiosities, a kind of psychological museum, with shady corners replete with elegantly exhibited monsters and monstrosities. Professor Hudson's occasional touches of light banter carry him smoothly round many an awk ward corner both of Rousseau's character and of his teachings. He brings in a sufficiency of extenuating circumstances to justify his recommendation of Rousseau to the tender mercies of mankind. From an endless confusion of paradoxes and contradictions he produces a tolerable appearance of consistency and a very creditable show of method in Rousseau's madness. Carlyle's withering irony and tireless allusion to "the Gospel of Jean-Jacques" is pleasant reading till we come to the lurid atmosphere of the Revolution, when it becomes awesome and fearful, and "Jean-Jacques" seems by no means to have been on the side of the angels as he seems to have flattered himself he was. One feels, after reading Professor Hudson's portrayal of the man and estimate of his work, that Carlyle honoured Rousseau with too much responsibility for what happened a dozen years after his death. At any rate, justice is meted out to other people responsible somewhat for the production of Rousseau himself, amongst others to Isaac Rousseau, whom his deluded son called "the best of fathers." A skilful sketch of that "vagabond" contributes largely to win our sympathy for his unhappy son. Rousseau became a hopeless vagabond, too, and before and even after his genius had burst with startling suddenness out of a character that had seemed intellectually dull and stupid and morally base, he seems to have tried everything in the way of trades, professions, and other "visible means" of subsistence. He once entertained a passing notion that he would like to be minister; he would, he says, have enjoyed preaching sermons—especially, adds Professor Hudson, as there is no necessary relationship between preaching and practice. "But funds failing for the carrying out of this ambition, he was articled to a notary, by whom he was soon discharged for ignorance and stupidity." Later on, when Mme. de Warens had grown anxious to get him off her hands, a relative of hers, M. d'Aubonne, "pronounced the young man very limited in intelligence, and therefore advised that he should be made into a parish priest; but he made such unsatisfactory progress with his studies that he was in due course returned to his patroness as hopelessly inept even for the priesthood." However, a day came when he emerged, and proclaimed his gospel, unloading on an astonished world his bundles of paradoxes on nature and civilisation, on the effects of the arts and sciences on human progress, on education, on politics, on religion. A day came when his name became a synonym for Nature and Truth, and found a place, as Arthur Young tells us, among the worthies to whom the temple of philosophers is dedicated at Ermenonville, and whose names are marked on the columns—Newton, Lucem; Descartes, Nil in rebus inane; Voltaire, Ridiculum; Rosseau, Naturam. And before we take leave of Professor Hudson, he seems to prove us all to be Rousseauites whether we like it or not; which means that we have been influenced by his teaching when we have been able to understand what it was, while cherishing an inevitable antipathy to Rousseau himself when we have been able to understand what he was and did as a man. We feel, indeed, after reading some excellent books on Rousseau, including this one of Professor Hudson's that we are running with the hare and hunting with the hounds, and that curious experience makes one feel it necessary to find some comprehensive formula by which to speak of him. A bundle of paradoxes, a parcel of contradictions, a pack of lies—the usual formulas—are rather pleasantries than serious attempts at comprehension. A limpid pool with slime below wherein are creeping things innumerable, both small and great beasts, and whose movements sometimes blurred the pure waters above—this, or something like this, seems to be as fair an image of unhappy Rousseau as the circumstances admit of. We should like to be on the side of many good men and true, including Boswell, who not only could defend but become enthusiastic over the man and his writings, and also we should like to be on the side of the angels with Dr. Johnson, Theodore Parker, and others, whose language broke all bounds of Parliamentary moderation when speaking of him. "It seems, sir," said Dr. Johnson to Boswell, "you have kept very good company abroad, Rousseau and Wilkes!" Thinking it enough to defend one at a time, said Boswell, "I answered with a smile, 'My dear sir, you don't call Rousseau bad company? Do you really think him a bad man?'" Johnson: "Sir, if you are talking jestingly of this, I don't talk with you. If you mean to be serious, I think him one of the worst of men; a rascal, who ought to be hunted out of society as he has been. Three or four nations have expelled him, and it is a shame that he is protected in this country. . . . Rousseau, sir, is a very bad man. I would sooner sign a sentence for his transportation than that of any felon who has gone from the Old Bailey these many years." "This violence seemed very strange to me," says Boswell, "who had read many of Rousseau's animated writings with great pleasure and even edification; had been much pleased with his society, and was just come from the Continent where he was generally admired. Nor can I yet allow that he deserves the very severe censure which Johnson pronounced upon him. His absurd preference of savage to civilised life and other singularities are proofs rather of a defect in his understanding than of any depravity in his heart." It is obvious that Dr. Johnson was not so much concerned about the defects of the understanding as the depravity in the heart of a man whom Mme. D'Épinay came at length to describe as "a moral dwarf mounted on stilts." A quite modern instance will help us to realise the enigmatical character of Rousseau. We read recently in Mr. Morley's "Life of Gladstone" that "the rest of the session (1835) Mr. Gladstone passed in his usual pursuits, reading all sorts of books from the correspondence of Leibnitz with Bossuet, and Alexander Knox's 'Remains,' down to Rousseau's 'Confessions.' As to the last of these he scarcely knew whether to read on or to throw it aside, and, in fact, he seems only to have persevered with that strange romance of a wandering soul for a day or two." And then, a few pages further on, we read: "At Oxford," he records, "I read Rousseau's 'Social Contract,' which had no influence upon me, and the writings of Burke, which had a great deal." "Yet the day came," adds Mr. Morley, "when he, too, was drawn by the movement of things into the flaming circle of thought, feeling, phrase that in romance and politics and all the ways of life Europe for a century associated with the name of Rousseau. There was what men call Rousseau in a statesman, who could talk of men's 'common flesh and blood' in connection with a Franchise Bill. Indeed, one of the strangest things in Mr. Gladstone's growth and career is this unconscious raising of a partially Rousseauite structure on the foundations laid by Burke, to whom Rousseau was of all writers on the nature of man and the ordering of states the most odious and contemptible. . . . Mr. Gladstone was never an 'equalitarian,' but the passion for simplicity he had—simplicity in life, manners, feeling, conduct, the relations of men to men, dislike of luxury and profusion and all the fabric of artificial and factitious needs." Mr. Morley's next sentence, however, gives us a little sense of relief and a feeling of gratification that the word "Rousseau," like the blessed word "Mesopotamia," cannot explain everything. "It may well be that he (Gladstone) went no further for all this than the Sermon on the Mount, where so many secret elements of social volcano slumber." We are glad to remember such a statement as this at times when we are being carried away by Professor Hudson's more or less reluctant eagerness not to underrate Rousseau's solid claims to recognition as an epoch-maker. Nearly all the pedagogical writers we find are either Rousseau's disciples or owe much to his inspiration—Kant, Basedow, Pestalozzi, Herbart, Froebel, and Mme. Necker, to mention only outstanding names. It seems it was usual to add the name of Herbert Spencer. But, fortunately or unfortunately for Spencer, he told Professor Hudson that at the time his own book on "Education" was written, he had not even heard of the existence of "Emile," and never read it even when he did hear of it. All of which is highly comforting in many ways that we cannot now stop to explain. We derive comfort also from a remark of Professor Hudson's near the end of his volume that "there was Rousseauism before Rousseau, and there was Rousseauism irrespective of him in his own age, and in that which succeeded his own." What this "ism" was we must defer for later consideration. By his manner of setting it forth, by the magic of his style, by "the wonderful power of his language" he was enabled to influence a quite innumerable host of writers, such as Buffon, Kant, Fichte, Lessing, Goethe, Bernardin de St. Pierre, Chateaubriand, Sénacour, Mme. de Staël and George Sand, Lamartine, de Vigny, de Musset, Victor Hugo, Goldsmith, Cowper, Burns, Byron, Shelley, and George Eliot. Wordsworth escapes from this category, probably for the same reason that Herbert Spencer does, that he did not read other people's works.

XXVII.

OUR Censor Theologicus in college used to say that Scripture was eloquent even in its lists of names. We received the saying as a harmless whimsicality, but I have seen the truth of it in later and more studious days. Of these lists none is more eloquent than that which closes the Epistle to the Romans. It is at first sight a bare catalogue. Most of the names are Greek, some are Latin, one is Hebrew. Many are common slave names. The first two are names of women. The second woman is named before her husband, taking, for some reason, higher rank as a member of the Church. Two others are bracketed together —most likely sisters, to judge by their fanciful pet names; two are named separately, and all bear the titles "servant" or "worker" as the most honourable that can be given. Of the men, six are Jews, and are for that reason affectionatelyclaimed as "kinsmen" by the writer. Of the Greek names, three are names of heathen deities, whence it may be gathered that, with a fine consideration for Gentile converts, the difficulty which would be made now was not made then with regard to such names at the time of baptism. The "Church" is the Christian assembly, wherever assembled. To-day there is a prayer-meeting in the house of Aquila and Priscilla, and the Church is then "in their house"; to-morrow it will be in the house of Philologus and Julia, and the saints will then be "with them." These named members may well have started when their names were read out. A comprehensive greeting after the modern fashion might have included them all, but here is a special salutation for each. The Apostle has in every case something particular to say, and says it in the pleasantest, and at the same time most discriminating, way. These are no complimentary forms of common use. Each message is personal, and touches something in the history or character of the person addressed. What could be more kindly and happily said than: "Stand by her who made a stand for many"; "Unto whom not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentiles;" "My kinsmen . . . in Christ before me;" "His mother . . . and mine;" "My host . . and of the whole Church;" "My beloved . . . the first fruit of Asia." There are shades of meaning in verbal variations, such as "Epænetus, my beloved;" "Persis, whom we all love;" "Ampliatus, beloved in the Lord." "Sister," "brother," "fellow-worker," "fellow prisoner," "approved in Christ," "chosen in the Lord," are the terms of relationship and attachment uniting them all. Social rank in the outside world is not so much as thought of; they belong now to a spiritual order, in which spiritual qualities are the only qualifications. The official position of the "city treasurer" at Corinth, who sends a kindly message, is recognised with perhaps a touch of satisfaction—there were few persons of dignity amongst them—but his name is last but one, and he is coupled with "Quartus the brother," who may have been a city porter.

The congregational spirit has been a powerful influence in religious life. The meeting-house has been a house of meeting, and in this house of God men have walked as friends. Only under such conditions is it possible in any real sense to rejoice with them that do rejoice, and to weep with them that weep, and only in such a body is it really felt that, if one member suffer, all the members suffer with it. But the congregational life is everywhere declining, partly, perhaps, because family life is everywhere dissolving. The collective life of a national church, with its less severe demands, makes a stronger appeal, and promises larger liberties—freedom from question, freedom from observation, broader sympathies, broader conceptions. And who shall say that the collective spirit is not a spirit to be cherished? It is good to think and feel sometimes the wider fellowship. Would that both spirits could be reconciled, the congregational and the catholic—the spirit of personal sympathy, and the spirit of corporate unity! Reconciliation will come, perhaps, when we learn to mould our small assemblies into true fraternities, and resort to some greater house of prayer for united worship.

THE OPEN BROTHERHOOD.

SIR,—I deeply regret that Mr. Darbishire's letter imposes upon me the duty of replying to a gentleman for whom I have the profoundest personal respect. My last desire also would have been to provoke a controversy by the paper which I read at the meeting of the Missionary Conference. Perhaps, on that occasion, for the sake of winning support for a project in which I am keenly interested, I over-emphasised a hesitancy in propagandist work, and a distrust of our power to do much good in the world, which seem to me to reveal themselves at times among us. But in regard to the whole question, if anyone who read my paper, and your admirable and sympathetic leader in the same issue of July 15, would regard them as supplementary to each other, they would not be far from a right appreciation of what was certainly in my own mind, and apparently in that of the Conference which listened to my proposals.

What I said of the Open Brotherhood was brief, incidental, and illustrative of the fact that the establishment of churches is not our sole object. Mr. Darbishire is entirely mistaken in supposing that anything else in the article referred to his Brotherhood. I did not think of Open Brotherhood when mentioning cosmopolitanism, and it is curious that Mr. Darbishire should try to fit himself into the article, unless he feels that there is truth in the suggestion that there are "anti-Unitarians within the fold." I prefer to accept your own disclaimer of acquaintance with them; and I am sorry if I have said what was not true. The fact in my mind at the moment was that while we remain Unitarians individually, no change of collective name will change our character, nor the popular understanding of us.

Mr. Darbishire reckons it an offence that his Brotherhood should be supposed to have any sectarian zeal. He tells us that it has no separate agency, no constitution, no officers, no list of members, no meetings, that it never discusses sectarian matters, and never attempts to impose its own reasoning. And this is the zero to which apparently he would reduce all our existing agencies! How would his method work in any other sphere of human service or endeavour? But his Brotherhood has a Press, financed either by one man or a community, and from that Press issues a literature which advocates a definite policy, and lashes those who think another way. I stand by what I said about its "sectarian zeal."

Mr. Darbishire objects to the statement that his Open Brotherhood breathes out "threatenings against Unitarians." If I had said "organised Unitarianism," he would probably have had no quarrel with me, but there are items in his letter which show that he understood what I meant. If I may be allowed to amend the phrase—though it is not necessary—then the statement, unfortunately, is easy of proof. In addition to frequent pamphlets, Mr. Darbishire's Open Brotherhood has lately issued a volume of collected papers. It is a handsome book of 367 pages, with several portraits of Mr. Darbishire, the chief writer. From 1866 onwards the lash has fallen on many organised Unitarian movements—the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the National Conference, even the Unitarian Temperance Association, and the Home Missionary College Jubilee. And now the Van Mission!

The following extracts will possibly show that a person may be excused for supposing that Mr. Darbishire is not lacking in his threatenings and his sectarianism:—

"We can wait; for ours is the EVERLASTING BROTHERHOOD; and the Church is only temporising—always" (p. 43).

Men "are now even maddened by a Clerical Urgency—which should have no place with them—to exhibit a 'Unitarian Church!' . . . for which there is no real call but only a got-up cry!" (p. 60).

"In these days, of an apparent substitution of certain Idols of 'Unitarianism' and of 'Organsation' for simple Religion, I confess to a certain burning Iconoclasm" (p. 72).

"I cannot help crying out, even in the wilderness, where hungry 'Unitarians,' 'Associations,' and 'Unions,' and 'Conferences' wander about, and unceasingly roar for prey" (p. 73).

"And outside the Meeting-houses . . . the preacher and the prophet . . . I fear, spend nights and days in recourse to their temple and its graven Image, and fall down and worship that, and say, 'Deliver me, for thou art my God, oh! Organisation!'" (p. 162).

"The Church of Rome and her unsanctified issue . . . fight for the kingdoms of this world," &c. "And so does every organised Church in its way down to the monstrous so called 'Unitarian Church!'" (p. 212).

"The Unitarians puff up in rivalry their small body with megalomaniac aggregation . . . —also to grind an axe of their own" (p. 212).

"Cannot our people and their Associations and Conferences and their Ministers . . . once for all leave their 'Unitarianism' and its so called 'Church' and all its theological flags and its ethical fences, to perish in the dust?" (p. 366).

The italics are not mine.

If, in face of these extracts, Mr. Darbishire wishes us to believe that "you could not sectarianise the Open Brotherhood if you tried," some of us will feel that our sectarianism is not the greatest of all evils when compared with Open Brotherhood.

Mr. Darbishire seizes upon a plea of mine that the van shall "travel for Unitarianism."[1] Your own article also took some exception to the words, and you asked, "Who ever heard of a Methodist van travelling for Methodism? Surely it travels simply for the sake of the Gospel, to save men's souls."[2] Precisely so; but when the van came along the people saw from the name that the Methodists were travelling for the Gospel; and when the new van comes along people will see that the Unitarians are travelling for the Gospel. And we ought to be glad of that, for some people have a very different idea about us. They think we spend our energies in discussing names and methods, and that the living Gospel abides not with us? Your criticism was a fair one, and it enables me to make the wish plainer.

But Mr. Darbishire's criticism is not helpful, but destructive. Because, by way of illustrating the need for realisation of a right aim in this new work, I said: "I love the world, but I love my own home better. As a Unitarian I love Catholicism and Buddhism, and all the rest in a general sort of way; but I love my Unitarianism in a special sort of way"—because of this Mr. Darbishire upbraids me as a minister. I wonder what would have been thought, had I put it the other way: "I love my home, but I love the world better; I love Unitarianism, but Catholicism, &c., better? But the stricture fails in its effect when in his letter Mr. Darbishire exclaims of Unitarians and Trinitarians "how I do hate those unreligious dogmatisms." I did at least profess love for those who were afar off, but our friend is less generous to those who are near us.

Do people love that which they call "monstrous"?

Lastly, Mr. Darbishire imagines what a fine sight it will be when the missioners challenge each other. But why should they? In case of a challenge no one would blame us if we did not run away; but it has been made plain that if there is to be challenging it must come from the other side. The van is distinctly not "intended to be a perpetual challenge to every curate and every local preacher."[1] What our friend seems not to see is that though a man is a Unitarian he does not pass the whole of his time reciting the doctrines in which he believes. The burden of Mr. Darbishire's volume, and of his letters, is that open Brotherhood*ism* is better than Unitarian*ism;* but I venture to believe that the Unitarian Van will rigorously avoid sectarianism.

Had it not been discourtesy to withhold a reply, I should have been silent. I bear in mind a word of Mr. Darbishire's that sometimes "the faith of an old man may help some younger one to a more fervent love, and even to a more resolute humanity."[2] And, remembering that, I offer my proof out of the pain that springs now from long years of respectful and personal admiration for our friend.

Thos. P. Spedding.

Rochdale, August 15, 1905.

Sir,—I suppose there are many readers of the Inquirer who, like myself, have from time to time read the pleas for the "Open Brotherhood" without having, to our knowledge, any personal acquaintance with the authors—or author.

Perhaps, if we had such acquaintance we should understand those pleas better, or, at least, feel somewhat differently towards them. However that may be, I must frankly confess that almost invariably there is some part which seems to me to display an extraordinary lack of "sweet reasonableness"—which lack is, I suppose, the very last thing the "Open Brotherhood" would like to be charged with. I, for one, quite expected that a Unitarian van would be a red rag and the scarlet woman to the "Open Brotherhood," and here we have Mr. Darbyshire's letter!

Mr. Spedding can, of course, look after himself. I only desire to say that I am puzzled by the obscurity and apparent inconsistency of Mr. Darbyshire's language, and by the curious claims which he makes.

Here are two or three of the difficulties which his letter presents:—

(1) How is it possible for a man to say (as he does in the last paragraph of his letter) "Practically and theologically, I am a Unitarian, but I have no Unitarianism!" What is the meaning of Unitarianism in this sentence? And what would Mr. Darbyshire say if a man declared: "I am a vegetarian, but I have no vegetarianism," or "I am a pugilist, but I have no pugilism"?

(2) If Mr. Darbyshire is "practically and theologically a Unitarian," why does he explain, in parenthesis, after the words "the Unitarians and the Trinitarians"—"how I do hate those unreligious dogmatisms!" Do the words Unitarian and Trinitarian necessarily imply dogmatism? If so, why does Mr. Darbyshire declare himself a Unitarian?

(3) Since Mr. Darbyshire says, "I have no Unitarianism, I will not carry it about, I will only offer to the best of my power what I believe to be very much better," is it not a little strange that he should declaim against what he calls an "utterly false imputation of anti-Unitarianism"?

(4) What is the difference between the Unitarianism which it is proposed to "carry about" by means of a van, and the "Open Brotherhood, the Christianity of Jesus and the Kingdom of God within," which Mr. Darbyshire believes to be "very much better," and which he will "offer to the best of his power"?

Extremes meet. The most earnest advocate of the Spirit is sometimes the keenest fighter about some little piece of the letter, or some little bit of matter. Why should anyone be frightened by a mere van? Surely that is as unreasonable as to regard it as the one ark of Safety. The word is a little unfamiliar to us—still more so the thing. But, after all, a van is only a vehicle, and language is that. In both cases the most important question is: what is conveyed? Mr. Darbyshire's letter is a van. The "Open Brotherhood" pamphlets form a whole train of them, and they are not only "offered" they are also "carried about." And perhaps if the writers had to step forth on to a van platform and we could hear their voices, instead of only reading their words, they would become clearer and more consistent, and we should be more edified.

H. Rawlings.

AGAINST THE WAR SPIRIT.

Sir,—If your columns are open to those who hold my views, I should like to say that if we love our country—and there are a large number who show by living in it that they prefer it to any other—it is essential that we should be able to repel invasion. There are at least two Continental Powers who would gladly conquer England, and if either of them were to invade us, who believes that the invaders would bow to the decision of any peaceful arbitrator? The large majority of Englishmen desire peace from selfish, and, I believe also, from much higher, motives, and peace is best secured by the preparation for war of the nation desiring peace. If the civilians are instructed in the use of weapons of war, the defence of the nation will be less in the hands of those who follow arms as a profession, and the "military spirit" will be proportionately diminished.

Dennis B. Squire.

HYMNS.

Dear Sir,—May I, through your paper, express my sympathy with the stand taken by that "Teacher in an Elementary School in Essex" who quotes—in your issue of July 29—verses from hymns which are sung by Unitarians, and which cannot be taken at their face value by any genuine, thinking Unitarian.

Two or three years ago I was told by an Unitarian minister that Unitarians and Trinitarians made no difference in their music. I was not ready with my answer then, for I was but just leaving the old Trinitarian faith of my childhood and my fathers, and Unitarian customs and thoughts were new to me; but since that time I have become a firm believer in Unitarianism, and have often been much disturbed by hearing just such words as those quoted sung at Unitarian gatherings. What is the matter? Are there not enough songs expressive of the goodness of God, the beauty of His creation, the greatness and sublimity of pure, unselfish living? If not, how better can some of our poetic ones employ themselves than in supplying this need?—Yours truly,

Cora Isabelle Allen,
State House, Boston, U.S.A.

THE GENEVA MEETINGS.

Sir,—I have read with some amusement in last week's Inquirer Mr. Harrison's advice to travellers summed up in his two words, "keep well." As a means to that end a diet of hot water and weak tea is recommended, a recommendation that many of us are not, however, prepared to follow. I should not have troubled you with this comment had it not been for a communication received from Geneva from Professor Montat, the president, who, reading the letter in The Inquirer, is anxious to inform the timid traveller that the water of Geneva has been pronounced by analysts to be excellent.

May I, as one who has lived for two years on the borders of the Lake, assure those who need assurance, that the water and the food supply generally is as good there as it is in any of our own health resorts.—Yours,

Essex Hall. Ion Pritchard.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A SEASIDE HOLIDAY.

IV.

It did not take Uncle Ned and the boys and dogs long to cross the meadows and sand-flats and reach the shore, where, to Ernest's surprise, they found the water much higher than it had been when they took their evening walk on the previous day. The tide was nearly full; and, as there had been a "new" moon the day before, it was what is called a "spring tide." On the day after "new" and "full" moon the tides always rise higher and fall lower than at other times, and these are known as the "spring tides."

Fortunately, it was a calm morning, so that the breakers, though at times fairly large, were not very alarming, and not at all dangerous. All three boys could swim, having learnt at the public baths in the town from which they came; but, as this was his first experience of sea-bathing, Ernest wondered how he would deal with the rolling waves as they broke and tumbled and dashed on the shore. However, he was no milksop, and when the party had walked a short distance along the sands, and Uncle Ned had decided that the place was suitable, he joined readily in a competition, each striving to be first ready. As they were all very simply clad in jersey, knickers, and sandshoes, it took none of them two minutes to be quite ready; and off they all ran across the strip of damp sand and down to the water's edge, where there was a wide space of boiling foam left by the last breaker, followed by a big roller that seemed to be waiting to give them a boisterous reception. On it came, and just toppled over as they stooped and ducked under its crest. Oh, it was glorious! The great rollers came to meet them so quickly, and caught them unawares, breaking over them in such torrents of foam; and, before they had time to recover, on came another, and another. Then followed a lull, with half a dozen smaller waves; and, taking advantage of this, they all got into water deep enough for swimming. The boys were surprised to find that it was easier both to float and to swim in the sea than in fresh water. How they rolled and tumbled and dived, racing, splashing, and frolicking! Then Uncle Ned, standing up, allowed Ernest to climb and stand on his shoulders and take headers; and every time this was done the recoil sent his uncle sprawling backwards, whilst Ernest shot through the water like an arrow.

And, all the while, Scot also was swimming about and revelling with the others in his holiday, whilst poor Nip kept running frantically to and fro along the shore, dodging the breakers and barking wildly. For a while he was afraid to venture in, and was greatly excited and much mortified at being the only one not enjoying the fun. At last, he could bear it no longer; and, mustering up courage, he plunged in, swimming after Scot, who received him with a joyful bark, Nip answering with a piping yelp of restored self-conceit. He had risen to the occasion, and now felt himself lord of the tumbling billows!

At the end of a quarter of an hour of these delightful pranks, Uncle Ned called them all out of the water, greatly to their regret. They begged "another five minutes," but he was firm, telling them that on the next occasion they might have the extra five minutes, and longer still as they became more hardened; but, for the first turn, they had done enough. So out they came, regretfully, but obediently and cheerfully, all longing for the next day's turn to come quickly; and after a brisk rub with rough towels, they looked like freshly boiled prawns. They then fell to running races and playing touch, and leap-frog; and if you had seen them, you would have thought them mad. The excitement and exhilaration of the sea-bath, followed by a sun-bath, and the breathing of the fresh morning air, seemed to send the blood tingling to every part of their bodies with a glad message of health and keenest enjoyment. It was good to be alive; good to be well; good to be young; good to have an Uncle Ned and a father and mother to love them; good to be true, pure-hearted boys out for a holiday. And if the boys were happy, so, too, were the dogs. They tore along the sand, scattering it right and left, and rolling over and over in mimic dog-battle; and they, also, seemed "beside themselves" with the enjoyment of healthy life.

By-and-by, however, Scot became less inclined for play, and once or twice he pricked up his ears and listened in the direction of the farm; and, at last, he quietly set off and ran homeward, disregarding Nip's invitations to renew their romps.

"I wonder why he has gone off like that," said Charlie.

"I expect Nip has offended him in some way," Frank answered.

"No! It's because he's hungry for his breakfast—like I am," said Ernest.

"Listen," said Uncle Ned; "Mr. Banks is driving the cows back to the meadows; and, as Scot is not there to help him, they are giving him some trouble. I hear him shouting, and imitating Scot's bark. That sound is too much for faithful Scot. He is running back to his duty and self-respect."

And Uncle Ned's interpretation proved to be correct; for, on their return to the farm, Mr. Banks told them, with great glee, of Scot's sudden appearance, and the quick way in which he had dealt with the troublesome cows, who understood his barking, but took no notice of the farmer's hullaballos.

"That dog's worth his weight in gold to me, ten times over," said the farmer; "never worries or fidgets the cattle—always willing and cheerful—would rather work than play any day, and knows his business better than I know mine." And as he said this, he fondled Scot's ears, and the dog looked up, pleased, understanding the tone if he could not comprehend the words themselves.

In the garden they found Mr. and Mrs. Holden and the two girls, who had just returned from a riverside ramble. Mr. Holden was a student of plant-life, and his daughter Elsie and her friend Mab were quickly catching his enthusiasm as he described the purposes and uses of the various parts of a flower, and the ways in which the more beautiful in colour and perfume were adapted to the welcoming of the visits of helpful insects and the driving off of injurious ones.

"Why, father, there seems to be a reason for everything among the plants and flowers," said Elsie.

"Yes, my child, there is, indeed—reason and meaning in all we see in Nature—more reason and purpose than careless, thoughtless folk have sense to perceive—often."

Mab said she thought flowers and ferns and mosses were beautiful in themselves, whether we understood them or not, but much more so the more we knew about them.

"That is quite true, my dear. A child can love a beautiful flower for its beauty alone, whilst a student of Nature, understanding something of its purpose and adaptations, is filled with wonder and awe and a great longing to see and learn more and yet more of Nature's marvels."

At this point they were joined by the boys, who had come back full of the praises and delights of sea-bathing, and counselled the girls to lose no time in having their turn; whereupon Mrs. Banks, who had come to call them all to breakfast, announced that she had a bathing-tent which she would lend to the girls, and Maggie should go down with them in the forenoon and show them how to set it up.

"Oh, what fun! How jolly!" said Mab and Elsie, and the boys asked if they might also help. So, over breakfast—to which they did full justice and showed no mercy—the programme of the day was settled as follows:—

Immediately after breakfast they were all to go down to the shore and set up the tent. Then for three hours they would follow the ebbing tide and hunt for treasures in the rock-pools. At mid-day the girls would have their dip, and Uncle Ned and the boys would return to the farm with their treasures, and arrange them in the tanks. Then lunch at half-past one, and a rest in the garden until three o'clock, after which they would all be invited into the Ogre's Den to see the show. Then, at half-past five, afternoon tea in the garden, and afterwards an evening walk to see the sunset. Next week I hope to tell you how this programme was carried out.

A GOOD EUROPEAN.

THE visit of the French Northern Fleet to English waters has come to an end. It has been signalised by a great naval review, and a liberal display of bunting, by banquets, processions, and many speeches. The officers and men of the French Navy have responded with a charming cordiality to the very hearty expressions of fraternal regard which they have received from all classes of people in this country. The occasion has been utilised for stating and confirming the dream of international peace which is at present so popular. It was left to Mr. JOHN MORLEY to recover the remark made by a French statesman at the Congress of Vienna in 1815: "What I want to find is a good European." In these words we have summed up the finer and more humane thought of the peaceful demonstration of the last few days. We must all re-echo the desire that in these holiday exercises of the great ships of death we may find a harbinger of the better era when international agreement will replace the anarchic period of international struggle.

At the same time, we cannot but perceive something sinister in the particular form chosen to emphasise the Anglo-French Alliance; and something unstable in the loud expressions of goodwill to which it has given rise. It is certainly well that if foreign warships approach our shores they should come wreathed with flags and streamers. The guns are better concealed or half concealed. But, after all, governments do not spend millions on ships and weapons simply to afford an effective background to gorgeous decorations. This appearance of the war fleets in the garb of holiday makers reminds us of those terrible events in the Japanese seas when Russia's last fleet was shattered and sunk. It is for work such as this that battleships are primarily built and maintained. Pleasant, therefore, as it is to listen to the words of peace, pleasant as it is to witness this early dim recognition of a consciousness that even the instruments of war are best used to carry out a demonstration of peace, it were foolish to forget the grim, cruel use for which our armaments have been evolved.

The thought in all minds is, no doubt, the maintenance of peace. And yet there is not lacking a note of menace. The thought is not only that the forces of France and of Great Britain are in union, that these two great sister nations should not, must not, cannot fight the one against the other. For the growth of such a thought we are profoundly thankful. Yet this is not all. These forces of two countries are united against some probable or possible foe. There has been throughout this sub-conscious note of defiance. The Prime Minister, indeed, speaking at the banquet in Westminster Hall, repudiated the interpretation. He does not wish, and the people do not wish, it to bear this construction. But the visit is hardly brought to a close before our journalists begin to discuss the importance of the demonstration from exactly this standpoint. Other European nations are mentioned against whose designs it is urged we must be on our defence. And the inference is drawn—France must improve her navy, England must increase her army. Surely the inference is a false one. The alliance of fleet and army does not help towards real and lasting peace unless it be clearly recognised as a step towards disarmament. The recent appearance of the two fleets in fraternal intercourse may advance the good cause since the path of progress seems always to be a zig-zag line. But if it is to be used for an indiscriminating aggravation of the popularity of the navy, then danger is to be apprehended. It tends to obscure the true ideal, which is not more and stronger ships, but ultimately to have no weapons of war by land or sea. National prosperity does not result from preparations for carnage, but when people seek peace and ensue it.

That may, no doubt, be a far off event. We cannot at present dismantle our warships and disband our battalions. Theories of government and the temper of the nations alike prevent it. But we should keep this aim vigorously to the front. It is not held to be a practical object of policy for governments, but it is becoming a conscious purpose of the peoples. And in the last resort it is in the peaceful sentiments of peoples that the cause of the good European must be found. Everything which helps to overthrow the prejudices against foreigners, and especially everything which promotes a better understanding between the common people of land and land, is to be welcomed. From this point of view the sight in our streets of the English Jack and the French Jacques side by side is not without good significance.

The good European need not be bereft of his own nationality, though he will rejoice in the knowledge of a larger kinship. It was MAZZINI who re-created for modern times the idea of Young Europe, and the thought sprang from the soil of a magnificent faith. It was the same MAZZINI who had already proclaimed the idea of Young Italy. In Italy, for the Italian; in England, for the Englishman, the fullest experience of life unfolds itself. Or even in some far narrower sphere. For it is in their own city first, or in their own plot of earth, among the fields of daily toil, where men discover their common interests, share their ideals, and fuse their thoughts and even their inharmonies of temper in the simple affections of life. When this has taken place we have the good villager. The good European needs a larger imaginative realisation. There must be a conviction of common interests between peoples, a sharing of inter-national ideals. To this end is needed such larger acquaintance and more frequent intercourse as will lend the force of closer comradeship to the abstract thought of international comity. The creation of the good European is pre-eminently the work of the European peoples.

There is an event which is now a twelvemonth old, which therefore in the rush of more recent doings has become almost as ancient history, of which we may with advantage remind ourselves. Just as this summer has witnessed its naval peace demonstration, so last summer had its popular movement towards the goodwill of nations. We are indebted to the Working Men's Club and Institute Union for recalling it at the present moment. The event to which we refer is the visit to France in July, 1904, of over three hundred British working people, members of the Working Men's Clubs. The publication in the latest report of the Union of a full description of this tour is extremely timely. In the visit of fleet to fleet there is inevitably some reference, however wisely concealed, to the probability of war; some glorification of the aggressive spirit. But in this gathering of the peoples of two countries, the only reference is towards the maintenance of peace and the strengthening of friendship. Behind it lie all the meanings of brotherhood, of fraternité, gathered up into that harder, but necessary word, so nearly alike in its French and English spelling, and so essential to right human relations between all the peoples—the word of Solidarity.

ABOUT GENEVA.

THESE are some fugitive notes of one who has come to Geneva, once more "on the Wings of Delight," but with the sober purpose of the International Council meetings at the end of the month, to come after a fortnight among the great mountains.

At the second meeting of the Council three years ago, we found Amsterdam a very fascinating city, with its quaint streets and the broad Amstel, and the many waterways, the "Grachten," sometimes busy with traffic, sometimes with an old-world quietness in the stately houses of the burghers and the beautiful avenues making shaded walks along the waterside—a sturdy Venice of the North, where our brethren of the Liberal Faith offered a warm-hearted and most hospitable welcome, which we shall not soon forget, to their visitors from many lands.

Geneva will certainly be found no less fascinating as the meeting-place for this year's Council. The beauty of its lake is world-famous. One may spend a whole day traversing the length of its forty-five miles by steamer, starting in the early morning, and be happy if there is not a ripple on the water, but that entrancing stillness and the marvellous colours which only the first hours and the evening seem to know, and then having had some hours to spare, for a visit, if one will, to the castle of Chillon, or a stroll through the picturesque little town of Villeneuve and up the valley of the Rhone, coming back in the quiet evening, with first the glory of the sunset on the crags, and touching the distant snows of Mont Blanc, seen over the dark nearer hills, a vision of ethereal majesty, and then as the light pales, a new glory, if it chance to be full moon and a clear night—with the moon just over that great white mountain, and its light streaming across the lake.

But even if one goes no further than the city itself the lake is there in ample beauty, its broad waters circled by the hills, and from the northern shore Mont Blanc can be seen, "Blanc, supreme above his earth-brood," while close at hand there are exquisite green places, even by the steam-boat piers the charming "English Garden," and not far away on the other side that beautiful old garden, now a public park, "Mon Repos." Visitors who secure fifth-story rooms in any of the hotels overlooking the lake will be well repaid for going up so high by visions of beauty early and late, and colours not to be seen on English lakes.

The natural beauty of Geneva is greater than any architectural interest in its public buildings, though these are by no means unworthy of its traditions, and the cathedral is a striking object, said to be the site of an ancient temple of Apollo, crowning the highest point of the old city. That leads one to the beginning of the chain of historical associations connected with Geneva, of which some of the latest are of special interest to English people.

Coming into Geneva, it ought not to be forgotten that Julius Cæsar once came down to this place, and saw the native Celtic settlement "at the out-going of the waters." After him, the next great conqueror, associated with the later Christian city, was John Calvin. It was a marvellous achievement of the young man of only twenty-five, who practically completed in the first draft of his "Institutes of the Christian Religion" that system of theology which had for generations its iron grip upon the mind and conscience of a great part of Christendom. "Calvinism" is for us a name of baleful import, yet we must remember what it meant in the life of our Puritan forefathers and of the strong men of New-England and of Scotland, till a more humane and Christ-like doctrine took its place. To Geneva Calvin came from France when he was twenty-eight, soon after the Reformation had been accepted there through the earnest teaching of Farel. At once he became the ruling spirit, and after a short banishment in 1541 his rule became more absolute than ever. A rule of the saints without the chief Christian grace of charity, so it appears to us; and it was stained in the autumn of 1553 by the remorseless condemnation of the Spaniard, Michael Servetus, to a martyr's death. Three years later John Knox came to Geneva, and was minister of the English congregation there until 1559, when he returned to Scotland, to carry out his great work of Reformation there.

Calvin died at Geneva in 1564, and was succeeded in the chief authority over the church by his friend and fellow-worker Theodore Beza, who lived to a great age and died in 1605. In his time the church government became more democratic. Only in 1847 the old Protestant régime was abolished, and a liberal church, described as practically creedless, with a popular franchise, was established.

Although the Roman Catholic saint, Francis de Sales, was only titular Bishop of Geneva, one likes to associate him and his "Introduction to the Devout Life" with any thoughts of that neighbourhood. He was born at the family castle near Annecz, in Savoy, 1567, three years after Calvin's death, and such was the charm of his personality that he was very successful in bringing back the Protestant people of his country into the Roman fold. It was in 1596 that he became coadjutor to the Bishop of Geneva, and succeeded him in 1602. He refused more than one French bishopric and a Cardinal's hat, and died among his own people in 1622. If one had to choose between Calvin and this Francis, judging by their character and the temper of their life, one could not be an extreme Protestant.

Of Rousseau, who was born at Geneva in 1712, Mr. Thomas is now writing in THE INQUIRER, and we may pass to more recent memories. One special interest there is for us in the Town Hall, for there in 1872 was the scene of the Alabama Arbitration. The other memories we note here are personal of some of our best known English authors.

In 1849, after her father's death, George Eliot came abroad with her great friends, the Brays of Coventry. They went through France to Genoa and Milan, and then by the Lakes Como and Maggiore to Martigny, and by way of Chamonix to Geneva, where they arrived in the third week of July. There her friends left George Eliot for the winter. She lived first at the Pension Campagne Plongeon, but in October moved into Geneva, to live with an artist's family at 18, Rue des Chanoines, In March of the following year she returned to Coventry.

It was in the same autumn that young Matthew Arnold was up at Glion and wrote his memorable lines "In memory of the Author of Obermann" (the recluse Sénancour, 1770–1846). We quote the lines which so vividly picture the beauty of the scene at the eastern end of the lake:—

How often, where the slopes are green
On Jaman, hast thou sate
By some high chalet-door, and seen
The summer-day grow late;

And darkness steal o'er the wet grass
With the pale crocus starr'd,
And reach the glimmering sheet of glass
Beneath the piny sward,

Lake Leman's waters, far below!
And watch'd the rosy light
Fade from the distant peaks of snow;
And on the air of night

Heard accents, of the eternal tongue
Through the pine branches play—
Listen'd, and felt thyself grow young!
Listen'd, and wept——

The verse breaks off abruptly to another thought, but in "Obermann Once More," twenty years after, Mr. Arnold wrote again of "Glion, but not the same!"

And yet I know not! all unchanged
The turf, the pines, the sky!
The hills in their old order ranged;
The lake, with Chillon by!

* * * * *

Soft darkness on the turf did lie;
Solemn, o'er hut and wood,
In the yet star-sown nightly sky,
The peak of Jaman stood.

* * * * *

And glorious there, without a sound
Across the glimmering lake,
High in the Valais-depth profound,
I saw the morning break.

Only one other memory connected with Geneva we must recall here, and that is of Browning and his friend Ann Egerton-Smith, who died suddenly of heart disease on the morning of September 14, 1877, at La Saisiaz, the house in the neighbourhood of Geneva where they were spending the autumn. The poem "La Saisiaz," published in the following year, tells of the event, and gives occasion for a reasoned expression of Browning's thoughts on the subject of immortality.

Browning and his friend had planned, on the morning that she died, to make the ascent of Salève, the highest of the hills in the immediate vicinity of Geneva, and the evening before they had walked some of the way up, and came back quietly as the darkness gathered and the stars were coming out. These lines tell of how they decided on their evening walk to go a little way up the hill then and there:—

So, we turned from the low grass-path you were pleased to call "your own,"
Set our faces to the rose-bloom o'er the summit's front of stone
Where Salève obtains, from Jura and the sunken sun she hides,
Due return of blushing "Good Night," rosy as a borne-off bride's,
For his masculine "Good Morrow" when, with sunrise still in hold,

Gay he hails her, and, magnific, thrilled her black length burns to gold.
Up and up we went, how careless—nay, how joyous! all was new,
All was strange. Call progress toilsome? that were just insulting you.
How the trees must temper noontide! Ah, the thicket's sudden break!
What will be the morning's glory, when at dusk thus gleams the lake!
Light by light puts forth Geneva: what a land —and, of the land,
Can there be a lovelier station than this spot where now we stand?

These lines and Matthew Arnold's we leave to make their own impression, full as they are of a sense of the loveliness to be found at Geneva.

Geneva, August 13.

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL RELIGIOUS THINKERS AND WORKERS.—GENEVA, 1905.

BRIEF PROGRAMME.

Sunday, August 27.

Religious service for English members in La Chapelle des Maccabees (contiguous to the Cathedral) conducted by the Rev. Charles Hargrove (Leeds) and the Rev. Joseph Wood (Birmingham), at 5 p.m. (Swiss time).

Monday, August 28.

The office for the issue of tickets to members will be open from 9 to 12, and 2 to 6, at the Professors' Room, University Buildings, Geneva.

Religious service at 8 p.m. in the Cathedral of St. Peter, when M. le Pasteur E. Roberty (Paris) will preach.

Reception to the foreign delegates at 9.30 p.m. in the Rooms of the Literary Society Corraterie.

Tuesday, August 29.

The Congress will meet in the University Hall at 9 a.m. Addresses by Professor A. Chantre and Professor E. Montet. Report by the Rev. C. W. Wendte, and brief papers by the Rev. A. Altherr (Basle), Dr. Mayor (Fribourg), M. Andre Bourrier (Sèvres), Professor G. Boros (Koloszvar), Dr. Tony Andre (Florence).

The Congress will adjourn at 12 o'clock, and resume from 2 to 4, when brief papers will be read by Professor B. D. Eerdmans (Leyden), Rev. James Hocart (Brussels), Professor J. J. Gourd (Geneva), Professor B. Nath Sen (Calcutta), Rev. F. C. Southworth (Meadville, U.S.A.), Rev. W. Copeland Bowie (London).

From 5 to 9 p.m. there will be an excursion on the Lake of Geneva, with a collation on board the steamer.

Wednesday, August 30.

Religious service at 9 a.m. in the Cathedral of St. Peter. Dr. K. Furrer (Zurich) will preach.

The Congress will meet in the University Hall from 10.30 to 12.30, when papers will be read by Hon. Samuel J. Barrows (Washington, U.S.A.), Professor Otto Pfleiderer (Berlin), M. Hyacinthe Loyson (Geneva), Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter (Oxford), Professor F. G. Peabody (Harvard), Rabbi Louis Levy (Dijon).

From 2 to 5 p.m. there will be further papers and discussion.

At 8.30 p.m. there will be a conversazione at the Palais Eynard;

Thursday, August 31.

Religious service at 9 a.m. in the Cathedral. Rev. Dr. M. J. Savage (New York) will preach.

The Congress will meet in the University Hall from 10.30 to 12.30, when brief papers will be read by the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz (Amsterdam), Professor Jean Réville (Paris), the Rev. W. G. Tarrant (London).

From 2 to 4 there will be further papers and discussion. The formal proceedings of the Congress will be concluded at 5 p.m.

There will be an organ recital and sacred concert at 6 p.m. in the Cathedral of St. Peter.

At 8 p.m. there will be a banquet (the place will be announced later).

Sunday, September 3.

Religious service in the Cathedral of St. Peter. M. le Pasteur Charles Wagner (Paris), author of "The Simple Life," &c., will preach.

A LUTHERAN CONFIRMATION.

BY MRS. BAYLE BERNARD.

THE scene was a small plain church in the city of Dantsic, more remarkable for its antiquity than for anything else, for it was built "to the praise of God and holy Bartholomew" so long ago as 1373. The whitened walls within display no ornament save a row of small Scriptural pictures of no great merit, while at the altar end are grouped a cluster of portraits of past generations of preachers—black-robed shadows strangely similar in attitude and accessories, as though for a German pastor as for an Egyptian god there were but one proper form of representation, since each holds a half-closed Bible in one hand, while the other rests upon a red-painted communion-table. They seem to be all looking down complacently at the actual sacred object below, which is covered on the present occasion with white embroidered muslin, and blooming like a bower in the profusion of its floral adornments, its vases filled with gay bouquets, and its massive candlesticks almost hidden among verbenas, asters, and dahlias. The doors of the church, too, are wreathed with oak leaves and autumn flowers, and the portals of the parsonage house, which opens into the churchyard, are similarly decorated, for it is here that the children assemble before entering the church in procession on this great day of the annual Confirmation. In Lutheran Germany no episcopal stranger comes from a distance to invoke a blessing on the youthful crowd he has never seen before and may never see again, but each pastor performs the ceremony yearly in his own church for such of his own flock and no other as are prepared to take part in it; and, as it is not a mere voluntary affair, but the law in its majesty requires that every Prussian child shall be confirmed as soon as it is of a suitable age, each year is sure to furnish a due supply of candidates, who are also bound to attend their ministers' instruction meetings once or twice a week for at least a twelvemonth previous to the crowning rite. There was a goodly crowd, for Pastor H—— was deservedly popular, being one of the best pastors and most eloquent preachers in the city. Spectators had begun to assemble an hour before; and, there being no columns or galleries to obstruct the view, it was evident at a glance that the plain painted pews which fill the body of the church were all fully occupied, when, precisely at one o'clock, an organ peal, accompanied by a crash of drums and trumpets, announced that the procession had arrived, and the file of youth of both sexes, with the minister at their head, entered the principal door and walked up the aisle to their place before the altar, where they bowed their heads silently for a few moments and then took their seats on the benches prepared for them. The girls, who occupied the front seats, were mostly attired in new dresses—a few in white, more in black, but many in colours—and, though wearing shawls or mantles, were without any covering on their heads. All carried bouquets, and the boys behind, even the blue-garbed orphans from the Asylum, had each a posy fastened in his coat.

After a couple of long hymns had been sung, the minister reappeared from the vestry—for the clergyman is rarely seen in the church during singing time—and stood before the altar, while his little flock rose and remained standing during his address: "My children," said he, in impressive tone, "the pleasant hours we have spent together during the last year have come to an end, and you are assembled this day to take leave of your childhood. Hitherto watched over and guided by others, you will now be left comparatively to yourselves; for, by the rite we are to celebrate to-day, the child passes over the threshold of a new era in life and enters upon youth." Then, after setting forth the trials and temptations they were likely to encounter, and how these might best be met, in words of awful warning he told the fate of the wicked or the weak, and then in glowing phrase proclaimed the reward of the righteous, and how they who persevere to the end shall have their strength renewed upon the way, and gain life and immortality at last. Long ere he had concluded, every girl before him was sobbing with violent emotion, the boys were furtively feeling for their handkerchiefs or brushing their hands across their cheeks, while among the maturer congregation many an eye was wet.

The address concluded, the pastor opened his book and read thence the four formally appointed questions to which the candidates are to reply with that one single affirmative syllable which is the only word a Lutheran Christian is ever called upon by his religion to pronounce aloud. The children were asked: If they will remain in the bosom of the Church; if they believe the articles of the Creed; if they intend to lead a godly and virtuous life; and, lastly, if they will promise to attend the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper regularly; and to all these questions the youthful band responded with a loud assenting "Ja!" Glancing at a written list which he held in his hand, the pastor then called out the names of three of the boys—for these always take precedence of their sisters on such occasions—who, leaving their seats, made their way to the cushions before the altar and knelt while he first repeated to each some specially chosen text, then, laying his hands alternately on their heads, gave them the formal church-appointed blessing. A year's intercourse with his young neophytes must give the minister some insight into their character, and an indication of the opinion he has formed on the subject may not infrequently be gathered from the Confirmation text selected for each individual, and which is intended to serve him as a sort of life-motto, some receiving counsel, some warning, some encouragement. Of the first three who came forward, one bright, handsome boy who, during the address, had appeared almost as much affected by it as the girls, happening, in passing the pews, to catch a glimpse of an acquaintance—a youth a few years older than himself—seemed in a moment to have forgotten all that was passing around him; for, though he knelt down mechanically with his companions, his glance still rested on the distant pew, till his volatile thoughts were recalled by the words, spoken in a tone of grieved remonstrance: "Hold fast that which is good." He blushed and cast down his eyes as the pastor turned to one of the boys beside him—rather a soulless, fretful-looking lad—with the apostolical exhortation: "Be content with such things as ye have," then, with a voice of deep tenderness, addressed to the third—a pale little orphan—the cheering assurance: "When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up." Three by three the boys continued thus to come forward to receive each his text and his blessing and then return to their places, till all of them had joined in the rite—for even the charity-boys, by virtue of their sex, precede all the young ladies—and then the girls took their turn in couples instead of triplets. At length all the youthful flock had knelt before the pastor and listened to his counsel and benediction, when, with a quick, lively tone, he exclaimed: "Now, my children, my friends, let us kneel before our God and ask Him to take you for ever into His keeping"; then, flinging himself upon his knees before the altar, the group of youths and maidens rose up once more in a state of violent agitation, and, the girls pressing foremost, as many as could possibly find room upon the altar-circling cushions crowded there, while the rest threw themselves, kneeling, on the ground around the minister, sobs and sighs resounding on all sides, while a fervent and eloquent prayer was poured forth that all who were gathered there might at last meet at God's right hand to remain with Him eternally. In the ordinary services of the church all either sit or stand, the Germans seldom kneeling, even at receiving the Communion; and, therefore, in the posture so rarely assumed there seemed a solemnity that was almost overwhelming.

The prayer over, they all rose; the minister repeated a general benediction, then retired. A parting hymn was sung, and the assembly dispersed, the parents and friends leaving by one door to await outside the exit of the newly-confirmed as they issued by another. Each was received with open arms; there were kisses, hand-shakings, and congratulations on every side, and in almost every case but those of the very poor a carriage drove up—hired for this grand occasion if the family possess no vehicle of their own—and the hero or heroine of the day was borne home in triumph.

GEORGICS—ROMAN & ENGLISH.—II.

Poetry, contrary to Addison's view, is not a purely human artifice. The poet half creates and half perceives. His perception is of the rhythm of life, and if he can provide for this an adequate notation, his art is true. This is Virgil's achievement with respect to husbandry in the Georgics. Standing at the barn door, crossing the marsh pastures, watching the long level line of waterfowl on the wing, mixing with the rustics at their dance, he has caught a melody of the fellowship of man with nature. He listened with delight, and he wrote with reverence, for he was conscious that one divine harmonious spirit animated the world, and rural life was not merely the scene of rude toils, and simple joys, but behind all these was a mystery which invested them with a peculiar sublimity. Therefore, it is that "he delivers the meanest of his precepts with a kind of grandeur." The background of it all is grand, and his mind is of a piece with it. If he "breaks the clods with an air of gracefulness," it is simply because the actions of the man, born and trained to the use of fork and hoe, are graceful. Nothing can be more awkward than the unaccustomed townsman's use of such implements. He is foreign to the situation and shows it. His limbs become mixed up as ridiculously with wagon chain and drag-rake, as would the fingers of the peasant with scalpel or loom. The propriety of either becomes possible only in their habitual environment. Then, from the angles of their knuckles to the casuistry of their souls, they bend to the pressure of circumstance. The townsman drops into his place behind the counter, and at the bar, as neatly as the statues stand in the abbey niches, while the countryman's gait, free from constraint in his own village, inclines to the living sculpture of the trees—his body a trunk, his arms branches, firmly flexible—quaint, undisciplined, but infallibly beautiful. No art could augment the nobility of Millet's "Sower," striding down the furrows of hope, and Virgil's eye had watched with delight a similar mobile form casting the seed and binding the sheaves.

The precision of his observation is seen throughout the poem. In the fine description of the coming tempest he notes how

"A murmurous crowd of voices fills the woods," how "the gulls fly inland," the army of rooks with jangle and jar, quit their feeding ground, and the wild ducks toss the water over them in wanton joy. While, on the other hand, in the white mist, "brooding along the plain," and the owl which

> On the gable keeps her sunset watch
> And plagues the night with ineffectual hoot, he sees the promise of calm weather.

He concludes a sunny description of spring, with the thought that it was with a drift of sweet, spring days, that time began, and creatures woke to breathe upon the earth.

Virgil lived many centuries before blind Huber saw the secrets of the hive, and the queen was a king in Shakespeare's time. He mistakes the love-flight for a battle, and imagines that bees are not generated in the hive at all, but that their larva is gathered from the recesses of the flowers. Yet, he acutely detects the different kinds of cement used by the bees, is struck by their "reverence for the throne" and the loyalty which, in its defence, calls "death sweet that comes with countless wounds." How Virgil would have rejoiced in Maeterlinck! He exhibits a tender sympathy with the flocks in their joys and sorrows, and pleads in a spirit that would do justice to our own humanitarian age, for the faithful horse whose strength has failed under the burden of years.

> Keep the old horse at home,
> Nor in his dotage let him play the fool.

But it was above all, by reason of the influence of nature and husbandry upon the mind and character of man, that Virgil wrote his poem. He wrote, indeed, straight from the heart, out of a pure love of the earth—a love such as Chaucer and William Morris had [what an edition of the Georgics the Kelmscott Press might have given us! It was an unfailing source of joy to him to live among simple folk and animals, and watch and share the labours of the seasons. Their work was unwasteful; among them, leisure might be cherished, unhaunted by care. Everything there, whether placed by God, or pursued by man, was interesting. But Virgil did more; he wrote with faith in the country for the sake of the empire. His mind was uneasy before the stupendous militarism of the day, before the barbaric show of wealth, and the passionate flight to luxury. He was a patriot, and as such, it pained him to observe the defection of Rome from the fountain-head of Roman virtue. The whole of his own work had been done with the glory of his country in view No Roman ever added more to its treasures; but, before the close of his life, he saw, with prophetic clearness, which of the fruits of his labours were essential and which unessential to the welfare of the State. He saw that the pomp of imperialism, and the arts of war—although he had sung them both with splendid vigour—needed no stimulus from his pen. They were already over-stimulated He saw that the hope of the Empire lay in the very direction on which most men were turning their backs—on simplicity, and moderation, health and industry, peace, and virtuous home life. Had his will been carried out, we should never have seen the Æneid—he wished it to be burnt; —but the Georgics he cherished as his very child, and was proud of the fame they won—proud for his country's sake. He longed to rouse again the old love of the land and husbandry, which, while it mothered noble harvests, mothered also noble men. With the decay of its culture the nation itself would decay. In his "Song of fields and flocks and trees," he appeals to Ceasar to bring peace to

> A world that teems with war, a world that reeks
> With countless crime, where evermore the plough

* The Georgics of Virgil. Translated into English Verse by Lord Burghclere-Murray. 10s. 6d.

Lacks its due honour, and the hind is forced Far from his desolate fields, and reaping-hooks
Are straightened into swords.

But brighter, in the poet's eyes, than the glory of the sword was the ploughshare, "gleaming with a new splendour" as the oxen dragged it through the stubborn loam. The thrifty yeoman is at once the guardian of his country, and his hearth. It is in "the spacious freedom of the open fields" that he looks to the rearing of a race of sturdy youth

Patient to labour, bred to scanty fare,
And reverend age, and worship of the Gods.

Herein, he held, lay not only the primitive but also the permanent basis of the greatness of Rome. Disaster waits on the threshold of the country that dreams that it has outgrown the need of simplicity, of sound family life, of dependence upon its own soil, and of godliness. Virgil gives us some charming pictures of rustic life and character, such as Goldsmith or Wordsworth might have sketched in English cottages and cottage gardens: There was the old man he once had met, the owner of few sterile acres, proudly cultivating here a bed of herbs and vegetables, and there a bed of flowers. Thus

As he planted here and there a patch
Amidst the thorns, with herbs and garden-stuff,
And with pale lilies ringed them round about,
Vervain and meagre poppies, in his heart
Held himself rival of your wealthiest king:
And hied him homeward at the fall of night
To heap his table with a dainty feast
Not bought with coin.

A reminiscence, in the light of which the poet has to check himself, lest he should linger too long in the cotter's garden singing of flowers, which is beyond his allotted task, and which he must leave "For other bards, when he is gone, to tell."

Or here a winter scene:—

And one I knew would work in winter-tide
The livelong night beside the flickering fire,
To fashion torches with his keen-edged blade,
The while his good wife sung the time away
Over her task, and drove athwart the web
Her glancing shuttle, or with vine leaf skimmed
The luscious must that simmered in the pot,
And cooked above the flame.

The picture is typical at once of the restfulness, and of the work unmeasured by hours, that goes on under the hand of the countryman. For though he would be the very child of fortune if he only knew his privileges, it is not on license that his happiness depends: "Toil—relentless toil—is lord of all."

But as Mr. Walter Pater has said:—"Farm life in Italy (may we not add in England too?) has a peculiar grace of its own, and might well contribute to the production of an ideal dignity of character like that of nature itself in this gifted region."

The Georgics, in fact, are a great religious poem, which calls the mind back to the elemental forces and conditions of life, which have from the earliest times been the surest support of faith in God and duty. Husbandry, as nothing else does, compels man to realise his direct dependence on the kindly providence of the seasons, and the austere laws of the elements. Whoever else parts company with his theology, the countryman never does. He is never a sceptic, never a cynic, and rarely, in any morbid sense, a pessimist. If things go utterly wrong, and hard seasons and his own feebleness bring him to the ground, he surrenders to his trouble as a fatalist—that is all. He never doubts the omnipotence, or questions the goodness of God. The testimony overawes him. He reads the great earth-poem daily, whose maker is not human but divine. We are His poem not He ours. The Husbandman of the world laid down the course of the plough. Virgil has but followed the furrow. It was no angel of Milton's imagination, but the Spirit of Eternal Wisdom and Love that pursued the first erring tillers of the earth, as he still pursues their children to chasten and to reward. The Georgics of our earthly associations are the appointment of the All-Father. The Roman poet has but transcribed a few stanzas as they were played beneath his eyes.

For God, they say, is everywhere alike,
Or in the utmost corners of the earth,
Or in the waste of ocean, or above
In the illimitable depths of heaven.
And from His Spirit creatures of this world,
Mankind, and flocks, and herds, and beasts of the field,
Draw at their birth the subtle breath of life,
So likewise in the end to Him return.

To an age of towns-people such as our own, slackening in awe, boastful of material magnitude, and gaping for pleasure, the breath of this lofty poem on a subject that never changes, and never grows old, should come as a wind of health. It is a happy circumstance that the present admirable translation is from the study of one who was formerly Minister of Agriculture under Mr. Gladstone.—H. M. L.

WATTS, THE PAINTER OF ETERNAL TRUTHS.

IV.

LEGENDS AND THE LORE OF LIFE

IN Watts, originality and modesty kept company. While dissatisfied with his own achievements, he followed steadfastly the course of his own genius. He admired others, but did not imitate. In youth he entered the schools of the Royal Academy, but, finding they did not give him what he required, he left them and followed no other course of systematic training. He settled down to self-preparation, studying especially the Elgin Marbles, which helped to produce the dignity of design which characterises his work. Although his sculptures are comparatively few, his love of sculpture is indicated in the designs of his pictures.

The money gained (£300) as a prize in the first competition for the decoration of the Houses of Parliament; for a design which was, however, never used, enabled him to go to Italy, and, through the patronage of Lord Holland, he was able to continue in Florence for four years. There he studied the great Italian paintings, but did not copy them. He sought out the deep human and religious meaning of the legends and stories of old days which have been told and retold, painted, sung, and chiselled through the ages. His broad survey, accepting all as manifestations of the same Eternal Life, each within the possibilities of the human family of its age and place, chose subjects from Greek myths and Hebrew legends, Norse sagas and mediæval romance, and drew out from them spiritual significance.

He pictures the "Creation of Eve" blossoming forth among the flowers and birds, the sweetest and most gracious creation of them all; then her "Temptation," her charms become less ethereal, more material, less poetic, with her fall; then "Eve Penitent" has become thoroughly human, both seductive and aspiring, remorseful through vision of wha t ought to be contrasted with what is.

In no less tender and religious spirit he paints "Orpheus and Eurydice," choosing the moment when Orpheus, having rescued Eurydice from the dark underworld, is leading her to the world of light and real existence, and is induced to look at her. As he gazes she fades away from his embrace. "Our loves and our joys fall away from us when we endeavour to make them too exclusively our own."

In the mediæval story of "Paolo and Francesca," one of the most touching and universal in Dante's "Divine Comedy," he finds a kindred subject. Borne along together in the terrible hurricane in the Inferno are those two souls knit together, clasping each other hand in hand sharing pain and weariness. What was their sin, essentially? They loved—that was no sin; through love they belonged to each other. But they seized upon the joys, and tried to embrace the completeness of love, regardless of others, impatient, selfish—and failed. Yet even in hell they are together, and whatever Dante meant, Watts's picture says to me that they will be purged of their guilt, and the joy in each other shall return when it can embrace the well-being of all and injure none, when love seeketh not her own to others' hurt.

"The Rider of the Red Horse" is a terrible representation of war—the rider has the ugliness of death in his face. Only here and in "Mammon" have I noticed the horrible suggestions of death; elsewhere the maternal, revealing, loving mission of death is felt. "The Rider of the White Horse" is another kind of conqueror; he is used as the symbol of Progress, whose steadfast forward gaze is set on objects far beyond the ken of those who turn aside to search for wisdom by the aid of an expiring candle, to grub for gold, or to sleep.

Watts's sympathy with animals is shown in his pictures. The horse's head in the last-mentioned work is of perfect beauty and expressiveness. In "A Patient Life of Unrequited Toil," an old white horse standing in a paddock near a hedge—there is such feeling and honour shown for its burden-bearing, unselfish toil, as he felt and showed for the hard-working, labouring poor. To Watts, vivisection and all forms of cruelty to animals or men were abhorrent.

What is this life, and what is its glory? There is a representation of a dead man covered with his winding sheet, a man who, as emblems show, was of account in his day and generation—but all that is past. "Sic transit gloria mundi." And Watts has inscribed over him the old German proverb:

"What I spent, I had;
What I saved, I lost;
What I gave, I have."

When death comes, the truth is made clearer which is always true, that what has been given with good will and good heart constitutes a man's real possession, his treasure in heaven. In spending well time, talents, money, strength is life's right use; then, amid the darkness, Hope will yet have her one string of the broken harp to listen to, and can wait patiently for a better day, and "the people that walk in darkness" will see a "great light," as Watts shows in one of his designs; and death, not opposed to life, is illumined. It is the darkness of death that makes death terrible. Watts represents an expectant group straining their eyes to catch the first opening of the gates of the East. That same death, whom Love had thought his foe,

"Comes with the gift of immortality."

PRIESTLEY PRIME.

THE EPISTLE TO PHILEMON.

A LECTURE BY S. O. LOVELL,
HOBART, TASMANIA.

I.

THE Letters of the Apostle Paul form a considerable and important part of the New Testament writings, and from the days of the Reformation they have probably had a greater influence upon Christian theology and religious feeling than the rest of the Bible put together. In all, some fourteen letters have been attributed to the Apostle. This number includes, however, the anonymous "Epistle to the Hebrews," but about the Pauline authorship of that document doubts have always existed, even within the Church itself,—one of the ancient Fathers summing up the case by saying that "God alone knows who wrote it." At the present day it is generally excluded from the list of Paul's authentic writings, even by the most strenuous defenders of orthodox tradition. Of the remaining thirteen letters—"Romans," "Galatians," 1st and 2nd "Corinthians," "Ephesians," "Philippians," "Colossians," 1st and 2nd "Thessalonians," 1st and 2nd "Timothy," "Titus," and "Philemon"—all bear the name of Paul, and therefore at least purport to have been written by the great Apostle.

In these days of searching literary and historical inquiry, however, it is by no means considered sufficient to stamp a document as genuine that it should bear the name of its alleged author; some corroborative evidence is demanded before it can be accepted as veritably the work of the man in whose name it was published; at least there must be the negative proof that the document does not contradict the known opinions of its assumed author, indicate a different age from that in which he lived, or disclose circumstances at variance with his environment. It is well known that in bygone ages, within the Church as well as without, it was the custom of unknown writers to attach the names of distinguished teachers to their own works. The practice was very much the same thing as that of ancient historians who put into the mouths of the personages appearing in their narratives such speeches as they thought appropriate and characteristic; nor was it considered any more reprehensible than among ourselves is the practice of writing in newspapers and periodicals under a nom de plume instead of using one's real name.

In the Old Testament nearly the whole book of Deuteronomy purports to have been either spoken or written by Moses, and for ages its Mosaic authorship was accepted without hesitation or question; and yet in these days learned men even in the orthodox churches have come to reject the traditional view of its origin, and to assign it to a date somewhere between the reign of Hezekiah and that of Josiah. Similarly, the book of Ecclesiastes very plainly purports to be the work of King Solomon, but modern investigation has proved conclusively that this book was produced, under the influence of Greek thought, in an age long subsequent to that of the great Israelite king, and that it could no more have been written by Solomon than "In Memoriam" could have been written by William the Conqueror. These instances are mentioned simply as specimens of the way in which modern criticism has set aside the beliefs and verdicts of antiquity as to the authorship of various Old Testament writings. In regard to the thirteen letters which I have enumerated as bearing the name of Paul, there is far from being a consensus of opinion among the critics; but, with some unimportant exceptions, they at least agree in accepting the first four—"Romans," "Galatians," 1st and 2nd "Corinthians"—as undoubtedly genuine writings of the great Apostle. As to the remainder, there is much division of opinion. Some accept more, some fewer, and some follow the lead of the late eminent scholar, F. C. Baur, in rejecting them all.

On the present occasion I wish to speak to you about the letter to Philemon, which is one of those bearing the Apostle's name; but any remarks I have to make in regard to its claim to rank as a genuine writing of St. Paul will most fittingly come after we have glanced at the general character and contents of the letter.

Very few people, I fancy, even among those who profess to be readers of the Bible, have any idea of what this letter is about, or have ever heard that it contains the outlines of a very interesting and, indeed, somewhat romantic story. And yet there is such a story involved in the letter, and here is a rough sketch of it.

Philemon lived at Colossæ, a city of Phrygia in Asia Minor, situated about one hundred miles east of Ephesus in the beautiful valley of the River Lycus. Probably he was a man of substance, and had been converted to Christianity by Paul. Philemon owned a slave named Onesimus, who, fearing punishment for some wrong he had done—probably he had committed a theft—ran away from his master. In his flight Onesimus may have been exposed to some danger, or perhaps he may merely have been sick at heart or weary of the base life he had been leading, or he may have been quickened by some hope of reformation; at all events some circumstance led him to have recourse to Paul, who was then a prisoner, and of whom the runaway had probably heard, if he had not actually seen him at his master's house. It is probable that Paul was in Rome rather than in Cæsarea at the time. A runaway slave would be more likely to make his way by sea to the Imperial City than by land to Cæsarea. In Rome he would easily find a place of concealment and means of supporting himself; and only in Rome, where (as we know from the book of Acts xxviii. 30) Paul resided in a hired house of his own, could he visit the Apostle without great risk. Paul took him into his house, converted him, became deeply attached to him, and very reluctantly sent him back to his master with this letter, in which he proposes to Philemon that he should forgive the offender, and receive him as a brother.

You can see, therefore, that a thread of romance runs through the simple story which is wrapped up in this brief letter, and it would be not at all difficult for anyone gifted with the requisite imagination and literary skill to supply the framework of history and the background of local scenery, fill in the details, and thus produce a very pretty story. In fact, this has been done by two well-known writers—by Dean Farrar in one of his clever historical novels, "Darkness and Dawn; or, Scenes in the Time of Nero," and also by Dr. E. A. Abbott in his "Onesimus: Memoirs of a Disciple of St. Paul." The late Dean pictures Onesimus as originally a low, ignorant scoundrel; then as partly reformed by the great Apostle, but subject to frequent lapses into the lowest depths of moral degradation; at length as redeemed from all his evil ways through the influence of a good woman; and finally as attaining a bishopric, which last feature of the story is in accordance with an ancient but not very trustworthy tradition.

Now, Dr. Abbott's story is on totally different lines. He conceives Onesimus as a slave of a higher order in education and refinement of nature, and beautifully pictures him as familiar with the philosophy and also with the religious unrest and searching of the time. But however these things may be, our present object is not to bring fiction to our aid in calling up a picture of the times and events in question, but to examine the letter as it stands. Let us now look at its contents in detail.

The document purports to have been written by "Paul, a prisoner of Jesus Christ," who associates with himself "Timothy, the brother." It is addressed to "Philemon, our beloved and fellow-worker," to "Apphia, our sister"—probably Philemon's wife—to "Archippus, our fellow-soldier, and to the church that is in thy house." After the usual Christian greeting the writer goes on to thank God for what he had heard of Philemon's faith and love towards the Lord Jesus and all the saints, and expresses his joy that he had behaved so generously to Christians—from which it may be inferred that Philemon had become noted for his benevolence and helpfulness. The proper subject of the letter begins at the eighth verse and is continued till the twenty-first. As an Apostle he might have enjoined Philemon to do what Christian principle required in respect to Onesimus; but he rather chooses, as the aged prisoner of Christ, to beseech him to receive Onesimus, vouching that, though he had behaved improperly, he was now a different person: "Onesimus," he says, "who was afore-time unprofitable to thee, but is now profitable to thee and me.'' There is an interesting play upon the slave's name here, which is concealed from the reader of the English translation. The name Onesimus, which was a very common one for slaves, is a Greek word meaning "profitable" or "helpful"—much in the same way as if we were to call a servant "handyman"—and the Apostle is not so heart-stricken in his captivity but that he can pass off his little joke about the slave's name. One is reminded of a similar touch of humour made by the great preacher, George Whitefield, on a certain occasion. Whitefield was one day preaching in the open air, when he espied among his audience a well-known actor who had gained great applause by taking the part of "Rambler" in a popular play of the time. Suddenly addressing the actor, Whitefield exclaimed, "And thou too, poor Rambler, who hast so often rambled away from Him, now end thy ramblings, and come to Jesus!" So here, too, it is as if the Apostle said to Philemon, "I am sending back 'profitable'"; and we can fancy a smile lighting up the worn prisoner's face as he thinks of the name and he hastens to add, "Yes indeed, he was not always true to his name in your experience; but now, I assure you, he is a true profitable to me, and he will be so to you.'' The writer then goes on to say that he would have liked to retain Onesimus to minister unto himself, but he would do nothing without Philemon's consent. Providence had made the slave's departure the means of his reformation, that his master might receive him for ever—no longer as a slave, but as a brother, a brother beloved. He therefore entreats Philemon to take him back, promising to pay or requite the master for any wrong the slave has done, should the former require it. "Put that to my account," he says; "I, Paul, write it with mine own hand, I will repay it.'' You know that the Apostle sometimes employed an amanuensis to write his letters as he dictated them, and if he did so on this occasion, he must at this point have taken up the pen to assure Philemon in his own handwriting of his willingness to make restitution for Onesimus. (Possibly there is, as some commentators think, another touch of humour in this promise to pay—a promise made by a poverty-stricken prisoner of Christ.) He is confident, however, that the master will far exceed his request. "Having confidence in thy obedience, I write unto thee, knowing that thou wilt do even beyond what I say.'' The last four verses are the conclusion in which the writer desires Philemon to provide him a lodging, sends salutations from several fellow-labourers, and wishes Philemon the rich communication and continual presence of the favour of Jesus Christ.

Thus, you see, this letter to Philemon is simply one of private friendship and domestic interest. It does not deal with, or even hint at, any of the great questions of Christian doctrine and Church administration which occupy so large a place in the Apostle's other writings. But it has always been recognised as a very charming letter, and, though it is of little importance as a public document relating to Christian truth and history, yet it is of very great value, because it displays the Apostle's character in an altogether attractive and winsome light. As Luther says, "This epistle showeth a right noble, lovely example of Christian love.'' Many people, we know, can write very beautifully about kindness, friendship, courtesy, amiability, and all the qualities that serve to adorn life, and to ennoble the relationships of society; and yet they fail to exemplify such virtues in their own conduct. Paul, too, could write with poetic fervour and glowing eloquence about these things, as he did in his noble hymn to Charity in the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians; but this letter shows his whole soul vibrating to the music of love and kindness. The letter furnishes also a very practical commentary on a passage in the Epistle to the Colossians: "Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt, that ye may know how ye ought to answer each one.'' Such gracious and seasoned speech we truly have in the letter before us. "The qualities which dictated its composition are eminently attractive. It displays dignity, generosity, prudence, friendship, affection, politeness, skilful address, purity of mind. Hence it has been called with great propriety 'The Polite Epistle.' True delicacy, fine address, consummate courtesy, nice strokes of rhetoric make it a unique specimen of letter-writing. If shows the perfect Christian gentleman. Nothing in the epistolary style that has come down to us from antiquity can in the least compare with it except, perhaps, a letter of the younger Pliny to Sabinian.'' (Dr. Davidson, Introduction, N.T.)

SHORT NOTICES.

The Sayings of Muhammad. Edited by Abdullah Al-Mámún Al-Suhrawardy, M.A., of the Pan-Islamic Society, is a little book of selections from the Table-Talk of the Prophet. A brief introduction gives a sketch of Muhammad's life and some notes on Islam, which is said to mean "Absolute submission to God's will, self-surrender, self-abnegation, Nirvana, Verneinung des Willens, Excelsior, Striving after the Ideal," from which it appears that it is a comprehensive term denoting noble things. There are 451 sayings in this selection, some occupying more than half a page, others not more than a line, as these:—"Be ye endued with divine qualities," "Be persistent in good actions," "Humility and courtesy are acts of piety," "True modesty is the source of all virtues.'' More distinctively characteristic are the following:—"Fear God, in these dumb animals, and ride them when they are fit to be rode, and get off them when they are tired" (but why "rode"?), "Shall I tell you the very worst amongst you? Those who eat alone, and whip the slaves, and give to nobody," "It is of my ways that a man shall come out with his guest to the door of his house," "You will not enter Paradise until you have faith; and you will not complete your faith till you love one another.'' The little book (which is printed by E. J. Brill, of Leiden) is dedicated by the editor to his mother, with the quotation from Muhammad: "Heaven lieth at the feet of mothers.'' (Constable, 2s. 6d.)

The Evolution of Knowledge, a review of Philosophy, by Raymon St. James Perrin, is a revision of an earlier work on "The Unification of Knowledge" published in New York and London in 1885. Many studious years, the author says, have since been devoted to the work, which endeavours to show "that motion is the ultimate reality.'' Yet the author holds that religion, or consecrated devotion, is the mainspring of social progress; and society organises for righteousness because righteousness is a necessity. "If by disclosing the interdependence of ultimate terms knowledge can be unified, justice will appear in its true light, as the order of nature, commanding obedience because it is universal, and inspiring emulation because it is beautiful.'' (Williams & Norgate. 6s.)

Man Considered in Relation to God and a Church, by W. Carew Hazlitt, of the Inner Temple, is an elaborate essay by one who has "no bias toward infidelity," who is neither Romanist nor Protestant, "neither a Mohammedan nor a Buddhist, but a thinker from my youth.'' A First Cause, he holds, we must concede, but not define it, and of all that the Church has taught he makes a clean sweep, demanding, of course, that education must be entirely secularised. (Reeves & Turner. 6s.)

On the other side, in defence of the received faith, may be set the two following books:—

Divine Dual Government: A Key to the Bible, to Evolution, and to Life's Enigmas. By William Woods Smyth, Fellow of the Medical Society, London, author of "The Bible and the Doctrine of Evolution," &c. (first published in 1899). A new edition, revised and illustrated, with new matter. (Horace Marshall & Son. 6s.)

The Truth of Christianity, being an examination of the more important arguments for and against believing in that religion. Compiled from various sources by Lieut.-Colonel W. H. Turton, D.S.O., Royal Engineers. Fifth Edition, seventh thousand. First published, 1895. (Wells Gardner & Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

Whoever reads The Peace of the Anglo-Saxons ("to the working men and their representatives"), by Major Stewart L. Murray (with a preface by Field-Marshal Earl Roberts), alarmist and militant, even to the demanding of another £30,000,000 a year from the foreigner by means of fiscal reform (Watts & Co. 2s. 6d. net), let him read also The Burden of Armaments, a Plea for Retrenchment, by the Cobden Club (T. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d.).

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Chorley.—On Sunday last the anniversary sermons were preached here by the minister, the Rev. W. T. Bushrod. In the afternoon the building was crowded to its utmost capacity, while the evening congregation was scarcely less than that of the afternoon. About eighty friends sat down to the tea, provided in the school-room. The chapel was tastefully decorated for the occasion by the younger members of the congregation. The collection for the day realised £9 19s. 11½d., a useful advance upon previous years.

Moneyrea.—The annual meeting of this congregation was presided over by Mr. James Lamont. The various reports and financial statements proved very gratifying, and the congregation closed its year free of debt. The church has been extensively renovated, and the work, including Temperance propaganda, has been zealously pursued. The reports record high appreciation of the services conducted on August 6 by Rev. G. Von Petzold, M.A., of Leicester, when collections were taken amounting to £212 1s. 11d.; and also a substantial contribution to the new college at Manchester.

Middlesbrough.—The church at Middlesbrough has been in the hands of the workmen for several weeks. The ventilation and lighting arrangements had been so bad that, after long consideration, it was decided to have a new system of ventilation, and to have the electric light put in. During the service, on Sunday evening last, the Rev. W. H. Lambelle (pastor) announced to the congregation that the installation was now finished, and having in a few appropriate remarks dedicated the improvements, asked Mrs. T. F. Ward to switch on the lights for the first time.

Preston.—In the presence of a large assembly Mrs. H. C. Walton, of Preston, on Saturday afternoon last, laid the foundation-stone of the new block of buildings, including vestry, congregational parlour, class room, lavatories, and large assembly hall. The buildings, which are to cost £700, exclusive of land, and towards which £440 are in hand, will be opened, it is expected, in December next. After a hymn and prayer by the Rev. W. T. Bushrod, of Chorley, the Rev. Chas. Travers made a statement of the objects in view, and called on Mrs. Walton, who was presented with a mallet by the contractor. After a hymn and prayer by the Rev. W. Machin (Congregationalist) tea, provided by Mrs. Walton, was partaken of, and a very satisfactory meeting brought to a close by a vote of thanks to Mrs. Walton, moved by Mr. Councillor Rawsthorn, seconded by Mr. Councillor Parkinson.

Pontypridd.—A few weeks ago the Church Committee agreed to a proposal submitted by their minister, the Rev. Simon Jones, B.A., to hold a series of Sunday evening open-air services on the Common, at the close of the ordinary service in the church, and the first is to take place next Sunday, the subject being "The Religion of Jesus." Mr. Jones has already had a very pleasant introduction to an out-door congregation, for on Sunday last, at the invitation of the local branch of the Social Democratic Federation, he delivered an address on "The Democratic Teaching of the Old Testament" to an audience of about 300, who listened most attentively to a truly eloquent appeal for a deeper study of and a more earnest search for the high ethical teaching contained in the Jewish Scriptures.

Ringwood.—On Sunday last special services were conducted by the Rev. Andrew Chalmers, of Wakefield, at St. Thomas's Chapel. At the morning service, which was to celebrate the reopening of the building after repairs, the preacher traced the history of the society from its foundation in 1727. The evening saw a large gathering to hold a memorial service to the late Mr. Cogan Conway, and was marked by a litany of commemoration for the dead. At the close of his address, Mr. Chalmers unveiled a monument—rare and finely-worked marbles, inlaid with a border of mother-of-pearl—which bore the following inscription: "In affectionate memory of John Cogan Conway, born in London 24th October, 1846; died at Ringwood 4th February, 1905; for fifteen years the beloved friend and faithful leader of this congregation. 'Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.'"

C. & B.'s "Art Metal" 1/- Box of Butter-Scotch may now be obtained. Address of nearest agent on receipt of post-card. Manufactory, London, W.C.

"Never writer wrote with deeper conviction than George Gissing; every sentence has come straight from the heart, and this fact alone, apart from its artistic merit, gives a poignancy and strength to his work which separates it at once from the common ruck of novel-writing. These books are terrible arraignments of life—their peculiar characteristic is this poignancy, this painting of life at its moments of unbearable crisis. Between misery and despair lies a whole world of difference; misery is what can be endured—despair is the unbearable, and George Gissing is the spokesman of Despair." —Jane H. Findlater, in the National Review.

"Fate set him for his life-task the study of the swarming miseries of our human ant-heaps and the pettinesses of our mortal nature. 'The Nether World,' 'New Grub Street,' 'Demos,' 'The Odd Women,' 'The Whirlpool,'—these are all monumental titles, mighty themes. None of his contemporaries in England—only Zola and Tolstoi anywhere else—even attempted to wrestle with such big canvases, and if Gissing did not always rise to the height of his great argument, the conception was at least Herculean."—I. NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE are glad to learn from Mr. V. Tchertkoff that Leo Tolstoy is still enjoying good health, still full of energy, still deeply interested in social developments, which go on apace around him. It is good news also that the Free Age Press is still actively producing its master's writings. One of the greater works is a story describing the tragical life and inner experiences of a revolutionist. Another is a critical essay on Shakespeare explaining the conditions responsible for the misdirected worship of his writings. A third is a paper on the present condition of the Russian peasant population, advocating the nationalisation of the land as the most urgently necessary step at the present national crisis. The fourth is an article on the true significance of State organisation, pointing out that it is only through a general religious upheaval that the working people of all countries will be able to free themselves from the State slavery under which they are now crushed.

"THE Gates of Pearl," is the title of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit. Not in any outward form here or hereafter is the ideal city to be found, so the preacher affirms :—

"It is in the midst of us this city of "God, or else it is the most fantastic of "fairy tales, the most incongruous of "dreams; and if so, then is it the shame "of humanity that our noblest and best "have been fascinated by it, that the words "which tell of it have been the delight "and consolation of readers, who were not "all fools, who were men and women at "least as intelligent as ourselves. Yes, "it is real, the golden city, far extending, "high uplifted, illumined by the presence "of God. But it is not of earth, nor shall "you find place for it in the infinitude of "the starry heavens, nor has eye ever "beheld it, nor ear heard its melodies. "Only in thought shall you discover its "reality, and its immensity be revealed "when in the closed chamber of silent "meditation you seek 'the Father who is "in secret,' and manifests Himself to all "who seek after Him."

AT the second annual conference of Sanitary Inspectors, Sir James Crichton-Browne in his Presidential address said that phthisis is killing 40,000 persons annually in England and Wales and tuberculosis in all its forms 57,000, but he added the reassuring statement that mortality from these diseases had fallen enormously, and is still falling. He recognised that these splendid results are due to subsoil drainage and other great sanitary improvements which have been effected in the last half century, apart from any special precautions against the dissemination of the disease. He hopes for still better results with the increased knowledge of the nature of the disease. Here is fresh evidence that healthy living and healthy conditions are the main safeguards against disease.

SIR J. CRICHTON-BROWNE in a later part of his address deplored the bad housing and the overcrowding in the towns. "We have," said he, "on the one hand, men with half-a-dozen houses of palatial size, standing in broad demesnes, empty for the most part, or thinly populated by a retinue of pampered domestics, and on the other hand, half-a-dozen pinched families huddled into one mean hovel reeking with filthy effluvium. In all our large towns, and in our small towns, too, housing conditions and overcrowding exist that are an outrage on decency and a disgrace to our civilisation." He believes the country to be the fit and proper breeding place and rearing ground of intellect, and that the best elements of our people are swallowed up and exterminated or deteriorated in our big towns.

NEVERTHELESS, he considers that big cities are likely to remain and extend. In two directions he suggests there is hope for the mitigation of the evils of town life, "the rise of the suburb,"—"the island suburb—set in a sea of chlorophyll, easily accessible, well planned, honestly built," and yet more in the creation of new cities on new sites, "garden cities of the type so eloquently and convincingly advocated by Mr. Howard, in which the needs of industry and the needs of humanity will be reconciled." It would be a national calamity, he said, should any want of financial support prevent the project at Letchworth (Garden City) from being carried to a successful issue in its entirety.

THE Simple Life Press issue a pleasant little booklet by Dean Kitchin entitled, "A Letter to the Labour Party: Thoughts on the Future of Labour." The Dean looks forward to great changes, which may include the neglect of the old deep-rooted parties of Whig and Tory. He recognises the increasing importance in modern politics of the conditions of soual well being. A more strenuous era is approaching. "We have supped our compromise; we shall have nightmares of headlong change." The Dean's own attitude towards these changes is, on the whole, one of hopefulness. The pages are frank and generous; they contain much wise advice from which nobody is likely to dissent. But the influence likely to be exerted in the labour world is less than it might have been if the writer had possessed a clearer insight into the real aims and ideals of the labour party. The lack of this leaves the whole discussion a little in the air and obscures the force of many admirable passages.

A NEWSPAPER correspondent describing a recent Methodist Conference where every speaker was bound to send in his name to the President, who also had power to determine the order in which they should speak, remarks that this procedure tends to produce a well-ordered full dress debate; but tempts members to speak too long, in order to justify their boldness in sending in their names; and tends also to produce an almost purely ministerial discussion, as many a layman wishing to make a brief contribution to the discussion would not think it important enough to send up his name beforehand. Whether these remarks have any bearing upon some of our meetings need not here be discussed.

THE Land Nationalisation Society is preparing an extensive lecture list for the coming winter session. The society is prepared to supply lecturers, and secretaries are invited to apply to Mr. Joseph Hyder, 432, West Strand, with a view to ventilating the question of private property in land which the society holds to be at the root of the whole unemployed problem.

CENTENARY OF FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE.

Born August 29, 1805.

I.

The present summer brings us the centenary of the birth of Frederick Denison Maurice, one of the great churchmen of the last century, a thinker who stood for the most part alone during the early part of his life, but is now regarded as a representative man, Dr. Martineau connecting his name with the profound theological change which has substituted the Incarnation for the Atonement in evangelical theology.* The readers of the Inquirer have a special interest in reviewing his life because his father was a Unitarian minister, for many years settled at Frenchay, near Bristol, and it was supposed by himself and his friends that the son also would become one of our ministers. This, however, was not to be; and we shall learn something of value if we understand why the lad found it impossible to follow the course naturally open to him, and why he came to feel that in the Church of England he had found a religion far deeper and more spiritual than the faith he had learned from his father. Between him and his father there was true sympathy and warm affection, and the father needed it all. Few situations have been more pathetic than the position of the Rev. Michael Maurice. The whole family were united by strong bonds of mutual affection, but they were divided by the entrance of theological differences of a most painful kind. The father was a Unitarian of the old-fashioned Presbyterian type; he valued freedom of thought and independence of judgment more than any particular name or doctrine, and he was well to the front in matters of education and of practical charity. Then there were two daughters of an opposite type. They were dogmatic and aggressive, attaching great importance to the name Unitarian, zealous in their attempts to spread their belief. But they can never have known the inner power of their creed, for when brought under certain external influences they renounced their Unitarianism and became Calvinists of a very narrow kind, and soon let their father know that they considered it sin any longer to worship with him. A far heavier trial came when these girls persuaded their mother that Calvinism was true, and she too informed her husband that she could no longer worship with him. Moreover, while they could persuade her that Calvinism was true, they could not give her the personal assurance that she herself was one of the elect, and much of her subsequent life was darkened by the shadow of this fearful cloud, believing that salvation is only for the pre-destined few, and having no confidence in being herself one of the number. It is difficult to think with patience of the conduct of these girls, especially in the light of what soon followed. Both were bigoted Calvinists, one a bigoted Church-woman, the other a bigoted Dissenter. As a result of some disagreeable experiences with Church people and kindness received from Dissenters, the Church daughter gave up her Church principles precisely at the time when the Dissenting daughter under somewhat similar circumstances gave up her dissent and joined the Church. The whole story reminds us of the miserably narrow basis on which theological controversy was then conducted. The plan was to find texts supporting some position one wished to defend, to consider them final, and to say that opponents did not believe the Word of God.

Such was the religious turmoil in which F. D. Maurice passed his boyhood and his youth, and from which he escaped into a higher atmosphere when he worked out his own personal belief. At one time, he seems to have been in danger of sharing his mother's grievous fate, believing Calvinism to be true, and believing the troubles of this life only a prelude to a far more terrible fate in another world. It was a glorious escape from this when he learned that he could trust the love of God, and when he could endeavour to bring home this same trust to his mother's heart; and whatever were the subsequent developments of his theology, they always rested on the foundation principle—faith in the love of God.

When it was clear that he could not become a Unitarian minister, he determined to study for the Bar and went to Cambridge, where he could be admitted as an undergraduate, though he could not take a degree, without having to sign the Thirty-nine Articles. He won a fine position at the University, becoming the acknowledged leader of the most remarkable body of young men then there, but when he left he refused to declare himself a Churchman, though his own mind was made up, out of regard for his father's feelings. So he came to London and did some good literary work, becoming for a time editor of the Athenæum, and showing himself a keen opponent of the Utilitarianism which characterised the Liberalism of the time under the influence of Bentham and Mill, as well as of all old-fashioned Toryism. But the bent of his genius carried him forward, and he resolved to take Orders in the Church of England. For this he entered at Oxford now fully prepared to sign the Articles. His experience caused him to write a tract which aroused much interest entitled "Subscription no Bondage." Very frank was his admission in later life that it was all wrong, that Subscription as habitually understood was bondage, but at the time the tract won him the support of the High Church party, and its leaders wished to obtain for him an Oxford Professorship. All chance of this, however, he destroyed by another tract on Baptism in opposition to their views—a most characteristic action of the man always intent on working out his own theology independent of existing parties and accepted formulas.

Let us now try to understand why he ceased to be a Unitarian. What was defective in his early belief which caused him to feel that he was attaining deeper and higher truth when he abandoned it? In a letter written to his father in 1832 he explains what he regards as the test of religious truth. He says all the holy men he reads about in the Bible longed for communion with God; "all their sorrow arose from a loss of God's presence, all their joy from a possession of it, all their pleasure in expecting Heaven from anticipation of it. Now just as any system of divinity helps me to realise these feelings just so far I believe it true. If I can honestly say of any doctrines these teach me how I may converse with the holy and invisible God as a real living person, for as such the Bible holds Him forth to me in every line, how I may overcome the difficulties of this intercourse which arise from His being unseen . . . if they inspire me with a desire for this intercourse, a delight in it, and a conviction of its reality, just so far as I can after strict examination say this of any doctrines, just so far have I a test that they are the doctrines of the Bible, the true doctrines, the doctrines according to Godliness."

At the present day it seems scarcely credible to us that our faith so tried should be found wanting, but we have only to remember the persecution to which James Martineau was subjected in his earlier years at the hands of the older Unitarianism to realise how its doctrines failed to satisfy young Maurice or to stand his test of religious truth. That Unitarianism contained no sufficient doctrine of communion with God, of a real sense of His presence and living inspiration, and therefore Maurice left it. He might have found what his soul needed if he had studied Channing; and there is some interest in thinking how different his history might have been if he had done so. But though Channing was born 25 years before Maurice it took longer than that before he was widely known, and Maurice had not Martineau's insight into spiritual truth and philosophical grasp of religious realities to enable him to work out a new Unitarianism along similar lines of thought.

Maurice wrote another letter to his father about the same time more fully explaining his faith. He deals with the difficulty of seeing God. "God I am told is a Spirit and I am of the earth, earthy. I cannot and I would not if I could abandon my belief that He is a lofty spiritual Being; I cannot throw aside my own earthliness." All through the Old Testament he notes the existence of two opposite and contradictory feelings—the acknowledgment of God as incomprehensible and infinite and the desire to see, to comprehend, to understand that same God. This, he says, "is the great cry of human nature in all ages, and there is only one way in which it has or can be satisfied. If the infinite, incomprehensible Jehovah is manifested in the person of a man, a man conversing with us, living among us, entering into all our infirmities and temptations, and passing into all our conditions, it is satisfied, if not, it remains unsatisfied." Here, again, we may feel that Maurice had won possession of essential truth, and unless we know that we too have that, and something more, our own religious faith is inferior to that which he attained. The centre of his creed is the Incarnation, and alas for our faith unless we believe in the Incarnation in a larger and far more glorious sense than that in which it is taught in the Nicene Creed. The Incarnation is to us a truth of every child born into the world, born to be a son of God. Every human being is of the earth, earthy, but he is also something more, he is a spiritual being, and all spirits, as Channing has so grandly said, are of one family, and the child is essentially akin to the Father. In the mind of man we seek for knowledge of God, and learn that they who seek shall find. Our quarrel is with the theology which limits what is really universal. It may be that in past ages men could only understand the truth by so limiting it to the one case of Jesus Christ. But such days are gone for those who can now rise to the contemplation of the far more glorious reality. The pity is that there should remain so much difficulty in doing this; that the limitation should often still seem needed for the faith to be vital and intense; that, when all limitations are removed, the glorious truth in its full magnificence should leave our hearts untouched and cold. But the fault is not in the theology, but in those who profess it without really feeling its truth. If our religion fails to attain real living communion with God, and to know Him as He speaks to us, it will make no progress; it will not even hold its own. No general benevolence, no public spirited devotion to political objects, qualities which have often distinguished eminent Unitarians, can make up for lack of power to see Him who is invisible. An earnest, gifted child, such as F. D. Maurice, will leave the old home to find more of the truth. But this will not be the fault of the faith as expounded by our great prophets of the nineteenth century.

* See Tayler's "Retrospect." Introduction, pp. 8, sqq. 30.

The work before us consists of twenty-four essays, some of which were originally written as lectures, in three small volumes. Dr. C. Hilty, the writer of these essays, was, in the earlier part of his career, a barrister at Coire, but has been for about a quarter of a century Professor of Political and International Law in the University of Berne. He has published several short treatises, and is the editor of the Political Yearbook of Switzerland. As a member of the Nationalrat, one of the two chambers which form the Swiss Parliament, he takes an active part in the political life of his country. The essays, which are gathered together under the brief title of "Happiness," are mainly on ethical or religious, more rarely on theological subjects; and some of them might appropriately be called lay sermons. In order to give a clearer idea of their scope, it will be well to quote a few of the titles. In the first volume we have essays on "The Art of Working," "The Art of having Time," "Happiness," "Good Habits," "What is the meaning of Man, whence comes he, whither does he go, who dwells above the stars?" and also a paper on Epictetus, including a new translation of the "Encheiridion." The second volume gives us essays on "Guilt and Care," "Transcendental Hope," "What is Education?" "The Prolegomena of Christianity," "The Steps of Life." Among the topics brought before us in the last volume are "Modern Holiness," "Faith," "Duplex est Beatitudo," "Qui peut souffrir, peut oser," and the series ends with "Excelsior!"

* "Glück," von Prof. Dr. C. Hilty. Frauenfeld, J. Huber's Verlag. Leipzig, J. C. Hinrichs.

Dr. Hilty has evidently a wide knowledge of many branches of German, French, English, and Italian literature, and his pages are enriched by many an apt and striking quotation, sometimes from little-known sources. We may express, in passing, the hope that, in subsequent editions, the Italian and English quotations, in particular, will undergo a careful revision, as they contain a somewhat irritating number of printing faults. There are three such, for instance, in a passage of six lines from the "Purgatorio" on page 181 of the first part, and this in a copy which bears the words "thirty-third thousand" on the title-page. It is right to add that, apart from these trifling defects, the book is well got up and pleasant to read. The style, too, is clear and limpid, quite free from the haziness and obscurity which so often make the reading of works written in the German tongue a wearisome task. But the chief charm of Dr. Hilty's essays lies in the contact into which they bring the reader with the attractive personality, the ripe experience, the keen insight, and the sound practical wisdom of the author. We may dissent here and there from his opinions—his theological position, for instance, is more conservative than that of most readers of the Inquirer, and in his remarks on the story of the Resurrection he will fail to command the assent of many of his readers; but, even where we are unable to agree with him, he is often extremely suggestive and helpful, the more so as his sympathies are by no means confined to his own school of thought.

In the paper on "Happiness," which gives its title to the whole series, Dr. Hilty divides the various ways in which happiness is sought by mankind into two groups: "outward" methods, such as wealth, honour, health, culture, science, art, and the enjoyment of life; and "inward" methods, as the practice of virtue, work, philanthropy, religion, the satisfaction of a good conscience, a life devoted to noble efforts and high ideals. The methods classed as "outward" have all the great defect of not being accessible to everyone. They cannot therefore be the foundation of the happiness of mankind as a whole, nor can the enjoyment they afford to right-thinking and right-feeling individuals be unalloyed with something akin to remorse. For everyone who, in our times, while enjoying these good things of life, thinks of the millions of human beings who are daily perishing around him, must be either base and ignoble, or profoundly disquieted at heart. Moreover the possession and management of any really considerable property, or a position of great honour and power, contributes almost inevitably to a certain hardening of the character, which implies the very opposite of happiness. Examples of this may be observed with something of a shudder, says the Swiss professor, among the empty-minded (gemütsleer) multitude, which, in ever-increasing numbers, yearly flocks to the mountains of his country in order, for a brief moment, to fill the void from which they suffer. Æsthetic enjoyment is a somewhat nobler mode of seeking happiness, but does not lead to a much more satisfactory result. Did not even Goethe, the great model of those who adopt this method, declare that in his seventy-five years he had not had four weeks of real enjoyment?

Those who adopt an "inward" method show far deeper insight; and yet much of the pessimism of our time is based on the experience that happiness, even when thus sought, often eludes our grasp, or is only found in a far smaller degree than was expected. In virtue, happiness is not to be found; he who is always satisfied with himself must have either a very low standard of virtue or a very limited brain. A "good conscience" is proverbially a source of happiness; our author congratulates its possessor, but considers his existence more than doubtful. In his opinion no one has ever done his whole duty for a single day. "Should any of my readers say, yes, I am the man—let it be so, but I have no desire to make his intimate acquaintance. The more a man advances in the fulfilment of duty, the finer and more discriminating does the sense of duty become, and the circle of duties becomes ever wider, to such a degree that we can quite understand the Apostle Paul when he speaks of himself, certainly in all sincerity and without false humility, as the chief of sinners." The value of a good conscience, in our author's view, is purely negative; it is something not to have a bad conscience. As soon as it develops into a positive self-consciousness, it is harmful to its possessor, leading him to self-righteousness.

After touching, with many a suggestive and discriminating remark, on those who seek their happiness in love, charity, and philanthropy, in work, and even in pessimism, Dr. Hilty comes to those who try to find it in the acceptance of a creed, or in membership of a religious body; and who are in the end bitterly disappointed. These he declares to be the most unhappy of all, and they are very numerous, for all ecclesiastical communities are apt to promise more than they are able to fulfil. As for those who offer either forms of worship and formulæ of belief, or merely a science of religion, they are giving the people stones instead of bread. The Christian religion has been suffering from this error ever since the beginning, and it is time to get rid of it. Christianity must be simplified; it needs no more dogmas than are contained in the words of Christ.

After thus rejecting, in whole or in part, many of the ordinary methods by which happiness is pursued, the writer comes to the positive and more difficult portion of his task, and proceeds to lay down the conditions on which happiness may be found; for his solution of the problem, however, we must refer the reader to the essay itself.

A propos of the influence of religion on human happiness, it is worthy of notice that Dr. Hilty, though a thorough Protestant by education and conviction, recognises that Catholicism has here an advantage over Protestantism. After quoting Psalm cxix. v. 45, according to Luther's translation, "I will walk joyfully, for I seek thy precepts," he gives it as his opinion that in our time Catholicism seems to have in many ways more of this joyfulness than Protestantism. "It would be a great achievement," he says elsewhere, "to engraft on Protestantism somewhat more of the natural friendliness which is possessed by Catholicism.'' In another paper, too, he points out that wholly Catholic districts, such as Engelberg, Disentis, Lucerne, or Tyrol, have a soothing influence on strangers who are overworked and exhausted. For there we do not see the people continually driven to work as with the goad of the driver, but we find a life which even for the humblest of the people stands above the mere performance of work. This is the secret of some part of the attractive power possessed by the Catholic Church in our time. What the author of ''Glück'' has observed in the Alpine countries finds a parallel in other parts of Europe. In Geikie's Reminiscences, for example, a similar contrast is pointed out between the Catholic islands in the Hebrides, where some of the ancient Celtic gaiety has survived, and the rest of the islands, where the stern teachings of Calvanism have produced a gloomy austerity and dulness.

It would be unfair to conclude from passages like the above that Dr. Hilty fails to appreciate the moral value of strenuous work, or to recognise what is due to the workers. He is an educator himself, and at the close of his first paper, entitled ''The Art of Working,'' he defines the art of education as consisting, first, in awakening in the pupil the desire and aptitude for work, and, secondly, in inducing him to place his will in the service of some great cause. As for the workers: just as, a century ago, the idle nobility and clergy were compelled to give way to the activity of the middle classes, so now it is to be expected that wherever the middle classes have become mere idlers living on the labour of others, they will speedily have to disappear in their turn. ''At all times the future belongs, and the mastery is due, to Work.''

In a second notice, we propose to give extracts from the more characteristic passages of some of the essays that we have not yet been able to touch upon.

ROUSSEAU.

II.

Amongst the innumerable people, who, it has been alleged, were influenced, directly or indirectly, by Rousseau, we noticed, was William Cowper. That he had read him or something about him and his writings, there can be little doubt, but certain lines of his and a note thereto make one a little sceptical as to the nature of that influence. Rousseau grew ultimately so concerned on behalf of truth—as well he might—that he even inveighed against the time-honoured practice of bringing children up on fables and nursery rhymes. He set himself an easy task when he seriously and ponderously set out to show what a pack of mendacities are secreted in that form of literature, and even, as he says, in La Fontaine's fables. But ''Rousseau was absolutely without humour,'' says Mr. John Morley, explaining that ''that belongs to the keenly observant natures, and to those who love men in the concrete, not only humanity in the abstract.'' Rousseau had had ample opportunities of both loving and studying children in the concrete, but he had transferred them long before they had acquired a taste for fables to the Foundling Hospital, believing, in his paradoxical way, in putting off on to others what could have been better done by the parents themselves. In the most glowing eloquence he insisted upon the most obvious parental duties in theory, and left the practice for others. Whilst all normal parents were doing from love what he was preaching they ought to do from a sense of duty he was adding to his strange laurels the alleged discovery of the beauty of the family life, as well as the strange discovery that grass is green, and that it is a pleasant thing for the eyes to behold the sun. One is somewhat bewildered at the number of things that are credited to Rousseau as discoveries, when all normal human nature had known them from even prehistoric times. One almost blushes to think that our ''gentle'' Cowper was all the time sitting, not at the knees of Nature herself, but at the feet of Jean Jacques Rousseau. Sometimes at any rate he played truant from his master, and laughed at some of his teachings as so much arrant nonsense.

> ''I shall not ask Jean Jacques Rousseau
> If birds confabulate or no;
> 'Tis clear, that they were always able
> To hold discourse at least in fable;
> And e'en the child who knew no better
> Than to interpret, by the letter,
> A story of a cock and bull,
> Must have a most uncommon skull.''

And the note runs: ''It was one of the whimsical speculations of this philosopher that all fables which ascribe reason and speech to animals, should be withheld from children, as being only vehicles of deception. But what child was ever deceived by them, or can be, against the evidence of his senses.'' Mankind, have, as a rule, always allowed a large margin for the exercise of common sense in any department of thought where truth cannot be stated with mathematical precision. If in their wisdom, they made the general and fairly useful statement that barking dogs do not bite, they certainly did not place it in the same category as the statement that two straight lines cannot enclose a space. Now a mind of Rousseau's type pounces on one aspect of the untruth of the proverb and brings in plenty facts to support his position, and then will go further and boldly affirm that dogs delight to bark and bite, and he will then bring up more facts to support this statement. Or he will even turn the proverb round and maintain that biting dogs do not bark. And then with the confidence of a man with all the trump cards in his hand he exclaims, ''Ce sont encore là, direz-vous, des paradoxes. Soit, mais voyons si ce sont des vérités.''

He maintains that fables may be instructive to men, but you must ''tell the naked truth to children; they will not take the trouble to remove the veil with which you cover it.'' All children he says, are taught the fables of La Fontaine, but there is not a single one of them who can understand them. And even if they did understand them, it would be all the worse, for ''the moral'' is so mixed up and disproportioned to their age that it would lead them rather to vice than to virtue. He analyses some half dozen of these fables and, of course, has no difficulty in making out his case. He takes for example ''The Fox and the Crow.'' ''Master Crow, on a tree perched,'' Master! what does that word mean exactly? What does it mean before a proper name? What does it mean in this particular instance? What is a crow? What is ''on a tree perched!'' People don't say ''on a tree perched,'' they say ''perched on a tree.'' Consequently you will have to explain inversions of poetry, and say what is poetry and, what is prose.'' Then comes the cheese. ''What cheese? Swiss, Brie, or Dutch? If the child has not seen crows what do you gain by speaking about them? If he has, how will he conceive them holding a cheese in their beak? ''Faisons toujours des images d'après nature.'' Then comes the fox. ''He spoke somewhat after this fashion.'' ''He spoke! Foxes speak, do they? They speak the same language as the crows, do they? Ah! beware, good teacher; weigh carefully what you are going to reply. More depends upon it than you are aware.'' And so on and so on Rousseau's analysis meanders along in a way that at times is delicious to some of his children of a larger growth. ''Sans mentir! On ment donc quelque fois?'' ''Le phénix! Qu'est-ce qu'un phénix? Nous voici tout à coup jetés dans la menteuse antiquité, presque dans la mythologie.'' The Spartans and the stoic philosophers were alone tolerable to Rousseau, because they lived a simple life and a life according to Nature, or at least counselled people to do so. ''A ces mots, le corbeau ne se sent pas de joie.'' ''People must have experienced the keenest of passions before being enabled to understand this proverbial expression.'' Perhaps if La Fontaine had ventured to say that the crow danced for joy, the children might have understood it. ''Et pour montrer sa belle voix.'' ''N'oubliez pas,'' says Rousseau with a moral solemnity, at this point, which must have upset everybody's gravity but his own, ''N'oubliez pas que, pour entendre ce vers et toute la fable, l'enfant doit savoir ce que c'est que la belle voix du corbeau.'' No wonder Cowper had doubts about the child's skull.

Think of the nurseries, playgrounds, and homes when the imaginary menageries were swept away at Rousseau's decree, think of the disinherited prancing walking-sticks no longer charging to battle under doughty warriors, think of the slaughter of big game, the lions, bears, tigers, elephants, the phœnix and the unicorn, and ''other strange fowl'' and fabulous creatures, that parents, who could enact no other ''brute part,'' could enact to the life and scatter desolation o'er the land, and send their screaming offspring into forests primæval, or into the primitive forest discovered by Chateaubriand, which exists nowhere except in lively imaginations. And yet it is odd how fond Rousseau is of the noble savage, and of savage Nature, and how eloquently he lures us back to a state of nature, so that, as Voltaire said, ''he almost persuaded us to go on all fours.'' His paradoxes, at any rate, rarely run on all fours, and as often as not have not a leg to stand on. But far be it from us to allege that this represents Rousseau in his strength, it is rather taken from the obviously weaker parts of his system. One naturally assents to the judgment of Girardin that ''there are in all Rousseau's discussions two things to be carefully distinguished from one another; the maxims of the discourse and the conclusions of the controversy. The maxims are ordinarily paradoxical, the conclusions are full of good sense." And broadly speaking the good sense everywhere predominates. There was something that men heard in his teaching which seemed to them to ring true, and did ring true, and largely indeed accounts for the general fermentation throughout a very refined but also a very corrupt society, throughout a community in which "a deadly decay" had made itself only too palpably visible. Rousseau's "scheme," as Mr. Morley writes, "may be described as an attempt to rehabilitate human nature in as much of its primitive freshness as the hardened crust of civil institutions and social use might allow." Rousseau in his book on Education remarks somewhere that he remembers having seen a book on geography which began thus: "What is the World? It is a cardboard globe." From such points as these he sets out to show how utterly wooden, artificial and useless education had become. Children might know the exact spot on a cardboard globe, of Pekin, Ispahan or Mexico, but could not find their way from Paris to St. Denis, in the neighbourhood of Paris, nor find their way through the walks of an average garden or park. Freshness, naturalness, simplicity, avoidance of luxury, avoidance of artificiality, plainness and solidity of physical and mental fare, spontaneity in thought and life, these are undoubtedly some of the things that Rousseau preached and stood for and wrote of in a way that "produced a glow of enthusiastic feeling in France," which soon became capable of many things. In one or other of his writings there were the germs of the utmost good, as well as, unfortunately, of the utmost evil. He was a plebeian of the plebeians, and he was marred with a sullen, churlish, ungrateful, suspicious, and sentimental temperament. There were many such temperaments in France at that particular period, and no doubt for sufficient reason, and especially amongst the poorest. "He makes his poor very proud" it was said. He alienated his most forbearing and kindest friends by a natural boorishness and ungraciousness of spirit not unrelated to vulgarity.

His own personal example and attitude would in time to come be but too readily imitated by those who seemed to infer that there was a necessary connection between his glowing theories of naturalism in life and thought and the natural savagery of his own practice. The best features of the Revolution may find themselves mirrored in Rousseau's writings, the worst found some excuse and justification from his own practice.

He glorified the savage at the expense of civilisation. "He wrote up in letters of flame," says Mr. Morley, "at the brutal feasts of kings and the rich, that civilisation is as yet only a mockery, but filled a generation of men and women with the stern resolve that they would rather perish than live on in a world where such things can be." The whole body was no doubt sick, and Rousseau, one of its members, was sick with it. What Lowell says of Thoreau applies with infinitely more force to Rousseau, "he had not a healthy mind, or he would not have been so fond of prescribing." He had no doubt, hit upon the right prescription, but was applying it in the wrong way. Lowell's criticism of Thoreau is apposite here. "Solitary communion with Nature does not seem to have been sanitary or sweetening in its influence on his character." He affected solitude. "He confounded physical with spiritual remoteness from men. One is far enough withdrawn from his fellows if he keep himself clear of their weaknesses." "To seek to be natural implies a consciousness that forbids all naturalness for ever. It is as easy—and no easier—to be natural in a salon as in a swamp, if one do not aim at it, for what we call unnaturalness always has its spring in a man's thinking too much about himself." "It is impossible," said Turgot, "for a vulgar man to be simple." Lowell we cannot but think was remembering Rousseau a good deal more than Thoreau when writing his brilliant criticism. He drew forcible attention, too, to the circumstance that while Rousseau and his followers were denouncing civilisation and all its doings, their experiments actually pre-supposed all that complicated civilisation which it theoretically abjured. Robinson Crusoe was the only book that Rousseau's Emile was allowed to read at a certain stage. Nature and the untutored "savage's" spontaneity and resourcefulness are the admirable things there set forth for our emulation. With a slight difference Lowell's remarks about Thoreau's shanty on Walden Pond apply equally well to Rousseau's hermitage of La Chevrette, and to the desert island with a convenient ship, wrecked close at hand. "He squatted on another man's land; he borrows an axe, his boards, his nails, his bricks, his mortar, his books, his lamp, his fish-hooks, his plough, his hoe, all turn states evidence against him as an accomplice in the sin of that artificial civilisation which rendered it possible that such a man as Henry D. Thoreau should exist at all." No wonder, he exclaims, that, "the tub of Diogenes had a sounder bottom." But he admits that the general aim was praiseworthy, towards "plain living and high thinking." In Shakespeare's "Cymbeline," when the sweetest of his heroines, Imogen, finds herself in disguise, far from the court of her father, the King, and in the wilds of ancient Britain, and comes by accident into the cave where her long lost brothers have been brought up as outlaws, she makes a great discovery, and gives expression to it very emphatically. "These are kind creatures," she exclaims in an aside. "Gods, What lies I have heard! Our courtiers say all's savage but at court; Experience, O, thou disprovest report!"

These were the kind of savages, the noble savages, that Rousseau expected to find if he had ever taken his walks abroad. He once did indeed find himself in the wilds of ancient Britain, the patiently humoured guest of the kindest and best of hosts, David Hume. This kind creature was to Rousseau merely "a savage." And Rousseau, like a savage, treated him with monumental ingratitude. But at last he had become, what he was all along gradually becoming—mad.

AGAINST THE WAR SPIRIT.

Sir,—I regret that you should have given the prominence of your front page to the manifesto of the Peace and Arbitration Association, denouncing Lord Roberts's proposal that, for the purpose of defending our native land and securing peace to her people her youth should be trained to the use of the rifle. And I protest against the mistaken inference that preparation for defence implies a "war spirit," which in the heading to the letter you adopt.

There can be no doubt that every inhabitant of our country, including Lord Roberts himself, is as desirous of peace as the Committee for whom Mr. Moscheles and Mr. Green write. But, unfortunately, history, the study of which they recommend, tells us that there have been rulers and nations of a different spirit. We are all familiar with the career of Napoleon Buonaparte. I need hardly point out what might have befallen our grandfathers if England had not had a fleet and an army, which, in alliance with other nations of the Continent, were able, after he had invaded and annexed Italy and Spain, to resist, and ultimately capture him. Or if history, instead of recording Trafalgar and Waterloo, had told of the invasion of England which he was contemplating exactly a century ago (see the Times of August 14, 1805), and the expectation of which led to the training of the Volunteers of those days. What would have been the fate of the Japanese if they had been unable to defend themselves against the unprincipled aggression of the bureaucracy which wields the vast forces of the Russian Empire?

The old adage, "Si vis pacem para bellum," is still true. If a nation wishes peace she should be prepared to defend herself.—I am, Sir, yours obediently, Edmund Kell Blyth.

"The way of peace they have not known."

Sir,—The beautiful is sometimes best seen or comprehended by presenting the unlovely as a contrast. That, let us suppose, is the use of the letter by Dennis B. Squire, with its repetition of the pernicious cant of the day that "peace is best secured by the preparation for war." Is that true in private life? Is it true in a church? in a club? in the wilds of Africa? in an English village? anywhere? No; peace is best secured by being peaceable, by being useful to others, by commanding respect, or veneration, or affection; and this is true everywhere. "The preparation for war" creates a strong class, whose interests and habits always press in the direction of war; it excites passion, and tends to make enemies of the "subjects" of various rulers who, as "subjects," become little better than the unreasoning fighting cocks or dogs of those who excite them and set them on.

No; what we want is to get behind the "rulers" to the brothers; to teach the various groups of "subjects" how to blend; to combine the workers, the taxpayers, and the conscripts of all nations, and in that way to weaken the hands of the ambitious, quarrelsome, and interested fighting classes. Mr. Squire says that "there are at least two Continental Powers who would gladly conquer England." There is no knowing in these days what insane desires men may cherish, or what mad acts they may commit; but let anyone consider what the conquest of England would mean for the world, and what any conqueror could do with it when he got it. Think it out! Mr. Squire says he writes as a lover of his country. As such I invite him to break with the survivals of ancient barbarisms, and to take his stand by the side of the wise Jesus, who said, "They who take the sword will perish by the sword." I invite him also to learn the lesson of our last odious war, which is every day showing more clearly what miseries and dangers haunt the steps of those who fail to trust "the way of peace."—Heartily yours,

J. Page Hopps.

P.S.—Since writing this letter I have read a report of an interview with the Dukhobours, now on their way to Canada. They said they had been sent by the Russian Government to the Far East of Siberia with a view to extermination! Those who were not killed by the cold would be certain to be killed by the border tribes, and if any escaped those two enemies they would find the soil too poor to provide a living. But the Government was wrong. We bore the cold because we knew how to bear suffering, for that Christ showed us was a part of the human lot. And when the border tribes saw that we had no weapons, and did not intend to fight them, they did not attack us, and became friends, though they are the most hostile of all the people on the Russian frontier. And we managed to make our land productive." How beautiful! How rational! How Christian!

Sir,—In the letter by Mr. Dennis B. Squire, headed "Against the War Spirit," and, one is glad to recognise, permeated with the desire to encourage a policy of international peace, there are at least three statements which I should be prepared to controvert.

I am, however, going to ask your indulgence to deal with only one, leaving the statements that the best security for peace is to prepare for war, and that the military spirit will be diminished by the instruction of civilians in the use of weapons of war, to be answered by others, if they do not answer themselves.

Mr. Squire asserts that "There are at least two Continental Powers who would gladly conquer England."

What evidence has he for such a statement? What does he mean by the phrase "Powers"? It is becoming increasingly evident that the peoples themselves have no such quarrel with each other, which would lead one of them to cherish intentions of invading and conquering England.

The sensational section of the Press, on the Continent as here, is the only section of the community which can be credited with a real desire for war; but it may be doubted whether even the Daily Mail and its Continental prototypes are "Powers" of the kind Mr. Squire meant.

There are, however, two better answers to Mr. Squire's assertion than even these evidences against it. The first is that, in England's extremity in the early months of 1900, when every available soldier and a large portion of the Fleet were away in South Africa, when the opportunity which these watching invaders might have been supposed to be waiting for had arrived, no hint or sign of any desire to so attack us was shown. The reason is evident: it did not exist. The second is, does Mr. Squire believe that any widespread desire exists in England to invade and conquer any Continental country?

I think that he will agree with me that it does not, and he may take it for granted that our Continental neighbours, if not ahead of us in this matter, as some of them undoubtedly are, are at least not far behind.

In any case, the belief that no such desire or intention exists would go far to strengthen that rising international opinion that such an attempt would be a despicable offence against the honour of nations, sure to bring disaster upon the nation embarking in it.

Let Mr. Squire sleep peacefully; even the Prime Minister admits there will be no armed invasion of England in our time by a Continental nation.—Yours faithfully, Rich. Robinson.

Sir,—The letter of D. B. Squire in favour of Conscription deserves careful consideration. It must be taken for granted that the civilians are absolutely bound to fight when the nation and the government of the day demand them to begin. One can imagine first a perfectly just war of defence, but in that very case, would a landless army of conscripts, fight as well as those who lived in a country where property was more equally divided or where distribution was fairer. Or, take the recent war. All who voted one way at the last election were declared to be supporting the enemy, and as a matter of fact they held strong views respecting the origin, and the expected result of the attack on the Republics. Would they have consented to be forcibly torn from their homes to fight in a cause they detested? And it is decidedly not conducive to peace and arbitration to say, as your correspondent does, "that at least two Continental powers would gladly conquer England." Recent wars have been made for the main purpose of stealing land from what were supposed to be weak and insignificant nationalities. These wars have been of enormous cost to the people who waged them, and the international effects must be felt for years, besides the burden on labour. One can conceive of conscription under a totally different order of things, but when that new order comes, the nations will be too wise to go back again to the savage period of the last few years.—I am yours truly,

Edwin Hill.

OBITUARY.

Miss JANE EVANS, of CARMARTHEN.

This amiable lady, whose death is recorded in another column, was the daughter of the Rev. Titus Evans, of Carmarthen, a man of sterling qualities, who attained a considerable reputation in his time as a schoolmaster and preacher. Prior to her long and trying illness, which she bore with the utmost fortitude, Miss Evans had been an assistant mistress at the County School for girls in her native town, and, for seventeen years before that, private governess in the families of Messrs. Arthur and William Paget, successively, at or near Loughborough. A cultivated woman of gentle and unselfish disposition, she exercised a rare influence over the pupils committed to her charge, and everywhere made numerous friends. Some of our readers will remember her as a regular attendant for many years at the Unitarian Church at Loughborough.

The committee of the Green Lady Hostel, Littlehampton, are to be congratulated on a useful and successful work. The Hostel is, in fact, a working-class hotel, to which numbers of boys' and girls' clubs go, either singly or, more usually, in large parties. Last summer over 500 guests were received, and the hostel proved to meet a want badly felt by managers of clubs. The terms for board and residence are 10s. a week. The President is the Countess of Aberdeen; treasurer, J. H. Greenhalgh, 16, Somerset-terrace, W.C. The committee is appealing for funds to clear off a building debt, after which it is hoped the Hostel will prove to be self-supporting.

"The Brahmo Boys' Boarding and Day School," says the Indian Messenger of July 2, "re-opened after the summer holidays on June 8 last. It is now held at 31, Jhamapukar Lane, in a new three-storied building, commodious and well-ventilated. The school has met a crying and long-felt want, and it is very gratifying to find that it is being day by day more and more appreciated by the enlightened public. The discipline maintained in the school is all that could be desired, and has, within a very short time, attracted the notice of the residents of the locality in which it is situated. The Boarding Department, like the school, is working satisfactorily, and is under able and strict supervision. The headmaster, who has served most successfully for over seventeen years in the same capacity in several high schools, has lately removed to the Boarding house, which has no doubt added to the efficiency of the control exercised over the institution. In both the departments, fee-concessions are allowed to deserving pupils. The authorities of the school have decided to award a monthly scholarship of Rs 8, tenable for two academical years, to the student who, passing the next entrance examination in the first division, stands first among the successful candidates from it. The school has had to combat many an obstacle, despite which it has made steady progress, and bids fair to tide over all difficulties and enlist the sympathy of the public more largely in its favour. We wish the institution all success." So also do many English friends.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A SEASIDE HOLIDAY.—V.

As soon as they had finished breakfast the boys and girls, on Uncle Ned's invitation, followed him into his workroom—the "Ogre's Den," where they were much impressed and delighted with all they beheld: the microscope, set ready for use, the tanks of cool clear sea-water, the bottles labelled poison on the wallshelf, and all things in perfect order, awaiting the results of their first expedition to the rock-pools.

After a short explanation of the uses of some of the things set out on the tables, each one of the party was provided with a jam-jar, such as may be had at any grocer's, with wide neck and projecting rim, very convenient for the fixing of a stout cord handle. A larger jar was also taken for the reception of the bigger captives, whilst Uncle Ned carried a small leather satchel well stocked with corked specimen tubes for the reception of minute and delicate objects. He also took with him a mason's chisel and hammer, and the boys noted that these were tied to his belt with leather thongs, so that if dropped from his hand they would not be lost in the water. But what pleased the young folk especially were some watchmaker's magnifying glasses, one of which was given to each boy and girl, with a warning and recommendation that it should be fixed by a string to a button, as the hammer and chisel were to his own belt, so as not to be dropped or left behind. These lenses, which are not expensive, are very useful to all young (and old) nature students, and no boy or girl who loves to go a-hunting in nature's fairyland ought to be without one. When Uncle Ned explained that each of the boys and girls was to keep the one given to him, or her, they were all exceedingly glad and very proud to possess them, promising him with many thanks to take great care of them.

After a quarter of an hour thus most pleasantly spent in the den of the terrible Ogre, they all proceeded to the farm-yard, where they found Maggie Banks awaiting them with the poles and canvas and ropes of the bathing tent ready packed up. Maggie was a strong girl of about sixteen years of age, and she was about to carry canvas, poles, and guyropes all herself; but Ernest begged to be allowed to take the poles and ropes; and so each one bearing his or her own share of the burdens, they set out on their expedition.

On reaching the shore they found the ebbing tide nearly half out, so that there was already a long tongue of rocks exposed and extending from the foot of the cliff seaward, mostly covered with seaweed, and looking very inviting to a band of zealous seekers after the marvels of the rock-pools. But, before the hunting began, there was the tent to be set up, and this was forthwith done by the boys, under Maggie's directions. Truly it was a magnificent erection, of striped scarlet and white canvas—six feet six inches high, and covering a square of nearly seven feet at the base.

"It's large enough to take us all in," cried Ernest, in great delight.

"Won't it be a delightful place for mother to sit in when she comes down, by-and-by?" asked Elsie.

"I should like simply to lie down on the cool sand in the shade of the tent, and just do nothing at all, except listen to the sound of the waves all the day, and watch the clouds, and dream!" said Mab.

"Well, you girls may do just as you like, and either stay in the tent, or come with us for a while, to hunt the rock-pools," said Uncle Ned, "but in any case you must have your bathe before noon."

"I shall certainly go with you and the boys to the rock-pools," cried Elsie at once; and Mab, thinking that she could do her day-dreaming and cloud-gazing some other time, the whole party trooped after Uncle Ned, who, to tell the truth, was as eager as any of the younger ones to take advantage of the ebbing spring-tide.

Now it would take me a long, long while simply to set down the names only of the marvellous things to be found in a clear rock-pool any day in August. The young folk, to whom everything they saw was a new revelation of Nature's wonder-working, were simply bewildered at first. Uncle Ned led them, quickly, some distance across the weed-covered rocks, until they came to a lovely pool, just left by the retreating tide, and fringed all round with browny-green weed (fucus). The water was so clear that they could see perfectly all that lay at the bottom. There were big flat stones lying there, on which grew miniature forests of lovely seaweeds—green, purple, pink, and crimson; there were other stones on which there grew no weeds at all, but which were encrusted over with curious growths of mottled colour, and when asked what these were Uncle Ned could only give their long Greek and Latin names, because they had no plain English ones. Then he told them to keep perfectly still and watch, and they soon saw that the bottom of the pool was swarming with life of many different forms and kinds. The longer they remained quiet, the more life there appeared to be—moving about at the bottom, and venturing out of hiding-places in the fringe of floating tangle weed round the pool. It is a great advantage for all nature students to be able to remain perfectly still and watch. In this way very timid animals are often induced to gain confidence and to venture into view and carry on their operations naturally. So, for a while, the whole party watched the life drama at the bottom of the pool in breathless stillness and silence until at last, Ernest, observing a battle about to take place between two quarrelsome hermit-crabs, each living in his Diogenes' tub of a borrowed whelkshell, got excited, and stooped down quickly to interrupt the fight, when at once, as if by magic, the whole pool became as still as death!

"There! you've spoilt it all!" exclaimed Frank.

"I didn't mean to," answered Ernest. "I forgot all about keeping still when I saw those two whelks fighting."

This reply set Uncle Ned laughing. "Whelks fighting!" said he. "No, my lad, they weren't whelks, but a couple of quarrelsome "hermits," each wanting to turn the other out of his whelkshell house to see if it would fit him better than his own. But I am glad that Ernest did move, for it so clearly proved the advantage of remaining still, and so being able to make the sea-folk believe you are nobody at all. Ernest has not reached that state yet, but he will soon do so, and then he will learn many a secret, and see many a wonderful and charming sight. But now, all of you come round to this side of the pool and watch closely. I am going to raise a mass of this fringing weed suddenly, and I expect there will be a great commotion."

Then, when all were ready, he quickly drew out of the pool a large mass of the fucus, and thereby revealed underneath a delightful little cavern, into the depths of which the sun now suddenly shone. At once there was a great darting away of wee fishes and dozens of small crabs, and prawns, and other active pool dwellers which dread the light. But the sight which remained when all these skipjacks had taken themselves off was beyond all description beautiful, for, without expecting it, Uncle Ned had laid bare one of Nature's choicest bits of fairyland—a perfect garden of sea-anemones and other flower-like animals. A mingled cry of wonder, admiration and joy rose from the whole party; even Uncle Ned was surprised and delighted. As Mab said, no words seemed good enough to describe the magnificent sight. There, on the sides and at the bottom, were groups of brilliantly coloured sea-anemones fully expanded, with their delicate tentacles spread out—rosy red, purple, green, crimson, brown, white and pearly, barred with pink. There were giant dahlia anemones, and common "beadlets," with their circles of turquoise-blue beads fully exposed; there were strawberry anemones and, along with them, others, the names of which Uncle Ned could not tell without a reference to Grosse's "British Sea-Anemones," of which a copy stood on the shelves at Brookside.

In addition to the anemones there were groups of lovely scarlet-crested tube-worms, which Uncle Ned said were called serpulæ. These worms build for themselves white tubes of lime in which they live, withdrawing into the tube quite suddenly if alarmed and slowly reappearing and displaying their brilliant scarlet gills. The serpulæ had built their tubes on the empty shell of a pecten, and Uncle Ned fished this shell out, with the whole colony of serpulæ attached, and transferred it to his big glass jar of sea-water; this was their first prize for the Brookside aquarium.

For at least an hour our young folk remained admiring the perfect loveliness of that one side of the rock-pool, with its little cavern, into which the sun was shining; and always the quieter they remained, and the more intently they looked, the more marvels they found: brilliant orange-coloured star-fishes, pearly top shells, pale yellow and brick-red sponges. Sometimes a pipe-fish would glide into view, or a brilliantly coloured father-lasher would scurry across the floor of the cavern; indeed there was enough to interest them all for hours, and until the returning tide should drive them back, but Uncle Ned was anxious to go out as far as possible to search pools which were only to be approached at low spring tides; so after a while he reminded the girls that it was time for them to go for their bathe and called the boys to follow him further out seawards.

CALVIN AND SERVETUS.

Two years ago, in the autumn of the year in which the second meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers was held at Amsterdam,* a monument was unveiled at Geneva unique of its kind, and it is a happy circumstance that next week the third biennial meeting of the Council is to be held in the city of CALVIN, with the cordial co-operation of many of those who united in raising that "expiatory monument" to the memory of SERVETUS, the victim of the great reformer's remorseless theological zeal.

As near to the actual site of the martyrdom as possible, at Champel, on a hill-side, which at that time was on the outskirts of Geneva, a great block of granite was erected recording the fact of the death of SERVETUS, burnt at the stake, three hundred and fifty years ago, on October 27, 1553, and at the same time making the confession that the monument is raised by "grateful sons" of CALVIN, who desire thus to make reparation to the memory of his victim. Declaring their strong attachment to liberty of conscience, according to the true principles of the Reformation and of the Gospel, they condemn that act of CALVIN'S, as "an error which was that of his age." One could have wished that the condemnation of the cruel act had been in stronger terms, as a crime against humanity, and yet it is a fact of great significance that such a monument should be erected at all at Geneva.

Not only the liberals in theology, but more orthodox members also of the Reformed churches, chiefly in Switzerland and France, with the co-operation of a few friends in other countries (some readers of THE INQUIRER among their number) united in the erection of the monument, which was unveiled on All Saints' Day, falling in that year on a Sunday, and was publicly accepted by the civic authorities of the district. After the ceremony of unveiling a religious service was held in the parish church of the district, that of Plainpalais, when addresses were delivered by the Rev. EUGÈNE CHOISY, chairman of the memorial committee, Professor AUGUSTE CHANTRE of Geneva, and Professor DOUMERQUE of Montauban. A report of the proceedings, with the addresses in full, and illustrations of the monument as seen from both sides, with the inscriptions clearly legible, was published at the time by Messrs. CH. EGGIMANN & Co., of Geneva.

Another publication in connection with the commemoration, clearly setting forth the significance of the whole matter, was a lecture on "MICHAEL SERVET" by Herr TH. SCHNEIDER, Oberlehrer in Wiesbaden.* The lecture gives a most interesting account of the career of SERVETUS, not passing over his faults any more than those of CALVIN, but doing full justice to his religious earnestness. An ardent student of the Bible, he cherished a passionate devotion to CHRIST, whom he regarded, not indeed as GOD, the Eternal Son, but as Son of the Eternal. His scheme, as the article on SERVETUS in the "Encyclopædia Britannica" says, was essentially Christocentric, and he felt himself under Divine commission to bring back the Christian world to Gospel truth. Hence his vehement attack on the ecclesiastical doctrine of the Trinity. He was fully aware of the danger of such a course, and after seeing the effect of his first essay on the "errors of the doctrine of the Trinity," he might easily have chosen the path of safety; but it was with him a matter of conscience; he would not deny what he held to be the truth of God to save his own life. "I well know," he wrote to a Geneva preacher, after CALVIN had broken off relations with him "that I must die for this cause, but my soul is not dismayed on that account, seeing that the disciple may become like unto his Master." While CALVIN, for his part, made the sinister declaration: "Should he come, if my authority still counts for anything, I will not let him go with his life." The shameful fact seems to be now established, beyond denial, that it was CALVIN who put the Inquisition on the track of SERVETUS at Vienne, and so nearly compassed his death. From the authorities of the Roman Church, however, he escaped, and was burnt by them only in effigy; but when he attempted, on his way to Zurich, to pass through Geneva, CALVIN carried out his threat, and in the agony of the slow fire on Champel, SERVETUS committed his ardent soul to GOD, with the last cry, "O JESUS, Thou Son of the Eternal GOD, have pity on me!"

Now, on that peaceful hill-side, stands the silent monument, recalling the memory of that lurid tragedy, but at the same time bearing witness to the victory of a better spirit in the churches which acknowledge their descent from CALVIN. When next week the members of the International Council gather for united worship in the Cathedral Church, where CALVIN used to preach, they may feel that the memory of his adversary is indeed vindicated; and they may acknowledge with Herr SCHNEIDER, in the preface to his lecture, and with Professor DOUMERQUE in the eloquent conclusion of his address two years ago, that if CALVIN could now revisit the scene of his former labours and stand beside that silent monument, he would himself humbly confess the wrong he did.

THE COMMUNION OF THE EARTH.

NATURE offers freely to all men gifts of the most ordinary good, and ministries of a rarer intimacy. All are at their service; it is according to their conscious need and their power of welcome whether they gain only the more obvious or also the more secret ministry of health. The rough, physical vigour, gained from frank companionship with sun, and wind, and rain, is no more than the first in an ascending scale of good. We tramp along the lowland road, by full fed rivers, winding slow, or on the borders of quick brawling streams; we move across the honey sweet purple moors; we climb the rugged mountain side. The anxious forethinking of business falls away from the mind. The heart is at leisure. And this is a great boon to men of the over intellectualised world. No syllogisms are to be disentangled from the song of birds, and scent of flowers. The wind as it goes in the tops of the trees, speaks, but only of large, calm emotions. But it is not all sunshine even on the hills. At times the rains fall straight, or drive and dash, till hands, and face and body are streaming wet. Or again, the great winds roar. Or the world is lost in the dark snow. He who is quick to enjoy, strong to endure, who can smile with the sunny hours, and laugh at the storm, gains from these days of intercourse with the earth, when the thought systems of men and books are forgotten, a bouyancy of health to which the townsman is usually a stranger. This first good gift, offered as it is to all, is received by many. It is among the common treasures of the holiday, nature's response to man's restless activity.

The message of the earth is also to those who are able to receive it in quieter mood. How fair it is to look upon. Study it with curious gaze, and it yields a festival of colour. Quiet nooks and ample spaces reveal themselves. The broad sculpture of the mountain side, the minute chiselling of the wayside bank. There are some whose eye cannot choose but see; and no sketch book can contain a tithe of the landscapes of the earth. This gift of the outer vision is more lasting than that of mere force. As the rich brown passes from the face, so too the tense energy, gained from days in the open air, departs before the dark days come. But the memory pictures linger in the heart; and the earth-born mood of artistic delight possesses the mind afar off. This may be whether the artist have perceived "with or through" his eye; but is specially so for him whose sight has been as the avenue to the heart of high feeling. To such it is as to Wordsworth's Lucy,

> And beauty born of murmuring sound
> Has passed into her face.

There are men for whom the ministry of the earth assumes a more mystic character. It is to them as a eucharistic communion. This is, perhaps, increasingly so in our own days. They accept the physical force gained on the open road, they enjoy to the full the aesthetic charm of nature. But there are moods and messages, stirrings of strange, half-concealed emotions, which touch them to a sense not only of delight, but of kinship. They commune with earth as with the great mother. The rising of the sap in the trees is, in fact, controlled by the same life as stings the man into quicker perceptions in the spring time. The rythym of earth and of mind are seen to follow one law, and be of one common kind. Science may confirm what is prefigured in this sense of kinship. These communicants with the earth mother, however, do not wait for any reasoned confirmation. They tell us simply what they feel, what they say they know. There is something of a revived paganism in the teaching. And the persistency and variousness with which the earth cult is proclaimed is worth our attention. They are persuaded that old legends of metamorphosis, old beliefs in the woodland spirits, and the people of stream and fountain, are not an over belief, but rather an under belief. The mistake of antique paganism lay not in regarding the likeness of nature and man as too close, but in visaging it as too external. There is to these men of modern times, whose communism is with the earth, a direct personal certitude of kinship, not only with the beast of the field, but even in some instances with the crawling things of the earth. If there is little literal faith in the dryads, it is only because the tree itself is instinct with human kinship. The life working there and the life working in the man are felt to be one. Even the bare earth-mould itself, so cold, so seeming unresponsive, conveys its mystic message. There is, indeed, no voice or language, but to high appreciation the cold clod reveals a kindred nature. About these things there is no argument. The appeal is only to experience. If the aim of the members of this cult were a missionary one, there would be a disadvantage here. But they do not seem to seek converts, except so far as their mere assurance may prove persuasive. At their extreme they are far enough from the ordinary love of nature. Yet, these rarer intimacies are not, after all, so sharply distinguished from the more common experiences. To the sensitive and the imaginative there is something untellable in the smell of the land when the soft rain has fallen upon it. It stirs dim ancestral memories, which often perplex and haunt the mind with restless delight. And this is only a single case, though, perhaps, one of the most usual. These unsifted associations of the earth's fragrance! And so it is, that when we begin with the most external perception, we pass by insensible gradations, towards the more intimate. There is always a suggestion of a reserve of meaning. Always something of power which has not entered into the limb, something of beauty which has not transfigured the mind. And this being so, men may be more prepared to listen to the members of the fellowship of the earth, when they tell of that close, real kinship such as has not yet entered into the heart of man to conceive.

ABOUT GENEVA.

II.

THESE notes may claim still to be about Geneva, though we are forty miles away from the city, as the crow flies, and it was a journey of more than three hours by rail, and then a drive of five miles up the valley from Chamonix to get here. But there at Geneva, from the northern shore of the lake, one had a vision of Mont Blanc, and still more perfectly as we came in by steamer in the quiet evening, first in the sunset and then in the light of the full moon; and here we have his mighty front full in view. We are children of the great King of mountains; little midgets indeed, crawling about in the valley far below, and yet a part of this glory of the mountains, with a great delight in their sublime beauty, content to be very little, compassed about by stupendous forces, and yet knowing that the strength of the hills, in fortitude and courage and generous ardour, may be kindled also in our hearts.

And here, on this quiet Sunday morning, we have already the pleasant sense of a goodly company of our English friends scattered among these valleys or on the great heights, preparing to meet the main party, which is to leave London on Friday (yesterday, according to the date of the paper in which these notes are to be printed) for the meeting of the International Council at Geneva. In this very hotel we have, as it has chanced, with other friends, the preacher who is next Sunday evening to address the English congregation in the Church of the Maccabees, under the shadow of the Cathedral. That sermon, we believe, is now in process of formation in his mind and heart; certainly, no happier place than this could be found for meditation on the loftiest themes or for inspiration of the noblest sort.

On this Sunday morning there is a cloudless sky. Brilliant sunshine makes the shade of the garden delicious, for our Hôtel de la Couronne has a very pleasant garden, where one can sit quietly and give oneself up to all the glory of Mont Blanc. Here at Argentière we are a little more than 4,000 feet above sea-level, and there, straight in front of us, is the summit of Mont Blanc, clear against the blue sky, more than 15,000 feet in height. On the smooth surface of the snow on the top good eyes can just discern a tiny speck, which is the observatory built by Dr. Janssen in 1893; but, from the height of the Flégère on Friday afternoon, we saw it very clearly through a good telescope, looking something like the tower of Magdalen at Oxford rising out of the snow. Then also we made out quite distinctly the Chalet-Hotel, perched on the rocks of the Grands-Mulets, above the Glacier des Bossons, where the night is spent before making the ascent of the mountain, and much nearer the top the Chalet Rouge, while on a smooth field of snow, high up, we watched eight men, roped together (or was it seven men and a woman?) coming down the mountain-side.

From Argentière the view of the great mountain is perfect. The summit forms the centre of our picture from the hotel garden, appearing just on the right of the splendid crags on the other side of the Mer de Glace, which is hidden from our view by nearer pine-clad slopes. But we have the Glacier des Bossons full in view, with the crags of the Grands-Mulets rising out of the snow above, and from the summit of Mont Blanc, the clear line of snow against the sky comes down to the lower peaks of the Dôme du Goûter and the Aiguille du Goûter (still over 12,000 feet in height). Then on the right, tall pine trees make a frame for this splendid vision of the snow-clad mountain.

The steep hill-side against which our hotel finds shelter is clothed with beautiful fir-woods, and there is a terrace walk down the valley towards Chamonix, which climbs higher and higher on the hill-side, with an endless succession of glimpses of Mont Blanc and the rest of the great chain through the trees. At present it leads nowhere, and is just a steep uneven path on its own account, though none the less charming for all that, and rich in treasures of bilberry and wild raspberry; presently it is to be extended along the hill, so that in time it will be the most beautiful and most direct way from Argentière to the Flégère.

Close at hand, across the valley, we have our own Glacier d'Argentière, dominated by the splendid Aiguille of the same name. In half an hour, crossing the Arve, and passing the little village church, with its picturesque guilded spire (said to be of Moorish origin), and then after a level walk climbing up the stony slope, one reaches the foot of the glacier, with its rushing torrent pouring out from beneath the arch of ice.

This peaceful little village and the charm of the valley are somewhat marred at present by the construction of the electric railway, which is being continued up from Chamonix and over into the Rhone valley. The valley is scarred by the unsightly works, and the quietness disturbed early and late by frequent blastings, while, here as elsewhere, one cannot escape from the detestable hootings of passing motor-cars; but that is one reason the more for getting away from the highroad on to the greater heights.

Further up the valley one comes to the Glacier du Tour, and then at the head, where the Arve rises, a path goes over the Col de Balme (with a glorious view down our valley to Mont Blanc) to Trient, and on by the road to Martigny in the Rhone valley. The highroad turns to the left just beyond Argentière, and, after winding up the steep hill-side on the edge of our sheltering wood, goes over another pass to Châtelard, where one is again in Switzerland. There the road divides, going, on the one hand, over the Tête Noire to Trient and Martigny, and on the other to Finhaut, and down to Vernayaz, also in the Rhone valley. That is to be our road to-morrow, as far as Finhaut, where we shall be still 4,000 feet above the sea, and, after a day or two there, on to Glion, and so by the lake back to Geneva.

But one does not like to go away from Argentière. It is a place delightful for a prolonged stay, even if one is fit only for modest climbs close at hand. That was a splendid walk three of us had on Friday, up to the Flégère. First for a couple of miles on the highroad down the valley—for we missed what we were told was the ideal way up, over a certain third bridge—and then a climb nearly all the way through the woods. We got down to Les Tines, and then, after a charming little bit through the woods, had a steep zig-zag pull up the bare hill-side in blazing sun, but afterwards a longer climb through shady pine woods, till we came upon a little grassy place by a refreshing stream, where we could rest and lunch in comfort. High up it was, looking right across the valley on to the Mer de Glace and the Glacier des Bossons, to the splendid circle of the Aiguilles and the summit of Mont Blanc itself. That was the view we had also, but with a much wider outlook, when we reached the terrace of the Flégère, where the little inn is perched, at a height of over 6,000 feet. There was the telescope above mentioned, and the welcome possibility of tea. The great mountain chain opposite was not all clear, though the summit of Mont Blanc was unshrouded all the time we were there. But the wreathing clouds, sometimes on the heights, sometimes across the lower reaches, added to the impressiveness of the scene, and the afternoon light upon the snow was of indescribable beauty. The Jorasses—tremendous cliffs at the back of the Mer de Glace—stood out clearly part of the time, and then were completely hidden; but most impressive of all were perhaps the two Aiguilles—Verte and du Dru—the one a magnificent dark rocky peak, the other a snowy crest, a thousand feet higher—though, from where we saw them, close together as it seemed, that was difficult to believe. These two great peaks were sometimes shrouded in cloud, then one or the other would emerge, or both would be seen clear against the sky, with the moving cloud below; then, again, the veil which had hidden them seemed to be dissipating itself, and the precipitous rocks or the steep snowy side of the mountain would appear through rents in the cloud. It was fascinating to watch, and one would gladly have stayed till sunset or overnight, seeing that great presence under new aspects of splendour, and, if it might be, under the silent stars.

But we came down in the evening, and by another way. Soon after we left our highest point we dropped into a little green hollow in the hillside, where some thirty or forty cows were grazing, each with its tinkling bell, so that the sunny air was full of the music they made, and at our feet the flowers in the soft turf, and presently such forests of bilberries as one seldom has the chance to revel in; and for companion a mountain stream. Then a long descent through the woods again, by a rough stony path, but glorious all the way by reason of the constant glimpses of the splendour of the mountains opposite, seen through the trees or in open places where the ridge of our hill-side was clear. And at last the valley once more, with pleasant meadows, in spite of the railway works, and the simple folk busy with their work on the land; then, before long, our own garden and a good rest before dark. It was only one walk among many one can take here on every hand—nothing for a great mountaineer, and yet for us glorious in its wealth of beauty and delight.

And now, as these notes must be finished, the evening light is on Mont Blanc and a rosy cloud just touches its crest. The sound of the rushing Arve is in the air, but there is a deep silence resting on those gleaming slopes of snow. We shall look with a different feeling from Geneva to that distant height now that we have been so near for these few days and have been filled with the glory of the presence of the great mountain.

Argentière, August 20.

THE EPISTLE TO PHILEMON.

A LECTURE BY S. O. LOVELL, HOBART, TASMANIA.

II.

THERE does not seem at first sight anything to excite suspicion about the genuineness of this simple document—to make us doubt that we have a real letter that came glowing from the Apostle's great heart of human love and sympathy. And, indeed, the genuineness of the letter never was doubted till very recent times. So far as mere external testimony is concerned, this letter is as well attested as those which are generally accepted as Pauline. It is quoted as Paul's by several of the Fathers—by Tertullian, by Jerome, by Origen; it is mentioned in the ancient fragment known as the "Muratorian Canon," and it is included in the list of authentic Scriptures by the Church historian Eusebius. This kind of evidence, however, is far from conclusive—it settles very little. It only establishes the fact that, in very early times, the letter was looked upon as genuinely Pauline; it shows what was the early belief about the authorship of the document, but it discloses nothing as to the grounds and reasons for that belief. Between the death of Paul and the time of the earliest Church writer who quotes as Paul's this letter "to Philemon," at least one hundred years elapsed, and this, it must be admitted, is a long enough time to allow of the letter having been written by someone else, to have been published in the Apostle's name, and to have gained general circulation and acceptance. Not, by any means, that we are to assume gratuitously that such was the case; but only that, if, on internal grounds—if, that is to say, when we look at the general character and contents of the letter, we find reason to doubt or deny its genuineness, then the external testimony is not conclusive and authoritative enough to set aside such doubts or to meet such denial. Now, it is precisely on such internal grounds—that is, for reasons drawn from the letter itself—that the genuineness of the document has been doubted. The first writer to challenge the generally received belief about the authorship of the letter to Philemon was the great German scholar and theologian, Ferdinand Christian Baur—a man who has left the ineffaceable mark of his genius upon the scientific study of the New Testament writings, and who in particular has done very much to interpret for us the inmost heart and mind of the great Apostle of the Gentiles. Baur, as I have already intimated, held firmly by the genuineness of only four of the letters which are usully ascribed to Paul; all the rest he rejected on grounds set forth in his great work, "Paul the Apostle," and in this rejection he included the letter to Philemon. He admits, however, that in questioning the genuineness of this graceful letter of private friendship, criticism more than in the case of any of the other canonical writings runs the risk of appearing like hyper-criticism, and showing a morbid sensitiveness to doubt, from the attacks of which hardly anything can be safe.

Still, Baur's criticisms cannot be altogether ignored. They have reference, first, to the language of the letter. Certain words and phrases are pronounced un-Pauline; that is to say, they are never used in Paul's undoubtedly genuine writings, but only in the questionable ones. Such words and phrases are: "fellow-soldier," "to enjoin what is convenient," "the aged," "profitable," "unprofitable," "to receive," "to repay," "owe," "to have joy of," "a lodging," and lastly, not the word itself, but the triple repetition of it—the word translated "heart." The great critic himself, however, does not lay any heavy stress on this use of words that are alleged to be un-Pauline, and therefore we need not trouble ourselves much with that part of the question, more especially as the argument drawn from it does not seem to have carried much weight with critics generally. The late Matthew Arnold was wont to complain, not without cause, that German scholars are too "vigorous and rigorous" in their critical handling of the Bible; and certainly it would be altogether too rigorous were we to consider the Apostle restricted to the vocabulary of his four great epistles, and to believe it impossible that he should ever make any addition thereto. It is not, you will observe, a question of general literary style that is involved, as it is in regard to the Epistle to the Hebrews, for instance, in which the smoothly flowing periods strike us as strangely unlike the usual impetuous torrent of Pauline eloquence. We cannot say of the letter to Philemon that its style on the whole is strikingly unlike that of Paul; if it is a trifle more smooth and quiet than that of the great doctrinal epistles, this may easily be accounted for by the difference in the kinds of composition. And so we may leave this part of the argument as at least not very conclusive.

Baur's criticisms, further, have reference to the matter of the epistle—that is to say, the framework of the story, the ideas expressed or implied, the religious aim and motive which he believes are to be discerned in the writing. I have already touched upon the element of romance which we find involved in the letter; and it is just this element which most strongly excites Baur's suspicions about the genuineness of the document. He thinks it contains just such coincidences as may be found in fiction, but which are very improbable in real life. Moreover, he considers that the letter exhibits the embryo or beginning of a romantic or religious literature, the tendency of the romance being to show that what is lost in the World is regained in Christianity, both here and hereafter. Thus Baur finds the keynote of this epistle in the words, "For perhaps he departed from thee for a season, that thou mightest receive him for ever—no longer as a slave, but as a brother beloved." And he goes on to point out that this recovery and transfiguration of lost relationships is exactly the leading idea that we find in the developed romance literature of the second century, notably in the spurious writings known as the "Clementine Homilies." Truth, however, as the proverb reminds us, is sometimes stranger than fiction, and it is therefore possible that in this interesting letter we have a true blending of both fact and romance. It we suppose Paul and Onesimus were previously acquainted, and that the latter went to the Apostle when he repented of his flight, or was in trouble, we shall not see any such strange coincidence of circumstances as Baur finds so improbable. May it not be that what Baur calls "these sweet utterances of an author deeply imbued with the Christian spirit" are only incidental; that they were bound to flow forth from the heart of one who always walked in the light of brotherly love; that they do not express the sole purpose of the writing; that, while the ideas which the German critic has expounded are undoubtedly there, they are at all events conveyed through the medium of a genuine letter and an authentic history?

On the whole, then, we may say that Baur's criticisms are hardly of sufficient force to carry home to us the conviction that this letter is spurious; and this conclusion derives strong support from the fact that a host of modern scholars, who are by no means adherents of traditional beliefs in general, still hold firmly that in this epistle we have a genuine writing from the hand of the Apostle Paul. Nevertheless, while justified in maintaining this opinion, we are bound to admit that we have not here the unconditional certainty which attaches to the Apostle's great epistles.

But, after all, it is not a matter of very great moment whether Paul wrote this letter or not. We know at least that it is worthy of him; that it glows with the same love, burns with the same ardour of brotherly affection which animated the Apostle himself. It would be pleasing, no doubt, to feel fully assured, that in this graceful letter, which breathes the purest spirit of Christian sweetness and courtesy, and withal such love and pity for the social outcast, we really have the words of "Paul the aged"; but we do not need it to convince us that he had a great, friendly heart, and that he displayed the qualities of a Christian gentleman. We can see all these things in those genuine, unstudied postcripts to many of his letters in which he sends his love to the brethren, bespeaking kindly consideration for this one, help and succour for that one, forbearance for another. And if we are compelled to give up this particular letter, is not the loss really a gain? For is not our spiritual world the richer for another noble soul? If Paul did not write this letter someone else did; there was another man, albeit unknown to us, whose spirit had been touched with that divine flame of charity which burned so ardently in the heart of the Apostle. If we cannot credit to Paul the loving brotherliness and sweet courtesy of this letter, then we have simply to credit them to someone else; and Paul, we know, is rich enough already in all gracious works and ways, and his full account can well spare this much for another.

The letter may be spurious—it may not have been written by Paul—the story and its characters may be fictions—Philemon and Onesimus, Apphia and Archippus may have been the creations of the writer's imagination; but you can have inspired fiction as well as inspired history, and this ancient document (for it is ancient, even if it was written in the second century instead of the first) may nevertheless be full of instruction for us of this twentieth century. And before I close, I should like to try to show what its meaning and its lessons are.

Baur finds the keynote of the epistle in the words, "For perhaps he departed from thee for a season, that thou mightest receive him for ever." With all deference to such a critic, I am inclined to think that the true keynote of the letter is to be found in the words "a brother beloved." And what sort of a man was this who was thus commended to Philemon as a brother—yea, "a brother beloved"? He was a slave—an outlawed Phrygian slave—and Phrygian slaves, you know, bore the very worst of all servile characters. And yet this man, who was perhaps as black as Dean Farrar has painted him, had been transformed by coming into contact with the spirit of Christ, as it glowed and shone in the soul of a disciple. Even if this slave Onesimus was not a real historical character, yet he was without question the type of thousands of the lowest classes of society on whom Christianity exercised the spell of its regenerating influence, rescuing them from the lowest depths of infamy. What was this regenerating power? Perhaps you will say the grace of God. No doubt; but then the grace of God works through means; though a supernatural force, yet it is not a miraculous force, for if it were it would hardly need any means at all, and it might just as well have come to this Onesimus at Colossæ, in his master's house, as at Rome in the house of Paul. Nor can we suppose that this transforming grace of God came to Onesimus simply from Paul's teaching. We can hardly suppose that this poor fugitive slave, ignorant and uncultured, was redeemed from his evil works and ways by deeply pondering the metaphysical subtleties of Paul's theology — by mastering some theological "plan of salvation." No; he was not saved by teaching, nor even by ecclesiastical sacraments, but simply by contact with some great, loving heart such as Paul's. Here was the secret of it all; he found a brother, and he became a brother, yea, a brother beloved. This, then, is the first great lesson of our epistle: the transforming power of Christianity lies in the touch of heart upon heart—the influence of character upon character. The doctrine of the brotherhood of man, which is one of the central truths of the Christian religion, as Jesus taught it, must be born in human hearts, and lived out in human lives, otherwise that doctrine is nothing but an empty shibboleth. And you may depend upon it, that if ever the outcast, the sinful, the fallen, the degraded are to be restored to their lost manhood and womanhood, it can only be by the power of simple, human, brotherly love.

This epistle, again, is specially interesting because it sets before us the attitude of Christianity to slavery, and shows us how the religion of Jesus worked towards the amelioration of the human lot and the regeneration of social institutions. It shows us that Christianity worked outwards from within, and not inwards from without, thus fulfilling the similitude of Jesus when he spoke of the Kingdom of God as a leaven hid in three measures of meal. The writer of this epistle—Paul or some other Christian; it does not matter who—makes, as you will observe, no direct attack on slavery itself as a social institution—nay, he evidently recognises its legitimacy; he acknowledges the right of Philemon to his slave as a chattel; no suspicion seems to have entered his mind that slavery was incompatible with the Christian religion. The same recognition of slavery as a lawful institution is found in the Colossians' epistle, where slaves — not "servants," as we have it in the Authorised Version—but slaves, bondservants, are exhorted to obey their masters; while the slaveholders are exhorted, not to emancipate their slaves, but only to treat them kindly. Let me ask you to look at two pictures. Here is Paul, a Christian preacher and reformer of the first century, dutifully sending back a runaway slave to his master, with a letter bespeaking that master's forgiveness. Here, again, is Theodore Parker, a Christian preacher and reformer of the nineteenth century, sitting down to write his Sunday sermon with loaded revolvers on his desk to protect a runaway slave, sheltered in his house from the bloodhounds of a Government which was endeavouring to enforce a fugitive slave law. From Paul in the first century to Theodore Parker in the nineteenth is a long cry, but it was only in the beginning of the latter century that the Christian Churches awoke to the iniquity of slavery, as a sin against humanity; and not till our own times has the institution been finally abolished even in civilised countries. And yet, after all, it cannot be denied that it was under the banner of the cross that the Crusade against slavery was undertaken; it was in the name of Christ and in the power of Christian brotherhood that the Clarksons, and the Wilberforces, the Garrisons and the Parkers struck off the fetters of the slave. Enlightened economics could not do it, neither could theories of natural rights nor political agitation, but only the love of the brethren. Why, then, did not Christianity effect the overthrow of slavery in the first century, instead of waiting till the nineteenth? I answer, because social institutions cannot be overthrown by assault from without, but only by decay from within. Social institutions always rest upon a moral basis; they are the crystallised expression in outward form of an inward moral spirit, and only by changing that inward spirit can you secure any change in the outward form. If, then, Christianity took eighteen centuries to abolish slavery as a social institution, this was not because Christianity is impotent to change the face of society, but because its method of work is inward and not outward; because it tells upon the springs of action, and operates in changing the moral character. If the first apostles of Christianity had gone to work by making an onslaught upon the institution of slavery, they would not only have failed to destroy it, but the Church itself might have perished in a whirlwind of State persecution. But, in the good providence of God, they were guided into the true method and secret of Jesus; they simply introduced a moral solvent which slowly—very, very slowly it is true—but with unerring certainty brought the institution to rottenness, and threw it in crumbling ruin to the ground. The all-powerful corrosive which dissolved the chains of slavery was just this—the simple spirit of human love—the recognition of the slave as a brother—yea, "a brother beloved."

THE Methodist Episcopal Churches of the United States have recently issued a new hymnal. The number of hymns is less than in the latest Wesleyan hymn book here, 717 to 981; and the book contains only 120 of Charles Wesley's hymns, a very much smaller number than the English book. The overwhelming predominence of Wesley's hymns in the new Wesleyan hymn book is probably felt by all who are outside of Methodism, and by some within the bounds, to be a mistake. Yet it is a mistake easily explicable and pardonable. It was the Wesleys who put the new song of convinced and converted, of working and wrestling souls into the mouths of the people; and it would look like ingratitude to be too ready to set aside the hymns that in bygone days were so full of life and meaning. That even the Americans, whose tradition is less immediate, should still take one-sixth of their hymns from the first Methodist singer is really a fine illustration of his enduring power.

CHEAP COTTAGES.

THE impression left by a visit to the Cheap Cottages Exhibition at Garden City is that a really satisfactory house for a working man, or a country labourer with a family, cannot be built for £150, but that something better than that which is usually provided can be erected at the price. The exhibition resulted from articles published in The Country Gentleman and Land and Water, aided by the offer of the Garden City Company of a site on which the cottages could be erected, and on which they could remain after the exhibition was over. The main object was to show what could be done for £150, or less, in providing a house for a country labourer, for whom it would not "pay" to build more expensively, because he could not afford the rent that would be a "moderate" interest on the capital expended.

The result now to be seen at Letchworth is very interesting. Unusual building materials are brought into use; new devices are employed for the convenience and healthy living of cottagers, at a low cost of construction, and there is little doubt that some of the many visitors will carry away ideas that will result in an improvement of small house property.

In accordance with the conditions regulating the exhibits, nearly all of the cottages have, on the ground floor, one good living room, and a small scullery. When there is also a parlour, it is smaller than the living room. Labourers do not live in the parlour if they have one. The kitchen, is, in fact, the family living room; and from the examples at the cheap Cottages Exhibition, we see how much more sensible, healthy, and pleasant it is for a small house to have its kitchen planned to be roomy, cheerful, and beautiful, than to provide for a sitting-room as large or larger than the kitchen, in imitation of the houses of people who can pay a much higher rent. Many of the cottages are excellent in these ground-floor arrangements.

But to provide three good bedrooms, which the promoters of the Exhibition have rightly considered the smallest number compatible with health and decency for a family, appears to be impossible at the price. The third bedroom is usually a little box of a place, in which one person would be overcrowded. The Copartnership Tenants' Housing Council has made as good provision as any at the price, in this and some other ways; and, as it is their especial business to build for Garden City requirements, this is satisfactory to friends of Garden City. Mr. Sneyd's cottage (No. 78) has better bedroom accommodation than most.

Some of the most attractive houses for their internal and external appearance, and convenience of arrangement, are those exhibited by Mr. Geoffrey Lucas, Mr. O. P. Milne, Messrs. Stanley, Barrett & Driver, and the Society of Artists; but one wishes the plans could have been carried out on a larger scale throughout.

Undoubtedly, the most satisfactory cottages in the whole exhibition are the pair designed by Mr. Baillie Scott. Inside and outside they are beautiful, and suited for rural surroundings. There is a delightful kitchen, with a smaller parlour, which opens into the kitchen, so that it can be made practically a part of it, or be shut off at will; the useful appliances look as if they belonged there. The necessary things are beautiful, and no ornamentation is stuck on the outside. The beauty is structural, and at the same time belongs to practical usefulness. The woodwork is unpainted, unvarnished oak. These cottages are the best object-lesson in the show, but they cost £420 the pair, or £210 each. Surely England ought to be able to house its people at this rate of expenditure; or, in other words, the labourer should be able to earn the moderate amount in wages which would enable him to rent or own such a cottage.

The provision of a bath for a workman's house should no longer be a difficulty. Many of the cottages have in kitchen or scullery, a bath, which, when not in use as such, can be turned over, and becomes a table or dresser. But a more satisfactory arrangement is that of the fold-up bath, which can be fitted where it is most convenient to use it in one of the bedrooms. When out of use it and the geyser, which supplies it with hot water, can be shut up in a small closet.

A satisfactory feature of many of the buildings is the use of substitutes for white lead paints, or, at best, the absence of any paint at all on the woodwork.

Some original designs we can hardly desire should be generally followed, particularly that of a cottage built of concrete in a polygonal or nearly circular form; rooms all on the ground, with a little hall in the centre. The use of concrete and cement may, in some places, be an economy, especially where the material used is the clinker obtained from the refuse destructor, as in the case of the exhibit of Mr. Brodie, the Liverpool City Engineer. Such buildings, we may hope, will not, however, invade rural England. They may be a dreadful necessity of town life for a time, and may serve a useful purpose in Liverpool; but art and beauty they have not, and cannot have; and they are, we sincerely hope, only a temporary expedient.

Apart from the Cheap Cottages Exhibition a good deal of building is in progress at Garden City, which promises better for the general appearance of the estate than the portion set apart for the cheap cottages. The bringing together of a large number of specimens of little houses does not result in a general picturesqueness of view. This will be remedied to some extent with the growth of trees and plants around them. There will, however, be this great advantage, that the convenience and durability of the buildings will be tested when they have been in actual use for some years. Some of them will bear the test of durability rather badly, and it will be important to determine among the many different kinds of buildings, and the various materials used, which wear well, and which lose their value with age.

The general laying out of the estate, the preservation of its features of natural beauty, the careful planning beforehand for the needs of the city, give great promise for its success, and already a number of permanent residents are occupying their houses, and others are coming as soon as houses are ready for them.

PRIESTLEY PRIME.

THE OMISSIONS OF RATIONALISM.

I PROPOSE to consider very briefly, in a short series of papers, some of the contentions of certain writers who have recently usurped the name of "Rationalists," from what I claim to be a more rational point of view than their own, for I shall take into account certain attributes of human nature which they unaccountably omit from their philosophy.

When I speak of Rationalists, it must be borne in mind I do not refer to all who might consider themselves, or who are, entitled to the name, but only a particular group of living writers whose works are issued by the Rationalist Press Association, and when I refer to "Reason" in these papers, I only use the term in the limited sense in which it is constantly used by these writers.

The official definition of this kind of Rationalism is as follows :—

"Rationalism may be defined as the mental attitude which unreservedly accepts the supremacy of reason and aims at establishing a system of philosophy and ethics verifiable by experience and independent of all arbitrary assumptions and authority."

There is very little to find fault with in this statement as long as the office of Reason is clearly understood; for by Reason is here meant the exercise of that faculty which is engaged in the verification of propositions and doctrines, or kindred tasks. In such work we may admit the supremacy of Reason, but we are not prepared to admit, as one of these writers says, that this Reason "should be supreme in every department of human activity." It is further claimed that all our mental, moral, and social improvements have been dependent upon the exercise of Reason and the consequent advances in knowledge to which this exercise has led. It appears to me that there are other things which have contributed to the mental, moral, and social progress of mankind which these writers have somehow overlooked; it is not by reasoning that man has always reached his highest attainments or performed his greatest deeds, nor is it always, if ever, by any logical process that moral and social improvements have been achieved. I shall endeavour to follow the Rationalist method and only maintain what I believe to be verifiable by experience, independent of all arbitrary assumptions and authority. But in thus exercising our reason it will, I think, itself teach us that it is not supreme in every department of human activity. Of the factors which have contributed to human development I propose to consider four of the chief, intentionally omitting any reference to others of a more transcendental character, about which opinions are divided. The four with which I shall deal are: Love, the moral sense, imagination, and religion; and I shall treat of these not from the theoretical but the practical or experimental point of view, not discussing their origin, but summarising the results of their operation.

I.—LOVE.

If there is one thing more than another that the "Rationalist" is always warning us to be on our guard against it is feeling or emotion. And yet I venture to think that it is emotion—or feeling—which has had more to do with the improvement of the human race than reason has had. Feeling was evolved earlier than reason, and has had more influence over man, let the "Rationalist" say what he will. And there is one emotion—love, or sympathy—which has made man what he is; it is sympathy, beneficence, care for others, which has done, perhaps, the most for man's moral and social improvement. Take some modern instances: the better treatment of criminals and prisoners of war, the abolition of slavery, the prevention of cruelty to children, and other endeavours to ameliorate the condition of mankind, all of which have taken place, relatively, within the last hundred years. Has the improvement been due to reason or to feeling? In our country the improvement, in a measure, has been made effective, in some cases, by legislation, but the demand for amelioration came first from those whom we call philanthropists, lovers of men; the appeal for reform in these and other directions did not come from rationalist thinkers, but from lovers. These reformers were emotional people, they did not reason, so much as they felt, the reasoners were often against them. Leaving the supernatural out of the question, was not the origin of Christianity due to love? Is not the New Testament full of love? Do we not know that it puts love before everything else, and that our moral and social improvement has been largely due to this teaching, to the spread of a loving and sympathetic spirit? But love is not "reason," nor logic, nor knowledge, nor any one of the things which Rationalists rate so highly—it is an emotion, which in their books the Rationalists often ignore or affect to despise.

But apart from Christianity and modern philanthropy, it is love which has civilised the human race. It is love which makes the human race differ from the animal world and has helped to develop human reason. The Rationalist assumes that all our moral and social improvements have been consequent upon our advances in knowledge, which, however, from the Rationalist point of view, are of rather recent date, and he needs to be reminded that, as a rule, the improvement in the moral and social conditions of our race preceded, and did not follow, advances in knowledge. There were great men before Agamemnon, and mankind had made considerable advances in civilisation and happiness before the beginning of the nineteenth century. Indeed as man has been improving since pre-historic times, ever since he emerged from the brute stage, it is clear that something beside reason must have been at work. And this we must find in what the Rationalist would call the irrational part of human nature, in love, in sympathy—in which justice and beneficence have their roots—in imagination, in the creation of ideals, in hope, which all blend together in religion. The foundation of all moral, and consequently of all social, improvement is love. Love began, according to some, in the love of man and woman, but according to others in maternal love, in the love of the mother for her child; and this love influenced the development of the human race before reason and knowledge. It is a far cry from pre-historic mothers to modern times, yet our greatest social improvements are due to develope d sympathy which had so remote and humble a beginning.

The Rationalists can easily exercise their ingenuity in picking holes in modern theology—a very moderate amount of intelligence is sufficient for that—but they are not to be excused for ignoring the influence of the greatest Christian virtue. Not that Christians were the first to discover the power of love, for, according to Plato, love is the civiliser and the saviour, the cause of all our good, the curer of all our ills.

"It is he who divests us of all feelings of alienation and fills us with those of intimacy—introducing mildness and banishing harshness of manners, the friendly giver of all good will, the non-giver of enmity; gracious to the good, looked up to by the wise, admired by the gods; in labour, in fear, in wishes and in speech the pilot, the encourager, the bystander, the best saviour. For to me men appear to be utterly insensible to the power of love, for he is of all the gods the most friendly to man, and the healer of those wounds which, being healed, there would be the greatest happiness to the human race." (The Banquet.)

Call love a mere emotion—then according even to Plato it is this emotion which has done the most for the improvement of mankind and to which we must still look for the increase of human happiness; love is an impelling force, which reason is not. Reason can only guide and direct, it cannot move.

Love, it was taught by the Stoics, begins in the family, then it extends to comrades, to members of the same tribe or nation as tribes join into states, and finally it embraces all mankind. Some Rationalists ridicule the idea of loving one's neighbour as one's self, still more that of man loving his enemy. Yet it is far from inconceivable that other men, whether neighbours or enemies, may be treated with regard, and, when opportunity occurs, with consideration and kindness. The first step is to abstain from wilful injury and to show justice and mercy towards them. The love of their neighbour is shown every day by philanthropists without regard to the nationality or other circumstances of that neighbour, if his condition is such as to appeal to their sympathies; and one of the most remarkable features of modern times is the growth of a certain regard and consideration towards enemies. This has been manifested in recent wars, in the care taken to avoid injuring non-combatants, especially women and children, in the care of the enemy's sick and wounded, who are spared unnecessary pain, and protected as far as possible from further injury, and in the preservation of the lives of prisoners and the provision made for their support. This is the outcome of generous and humane feelings—not of "Reason." It would be more logical (rational) to cause the enemy as much damage and pain as possible, to preserve no life, and to use every means to reduce him to submission; but feelings of humanity prevail and set limits to the injury allowed to be inflicted even upon enemies; and once the actual strife is over, men, who in obedience to orders, have been aiming at one another's destruction, fraternise together and delight in mutual acts of kindness; it is a remarkable advance, but it can scarcely be said to be due to what the Rationalist calls Reason.

It is, then, the love implanted in human nature and developed sympathy springing from love which are the civilising, refining, softening influences, the saving power in life. But love is not the outcome of the exercise of reason, nor due to advances in knowledge; according to the Rationalist, it is most irrational.

Love is a word of many meanings, or at least shades of meaning. In its full sense it is applied to the most intense and close attachment between two human beings; but when we speak of the love of our neighbour or of our enemy it cannot have precisely the same meaning: it is more diffused and less intense, and may be described as regard, sympathy, pity, or compassion. It varies in degree as it is called forth by different persons under different circumstances; but it is of the nature of love in all cases. It may aim at ministering to the needs of mind and body of others, it may aim at lessening suffering and relieving distress, it may aim at the positive increase of the happiness of those who are neither suffering nor distressed.

snfficient sympathy, not of reason, is the cause of a large part of human woes; they are due to the effort of men to attain their own objects and ends without regard for or sympathy with others. Even sufficient sympathy to lead men to be just to one another would lessen the selfishness which Burns lamented when he wrote:

"Man's inhumanity to man,
Makes countless thousands mourn."

If men had only sufficient regard for others not to allow their own self-interest to disregard the happiness of others how much misery would be prevented? While if they had more sympathy not only would they abstain from causing pain, but they would do all they could to relieve it; and carried further it would positively aim at increasing happiness. But this which might happen is that which has happened. "The chief agent," says Herbert Spencer, "in the removal of circumstances which cause pain must be sympathy"—and we may assert that the chief agent hitherto has been sympathy.

Some of the greatest thinkers of modern times, who, like Herbert Spencer, were detached from all recognised forms of religion, agree in this, and with Plato declare that love is "the healer of those wounds, which, being healed, there would be the greatest happiness to the human race" —they may call it by different names, humanity, altruism, sympathy, pity, but they all mean the same thing. It is not professed Christian teachers alone who assert this, but men like Rousseau, Adam Smith, Comte, J. S. Mill, Schopenhauer and Tolstoy. The improvement in the moral and social condition of mankind has not been due to reason, or not to reason directly, but to feeling which the Rationalists ignore. Reason may sometimes be needed as a guide, but the motive force is love.

A BOOK ABOUT SOCRATES.

A very scholarly little volume, each page a tissue of good workmanship, has been written by the Rev. J. T. Forbes, of Glasgow, upon the life and teaching of Socrates.* Introductory chapters sketch the political and social conditions which surrounded the great teacher, and illustrate (with copious reference to Æschylus and Sophocles and Euripides) the moral or ethical side of the religion of his fellow-countrymen. A chapter upon pre-Socratic reflection is very well done, reviewing the course of Greek thinking from Thales to the Sophists. Speaking of the early philosophers, the writer says: "The greatness of the pioneers of thought is not to be estimated by their occasional forecasts of explanations, for the establishment of which ages of investigation were necessary, but by their faith in the rationality of the world." The following words indicate the scope of the main enterprise of the book:—"By the use, mainly, of such criteria as the Aristotelian testimony, the artistic verisimilitude of the Xenophontic and Platonic portraits, and the study of the various developments of the Socratic philosophy, a view [of the teaching of Socrates] at once self-consistent and faithful to critically sifted testimony may be gained." We realise as we read that here is a very thorough academic fulfilment of the programme. The author assiduously sets to work to disentangle Socrates' thread from Plato's, and there is no question as to the ability and sincerity he brings to the task. The treatment is academic, but the reader who does not care for philosophical minutiæ will be able to profit by much interesting discussion—the suggestive account of the Sophists, for example, or the sections on the relationship between virtue and knowledge. Mr. Forbes holds that Socrates "bent himself to the work of establishing a reflective morality. . . . It remains his greatest praise that through him more than through any other Greek thinker the individual [as distinguished from the 'citizen'] came into his moral kingdom."

Mr. Forbes exhibits also the value of Socrates' services to intellectual sincerity. His method of cross-questioning, whatever may be urged against it, "did its work. It shook minds out of their self-complacent slumber, and started reflection. It made men see that the ideas that led them must bear the play of their intellect, that the mind must learn to challenge claimants for its allegiance."

P. E. Richards.

At the Bible Christian Conference the following resolution was adopted: "That we regret the increase of juvenile smoking, and recommend that we do our utmost to counteract the evil by suggesting to our Sunday Schools the establishment of Anti-cigarette Leagues." The object is good, but it is a pity to bring in the "anti." Why not a Clean-breath League, a Physical Development League, a league whose very name should suggest something more than a criticism of other people's cigarettes?

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Carlisle.—For a period of twelve months the members of the Viaduct Unitarian Church have had to contend with all the difficulties incidental to the lack of a settled minister. But the Church is a Church, not a mere audience, and it has come through without suffering, owing to the steady enthusiasm of its workers. The congregation, which is almost entirely composed of wage-earners, has been largely indebted to the services of lay preachers from Newcastle. A new era in its history was opened on Sunday last, when Rev. A. Thornhill, B.A. (late of Manchester College) began his ministry. Mr. Thornhill preached morning and evening upon "Our Principles" and "Our Plea" to good congregations, expounding the ways of approach, through the intellect, the emotions, the conscience, to the presence chamber of God. The induction services are fixed for September 25, when Dr. Drummond will charge the minister, and the Rev. W. C. Bowie the congregation.

Loughboro'.—A welcome meeting to the Rev. W. H. Burgess and his wife was held here on Saturday. Wm. More, Esq., J.P., presided and gave a cordial greeting to the new minister on behalf of the congregation. Mr. F. Winser, J.P., spoke some encouraging words as a lay member of the North Midland Association. The Rev. Wm. Lindsay gave the welcome on behalf of the neighbouring ministers, and Mr. Bryan and Mr. W. J. Douse spoke for the Lay Preachers' Union, which is co-operating with Mr. Burgess in the work of the joint pastorate. Miss Gittins brought the greetings of Leicester friends. Friendly letters were read from the Revs. G. von Petzold, E. I. Fripp, and T. J. Jenkins, and from Mr. Harrop White, president of the North Midland Association.

Manchester: Moss Side.—The members of the Moss Side Literary and Debating Society arranged an outing for some 200 children from the Renshaw-street, Bradford, and Collyhurst Missions. This was successfully carried out on August 19, when the children were taken to Heaton Park, where they greatly enjoyed the games and the substantial tea provided.

Park Lane Chapel (near Wigan).—On Sunday afternoon last a tablet commemorative of the recent restoration of the above chapel was unveiled by the Rev. George Fox, for many years minister of the congregation. The tablet was designed by Mr. Arthur Britton, of Park Lane. The following is the inscription: "Park Lane Chapel; erected 1697; repaired 1826; renovated 1871; restored 1904. This tablet, recording the above events, was placed here by the generosity of Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., of Liverpool, A.D. 1905. William Britton, treasurer; Peter Gorton, secretary." A cordial vote of thanks was given to Sir J. T. Brunner for his generous gift.

Swansea Unitarian Church.—The annual Choir "Pic-nic" took place on Bank Holiday, the 7th inst. The day was fine, and the party, comprising over twenty, were driven through the pretty Peninsula of Gower to the village of Rhossilly, near the celebrated "Wormshead." The Sunday-school outing was made on Thursday, the 17th inst., and was held at Sketty, in a delightfully situated field, kindly lent for the occasion by Mr. and Mrs. John Rosser. The party, numbering about 150, returned in the evening, after a very enjoyable time. Both these functions had been delayed, pending the return of the Rev. Tudor Jones from Germany. Together with Mrs. Jones he was most gladly welcomed and warmly congratulated on his great and well-deserved success at the University of Jena.

Taunton.—The congregation has to regret an accident which might have been even more serious to its minister, Rev. A. Homer. Mr. Homer was bicycling in the town and carrying his little son on the handle bars, when a collision took place with a motor-car. Both father and son were badly bruised, and the child's shoulder was fractured; but friends will learn with sympathy and thankfulness that both are recovering very well. Mr. Homer hopes to preach on August 27, after an absence from his pulpit of two Sundays.

"Never writer wrote with deeper conviction than George Gissing; every sentence has come straight from the heart, and this fact alone, apart from its artistic merit, gives a poignancy and strength to his work which separates it at once from the common ruck of novel-writing. These books are terrible arraignments of life—their peculiar characteristic is this poignancy, this painting of life at its moments of unbearable crisis. Between misery and despair lies a whole world of difference; misery is what can be endured—despair is the unbearable, and George Gissing is the spokesman of Despair." —Jane H. Findlater, in the National Review.

"Fate set him for his life-task the study of the swarming miseries of our human ant-heaps and the pettinesses of our mortal nature. 'The Nether World,' 'New Grub Street,' 'Demos,' 'The Odd Women,' 'The Whirlpool,'—these are all monumental titles, mighty themes. None of his contemporaries in England—only Zola and Tolstoi anywhere else—even attempted to wrestle with such big canvases, and if Gissing did not always rise to the height of his great argument, the conception was at least Herculean."—I. Zangwill, in To-Day.

THE INTERNATIONAL.

THE meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers have been held this week under the happiest circumstances. These lines, indeed, have to be written early in the week, and there has been somewhat broken weather; but that could not mar the cordiality of the great gathering, the hearty welcome accorded to their visitors from many lands by our friends of the Liberal Faith in Geneva, or the great interest of the proceedings. Fully five hundred members have taken part in the week's proceedings, of whom over 220 came from England, and over 30 from America, while Switzerland was, of course, well represented, and that other cradle of liberty and sturdy independence, Holland, sent a considerable contingent. France and Germany, Belgium and Italy, Hungary and India were also among the countries represented, among the chief representatives from France being the venerable Professor ALBERT RÉVILLE and his son, Professor JEAN RÉVILLE, and from Germany Professor PFLEIDERER, of Berlin.

A fuller account of those present we shall be able to furnish next week, and also a consecutive record of the proceedings. From the brief programme which appeared in these columns a fortnight ago, our readers will have seen how rich was the promise of interest in the varied contributions, and what delightful entertainment to vary the strenuous work of the Council was provided by our Geneva hosts. It would be ungrateful not to record at once our warmest thanks to Professor MONTET, the working President, and to Dr. ROCHAT, the secretary of the local committee, with other willing helpers, who undertook, and most happily carried out, such arduous labours, involving the sacrifice of much of their summer vacation, to secure the success of the meetings and the comfort and pleasure of their guests. We have memories of the first meeting of the Council in London, and the second in Amsterdam, which set a high standard of what is hoped for in such gatherings, and to these we now gratefully add those of the third meeting in Geneva.

As it is impossible to report the proceedings this week, we are very glad to be allowed to publish at once the papers contributed by our three English brethren —Professor CARPENTER'S on "The Recent Progress of New Testament Study in Great Britain," the Rev. W. G. TARRANT'S on "The Relations of Liberal Religion towards Social Reforms," and the Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE'S on "The Number, Organisation, and Condition of Unitarian Churches in Great Britain and Ireland." Next week, in addition to a record of the proceedings of the week, we hope to be able to publish the sermon preached on Thursday morning in the Cathedral of St. Pierre by Dr. MINOT J. SAVAGE, of New York, the third sermon of the International Council, following those in French by M. le Pasteur E. ROBERTY, of Paris, on Monday evening, and in German by the Rev. Professor K. FURRER, of Zürich, on Wednesday morning.

It was a special grace allowed to the large English contingent that they were able to hold a Sunday afternoon service of their own in the Chapel of the Maccabees, which proved to be really a part of the Cathedral itself. The lofty fifteenth century chapel was crowded with a congregation of some two hundred worshippers, and our English hymns of thanksgiving and aspiration, led by the fine organ and the Cathedral organist, filled its spaces with glorious harmony. The service, to which there is further reference in our notes "About Geneva," was impressively conducted by the Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, and the Rev. JOSEPH WOOD was the preacher. Close by, just across the road, was the quaint old chapel in which, three hundred and fifty years ago, John Knox for some time preached, and under the pulpit, in the Cathedral itself, still stood, as a memento of the past, the stiff-backed chair of Calvin. But on the wall over the pulpit in the Chapel of the Maccabees were inscribed the words of good omen—"Post Tenebras Lux." As the service proceeded, and the eloquent words of the preacher fell upon our ears, the thanksgiving must have arisen in many hearts that, after the darkness, in which there had been so much confusion, suffering, and wrong, the light had indeed begun to shine. That hope and thankful confidence the proceedings of the week have done much to confirm.

ABOUT GENEVA.

III.

OUR quiet Sunday at Argentière seems now a long way off. There followed the beautiful drive to Finhaut, of which the latter part, climbing up again from Châtelard, is more to be enjoyed by those who walk, even up that laborious and steep ascent, by reason of the narrowness of the zig-zag road, looking sheer down into the depth of the rocky valley far below. Then another glorious day among the hills, up to the Col de la Gueulaz and the Six Jeur (6,745 feet in height), but ending with a terrific thunderstorm and hurricane of wind, from which we were, happily, able to shelter; though afterwards, as we made our way home, we found several great fir-trees blown down across our path, and other friends, whom we had found at Finhaut, were less fortunate in escaping the drenching and battering of the storm. Next day, in torrents of rain, down from Finhaut into the Rhone valley, and then to Glion, under a clearing sky. But, alas, our two days at Glion, looking down upon the lovely lake, were chiefly in cloud and disappointing rain, though one gleam of sunshine up at Les Avants showed the peak of Jaman, above the moving cloud. But, for the most part, we had to be content to dream of what those two days might have been. And so, on Friday (August 25), back by the lake to Geneva, in delicious sunshine, but a haze which, on that evening, would not let us see Mont Blanc.

So we were in time to meet our large English party on their arrival in Geneva early on Saturday morning. They had a perfect crossing on Friday from Newhaven to Dieppe; and, though afterwards there was rain upon the way, brilliant sunshine welcomed them to the city for our International week.

On Sunday morning not a few of us found our way up on to the long ridge of Salève, from which one looks down upon Geneva and the lake, and, on the other side, into the heart of the great mountains, and southward to the charming lake of Annecy. Walking up from Annemasse, some of us picked wild cyclamen in the woods on the southern slope, and, in the meadows, on the way down to Veyrier, autumn crocus.

Then, from the mountain height (even Salève is higher than Ben Nevis) to the heights of worship, by no unnatural transition. It was a sunny afternoon, and at five o'clock we were permitted to gather in the Chapel of the Maccabees for a special English service of our own.

The Cathedral of St. Pierre, as we have already noted, crowns the highest point of the old city, and the way up to it is steep on every side. Its curious composite Gothic towers form a striking object in the view of the city, and it has a quite incongruous classic front. But the interior is by no means unimpressive, with its lofty nave; and the historic interest, especially when associated with the thought of our services and the sermons preached this week from Calvin's pulpit, is of the greatest.

The Cathedral, dating from the tenth, but much altered in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, has recently been thoroughly restored. The Chapel of the Maccabees was built against the south-west wall of the nave by Cardinal de Brogny in 1406 (on the tiles near the chief entrance one may still see the Papal keys and the Imperial Eagle), and was restored in 1874-88. It has entrances separate from those of the Cathedral, though one opens upon the classic portico at the west end. The Gothic windows are lofty, and the whole impression is of a true shrine of worship. Over the pulpit the bare wall bears the inscription (as mentioned above), "Post Tenebras Lux." At our Sunday service the chapel was crowded by a congregation variously estimated, but numbering probably about two hundred, and the singing was of the heartiest. The Cathedral organist threw himself with great skill into the spirit of the English hymnody.

The service was conducted by the Rev. Charles Hargrove. It opened with the familiar, ever-welcome hymn of thanksgiving, "O worship the King," and, after a collect, the whole congregation joined in the Lord's Prayer.

The lessons were from Isaiah lx., "Arise, shine, for thy light is come," and Acts xvii., the address of Paul at Athens. Then the hymn, "O God, the Rock of Ages," and after the prayer that other ever-welcome hymn of Thomas Hornblower Gill's—

We come unto our fathers' God;
Their rock is our salvation;
The eternal arms, their dear abode,
We make our habitation.
We bring thee, Lord, the praise they brought;
We seek thee, as thy saints have sought
In every generation.

The sermon was preached by the Rev. Joseph Wood, from the text, Isaiah lx., part of the last verse: "The little one shall become a thousand." That was a chapter, he said, filled with the march and the music of triumph. Its leading thought was of the light everlasting and the glory of the Lord. It was a chapter which it thrilled the heart to hear. Its promise was for the pioneers of truth. It had not been the big things of the world that had been the most enduring, but things of the spirit, of faith and truth. There had been great empires in the past, but their influence was as nothing compared with that of some of the smaller states, Jerusalem, Athens, Florence, Geneva. Of Jerusalem it might indeed be said that "the little one" had become a thousand, though not in the way that was expected; and it might be questioned whether Rome itself had ever touched the thought of Europe as the cities of Dante and Calvin had done. From such considerations they might themselves take comfort. The great forces of Orthodoxy were against them. The Free Church Federation would have nothing to do with them; they had no popularity with the masses, but were only small companies scattered here and there. But majorities were no test of truth, and, though it might not be in their time, the triumph of the truth would yet come, and their fidelity would make for it. They must be eager for the growth of the good cause, and the time must come when that which was best would be universal. The Liberal Protestant movement in Europe was at present "the little one," and there were some who thought it hardly existed; but the International Council was making them aware that they had sympathisers in many lands, greater in number than they had supposed They were not all called Unitarians, and there had been different points of departure, yet it was one movement, and Professor Jean Réville's admirable account of Liberal Protestantism might stand for an account of English and American Unitarianism. That day they were met in Geneva. It was unique, startling, and in some respects dramatic. In no city of the world could their meeting be more indicative of the change coming over human thought. In that city Calvin gave the Augustinian theology a new lease of life; his powerful genius impressed it on nearly all of the reformed churches, and it took his name. It had dominated the most energetic races, but now Calvinism seemed to be an almost negligible quantity. From the pulpit where Calvin preached Dr. Minot Savage was to speak of a truth and a cause which to Calvin would be detestable. Truly Servetus might say: "I am this day avenged." Yet, if Calvin were alive to-day, he would not be a Calvinist of the sixteenth century; and they must remember, in spite of his terrible theology, that he was one of Europe's greatest minds, of noblest purity and strongest will, who had made Geneva as a city set on a hill, the moral capital of one half of Christendom and a great frontier fortress against Rome. The attempt to bind Calvinism on the churches for ever had happily failed. Its doctrine of God and man was undermined by the new thought of the world, and now in Calvinistic churches doctrine was preached at which he would have shuddered. The Reformation was a protest against finality, and a new Reformation was now in progress. In conclusion the preacher used as a striking and beautiful parable the glory of the Alpine heights, which for centuries had been unknown, until an adventurous spirit here and there had penetrated their fastnesses, and then in time the solitary path had become a beaten track, and multitudes had entered in to share in the glories discovered to their race by the pioneers. So it was with the purest, loftiest truths of religion, which now lifted themselves like the great mountains into the heavens, to be the strength and joy of all alike. They might say of the truth as they now held it, that after long waiting it was beginning to be appreciated and understood. Their company might still be a little one, but they met in the sure and certain hope of the day when that little one would become a thousand!

The light was already fading in the chapel as the sermon drew to a close, but the last hymn, Samuel Longfellow's, "One holy Church of God appears," was so well known that it could be happily sung to the end, and after the Benediction we came out into the beautiful evening light again. It was good to have been there, and the kindness of the authorities in allowing us the privilege of such a service in such a place was keenly felt.

One thought came to us afterwards in pondering the preacher's parable. The once solitary paths are now beaten tracks, in danger, perhaps, of being vulgarised. The greatest glories of the Alps are accessible to the multitude, but are they not often profaned by a noisy, selfish spirit in the crowd? So with those pure and lofty truths of religion, expressed in the spirit of the pure humanity of Jesus. They are in danger of being treated as common-places, Our part, in the cause of Liberal Religion, is not simply to make the truth known as matter of reasoning and words, but to live in its presence, to enter into all the depth of its meaning, to be with God in profound humility, in the close bonds of our helpful human fellowship, knowing that it is His truth and not our own, that we are to live and speak for Him and declare His glory and the blessedness of them that trust in Him. Then there will be no commonplace, no noisy conceit in those who take the great words of religion upon their lips, and the glory of the Lord will be upon our path, as upon the pure snows of the Alpine heights, in a beauty beyond the power of words to utter, and a joy which knows that it is folded in the care of Eternal Love. Then will men listen to our word, which will be indeed the word of the Lord to them, and they will say, these are a people who have a sure hold on truth. Depth of religious life, and not simply breadth of thought, must be our aim, and the constant watchword of our churches, as of the International Council in its larger fellowship.

Monday evening saw the opening of the third biennial meeting of the International Council, with the Cathedral service; but of this we must reserve our record for the complete report next week.

RECENT ENGLISH STUDY OF THE ORIGINS OF CHRISTIANITY.*

BY REV. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A.

I AM asked to give to this Congress a brief account of recent English work on the New Testament. It is, of course, impossible to cover so wide a field in twenty-five minutes. I must be content to point out tendencies rather than tabulate results; and, inasmuch as the most interesting questions for us gather round the Gospels and the life of Jesus, I shall limit myself to currents of thought and methods of study upon this high theme. The two great dictionaries of the Bible—one edited by Dr. Hastings, the other by Professor Cheyne and Dr. Sutherland Black, the completion of which falls within this century—have occupied so large an amount of the activity of our scholars that the independent product of the last few years is not very large. But it is hardly possible to over-estimate the general progress which these two works register. The editors of Enc. Bibl. were were obliged, it is true, to invoke the aid of a distinguished scholar from Switzerland for the advanced treatment of the Gospels, and the personalities connected with them. But both dictionaries rest quite frankly on the historic view of the Old Testament. Those who recall the vehemence with which Colenso was assailed in England forty years ago will realise how completely English theology has changed its position with respect to the inspiration and authority of the Scriptures. With many natural hesitations and inevitable reserves, the measure meted out to the Old Testament is being slowly applied to the New. "It should be frankly said," declared the distinguished leader of Anglican studies three years ago, "that those who are engaged upon the criticism of the New Testament in this country are agreed in the principle that it must be approached like any other book. Sometimes English critics are taunted with not doing this, but the taunt is not well founded. From a rather wide acquaintance with those who are employed in this work, I can take upon myself to say that they have an absolutely sincere and honest intention to look the facts in the face as they are."† We must not expect to advance too quickly; and if Mr. Conybeare takes one view of the intrusion of the Baptismal formula in Matt. xxviii. 19, in the pages of the Hibbert Journal (1902, p. 102), and Dr. Chase another (Journ. of Theol. Studies, July, 1905), we are confident that to both these eminent scholars the matter is simply and solely (to use Dr. Chase's words) "a matter of evidence."

We must pass over the very interesting contributions to the history of the Gospel text made by Mr. Burkitt in his recent edition of the Curetonian version of the Four Gospels,‡ and the discussions which have gathered round the fragments of sayings ascribed to Jesus, in the papyri discovered by Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt. These are the property of all scholars. More interesting to Continental friends may be the efforts lately made to bring some results of the study of the Gospels within easier reach of popular apprehension. This has been done alike by translation and by commentary. In "The New Testament in Modern Speech" (1903) the late Dr. Weymouth contributed a version founded on his well-known "Resultant Greek Testament," and designed to express the sense in present-day English; and the editors of the "Twentieth Century New Testament" have gone still further along the same path—in both cases with great gain, in particular, to the understanding of the apostolic letters. Far more elaborate, with a richer apparatus of learning, is the "Historical New Testament" of the brilliant Scotch divine, Dr. Moffatt. To a fresh translation of the books (arranged in the order of their composition) he adds introductions packed full of knowledge. Tables of literature and history, and admirable expositions of modern critical opinion, supply the reader with materials for his own judgment. The Fourth Gospel is placed between 95 and 115 A.D.; the Pastoral Epistles (on a Pauline nucleus), James and Jude, follow in the first quarter of the second century; 2 Peter is dated anywhere between 130 and 170 A.D. There is no timidity here; but the writer happily combines with his science a warm glow of religious life. Even into popular commentaries the newer methods are finding their way. The volumes on the Gospels are among the most cautious in the series known as the "Century Bible"; yet even they are not wholly indifferent to the modern treatment of the problems of eschatology. The discourses of the Fourth Gospel are no longer regarded as a reproduction of the actual words of Jesus. Thucydides or Livy, we are reminded, employed the direct form, "even when drawing largely on his imagination in the composition" of the speeches of his heroes.* The historic method has made large inroads on older conceptions of inspiration. The devout and clear-eyed scholar, Professor A. W. Peake, is fully aware of the significance of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and Mr. Anderson Scott does not shrink from applying the researches of Bousset and Gunkel to the Apocalypse.†

Behind these efforts at popularisation lie the more learned labours which appeal primarily to the student. With singular patience and thoroughness (but without producing any widespread conviction) Dr. Edwin Abbott continues his efforts to trace many of the divergencies of the Gospels to a common Hebrew original, on which the earliest of our Gospels (Mark) was founded. The problem of Mark's sources has not been investigated by any English scholar along the lines of either Johannes Weiss or Richard Hoffmann. In his valuable "Synopsis of the Gospels" (1903), where a prodigious amount of material is brought together, the Rev. Arthur Wright distinguishes between successive literary stages in Mark first, second, and third; isolates the Matthean logia; and even attempts to classify in groups the peculiar materials of Luke. The significant limits of English theology are, however, most clearly displayed in the two learned commentaries on Mark (belonging respectively to the right and left wing) by Professor Swete, of Cambridge, and Professor Menzies, of St. Andrews. The exact learning and the grammatical materials of the first exhibit the special excellence of the Cambridge school. But historical difficulties hardly seem for the author even to exist. In the absence of documentary evidence he cannot bring himself to attach any serious consideration to the view that materials from some other document may have been incorporated into the great eschatological discourse (Mark xiii.) on the Mount of Olives. The fact that the Son of Man has not yet appeared in clouds of glory, obliges him to play fast and loose with the meaning of the word γενεά (generation); and, under the theological conception that the Eternal Word "cannot be ignorant of this or any other mystery of the divine will," he is compelled to explain that the Son had no knowledge of the date of the Parousia "in his human consciousness." It is, however, characteristic of Dr. Swete's anxiety to keep close to the facts as he understands them, that he can remark concerning the Messiahship (within the limits of Mark): "There is no indication that anyone in Galilee, while the ministry was in progress, stumbled upon the truth, or that Jesus during this period either publicly or privately declared himself to be the Christ" (p. xci.). How this is to be reconciled with the presentation in the Fourth Gospel the learned commentator does not inform us. From this theological control the Scotch divine has entirely escaped. His object is primarily historical; He prints the Greek text, but of verbal criticism or philological remark he is sparing. He seeks to interpret the narrative with the full consciousness that many of its elements belong not to the localities of Palestine, but to the sphere of religious imagination. He realises how many forces of current belief, expectation, and enthusiasm, have shaped and moulded the primitive apostolic reminiscence. He sees how "the face of Jesus as he actually was and spoke, strove and suffered, lived and trusted and hoped, has been to a large extent hidden for us by the theology we have inherited"; and he shares the conviction—which animates so many of the best scholars of the Continent—that "as earnest and truthful studies reveal again his features, his spirit will enter with fresh energy into the life of his followers."

This is in truth the real aim of all the higher English Gospel investigation. It lies at the back of the writings of Professor Gardner, and it is one of the hopeful signs of the times that his admirable lectures, "A Historic View of the New Testament," may be bought for sixpence at almost any railway bookstall. Meanwhile, a new estimate of Jesus is entering English Judaism. It gleamed a few years ago in Mr. Jacobs' interesting sketch, "As Others Saw Him"; it has received penetrating expression from the pen of Mr. C. G. Montefiore (through whom we hope to learn so much more) in the current number of the Hibbert Journal. Within the pale of the Church, however, the problems of the Gospel narratives bear another aspect; and Canon Sanday could remark a little while ago that "the criticism which lies outside the literary sphere is at the present moment rather in a state of flux; neither the questions to be asked, nor the answers to them, stand out as yet with sufficient clearness."* Only slowly does this great scholar feel his way. Nevertheless, in his "Outlines of the Life of Christ" (reproduced from Hastings' "Dictionary of the Bible"), he shows clearly that he is moving. The editors of Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible," as late as the enlarged edition of 1893, were content to reprint the article on Jesus Christ by the late Dr. Thomson, Archbishop of York, who had remarked that the Temptation was "the trial of One who could not possibly have fallen." "This makes a complete conception of temptation impossible," added his Grace, naïvely, "for minds wherein temptation is always associated with the possibility of sin." Very different is the treatment of Professor Sanday: "It is impossible for us to understand it in the sense of understanding how what we call temptation could affect the Son of God: it could not have touched him at all unless he had been also and no less really Son of Man." The effort to see things from different points of view is conspicuous throughout, as in the frequent emphasis on the different values of different strata in the Gospel narratives. Yet the result is too often an unsatisfactory compromise. On the one hand we are told of the current belief in demons, in so far as "it was shared by Jesus, that there was a certain circle of ideas which Jesus accepted in becoming man, in the same way in which he accepted a particular grammar and vocabulary." In other words, this belief showed him to be to that extent a man of his time like Peter or Paul. But that inference might be too bold, and we accordingly read in the next paragraph: "But it is still a question which is probably by no means so clear, whether, allowing for its temporary and local character, the language then used did not contain an important element of truth. The physical and moral spheres are perhaps more intimately connected than we suppose." It would be easy to cite other instances of uncertain judgment, such as the Mission of the Seventy, or the darkness at the crucifixion. But it must suffice to remark, with respect to the miracles, that the Gospel miracles can no longer be reserved in a class apart. Professor Sanday has, indeed, observed elsewhere: "The belief in miracles is surely one that God has permitted—we may even say encouraged—on a very large scale. It must have a place in his eternal purposes. So that the problem rather is to find out what that place is than simply to discard it."† But when a devout Buddhist relates that the Teacher fed five hundred brethren at once out of an old woman's basket of cakes, and had enough over to supply the wants of the poor around; or that a pious disciple walked across the waters of a river to hear his Lord preach, and, when he was sinking in the waves in mid-stream, found them once more solid through an act of faith, the Christian Professor can see no room for these wonders in the Providential Order, though the reverence and trust which live in such tales are precisely analogous to the motives of our Gospel stories.

Most interesting, perhaps, in this respect is the contrast between the theologian of Christ Church and the Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, in their treatment of the Johannine Gospel. "The Inquiry into the Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel," issued two years ago by Dr. Drummond, won sincere admiration from Anglican divines. With exact scholarship and minute investigation, the evidence, alike internal and external, was patiently surveyed. "In literary questions," said the author, "we cannot look for demonstration; the result, therefore, is an estimate of probabilities." Dr. Drummond declared himself, as is well known, in favour of the apostolic authorship. But, while Dr. Sanday uses the Fourth Gospel as the real basis for the historic life of Jesus, since it is (in his judgment) the only Apostolic record, Dr. Drummond is unable to regard it as a narrative of actual events. He may prefer its date for the Last Supper; so does Dr. Abbott, who rejects the traditional view of its origin. But he has no hesitation in following the Synoptic account of the clearing of the Temple, and he frankly treats the raising of Lazarus as a symbol and not a fact. The book is to be accepted more in the spirit than in the letter. "It is an interpretation of a life already known from other sources."*

Throughout a large part of the work we seem to wander amid majestic thoughts and expositions, but hardly to come into contact with a living man; and, if we analyse our own state of mind as we read, we discover that he who is present to us, and whose grace and truth we feel, is the speaker of the parables and the beatitudes, the friend of publicans and sinners; the man who proffered tender encouragement to the penitent, and rebuked self-satisfied hypocrisy; who went about doing good, careless of his own ease and comfort; who prayed alone upon the mountains; who loved the fields and the flowers; who blessed the little children, and sympathised with the falling sparrow. It is to him that we cheerfully accord the greatness and the high communion in which our gospel finds the secret of his power; it is with him that we wish to be in vital union, that we too may have the spirit of a divine humanity; it is as coming from him that his words of promise and of peace so deeply move us, and it is because he has made his way into our hearts that we are not offended at hearing that he is the light of the world, and the giver of life, for so our illumined and quickened hearts have said.

Some such view as this in varying forms is forcing itself on those who still retain the Church tradition. The high-minded Dean of Westminster, for instance, whose little book on the "Study of the Gospels" is an admirable model of elementary exposition, confronts the claims raised by Jesus at the beginning of his ministry in John with the view of "gradual development" offered by the Synoptics. "No contrast," he declares, "can possibly be more startling than this, and we are constrained to ask: Can both these representations be historically true? or is one the simple and natural story of the facts and the other the poetic creation of an ideal life of Christ?" Even more emphatically do the differences in the representation of the locality and duration of the ministry demand "that we should either dismiss the Fourth Gospel from serious historic consideration, or else largely re-model the general framework which we had constructed from the reading of the Synoptic Gospels."* When such alternatives are presented to us by one of the highest dignitaries of the Church, it is evident that great changes are at hand.

For a time, indeed, a small but somewhat noisy group of the High Church party meets the advance of criticism with the pleas of M. Loisy† without realising how completely they thus undermine their own historic base. More significant is the fact that belief in the Virgin Birth is seriously shaken. Dr. Sanday has recognised that "Matthew i. and ii. appear to belong to that portion of the First Gospel that is latest and least certain."‡ If the opening of the First Gospel may be thus surrendered, why should that of the Third be retained? No one raises his voice in defence of the marvellous birth of John the Baptist, yet it rests on precisely the same authority so far as Luke is concerned. The Lucan story of the Nativity is traced by Dr. Sanday to the Mother herself, through Joanna, the wife of Herod's steward Chuza; but, in the total absence of all evidence, we cannot be surprised to hear Dr. Sanday "acknowledge the right of those who plead that this article of faith was held in reserve and not included in the public teaching either of our Lord himself or (for some time, we may believe) of the Apostles."§

Meantime, bolder spirits see clearly that the subject cannot be separated from the much larger theme of the whole Messianic idea. It has been reserved for another Oxford scholar to expound with uncompromising lucidity some of the questions suggested by recent research. In the remarkable lecture addressed a year ago by Professor Cheyne to the English Churchmen's Union,‖ this fearless investigator analyses the fourfold Christian belief summed up in the doctrines of the Virgin Birth, the Descent into the nether-world, the Resurrection, and the Ascension. Starting from the researches of Gunkel into the mythic background of Rev. xii., he argues that the popular Messianic belief "was probably much more definite than we might suppose from most of the Jewish religious literature." The occurrence of the word parthenos (virgin) in the Greek version of the Immanuel prophecy (Isaiah vii.) cannot be regarded as the germ out of which the narrative of Matthew was developed, for it is shrewdly observed that it needs itself to be explained. The cause suggested is the existence of a widespread mythic tradition respecting a solar deity, which may be traced in Arabian, Babylonian, and Egyptian cycles. The descent into Hades is only a Christianised version of the conflict of the Divine Redeemer with the dragon of chaos and lawlessness. In the Resurrection and Ascension the archæologist finds the complement of the story, describing the triumphant return of the Deliverer to the skies. The references in Professor Cheyne's notes to the "Christusbild" of Professor Pfleiderer, the brilliant discourse first addressed to this Congress two years ago, will show how far the English and the German scholars are in agreement. Professor Cheyne treads with surer foot than another of our compatriots, Mr. J. M. Robertson, who thinks that the whole of the Gospel narrative can be reduced to shreds and patches of uncertainty because it assuredly contains mythical elements. Of the historic reality of Jesus, the uniqueness of his personality, and the immense worth of his act of absolute self-sacrifice, Professor Cheyne has no doubt. But this only renders it more incumbent on the disciple to disengage these abiding truths from their temporary form. It is even boldly conjecured that there was probably some pre-Christian Messianic biography, known to the Apostle Paul, in which these elements already held a place. As soon as Jesus was identified with the Messiah they were immediately attached to him, and the opening and the close of his life were thus conformed to a prior type. The new direction which research is likely to take in the near future, therefore, is that of inquiry into the form and sources of the Christology of the Apostle Paul. The approaching publication of an edition of the "Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs" (edited by Professor Charles), with proof of the pre-Christian date of this interesting work, the clear realisation of contemporary ideas of the world and the heavenly powers, the study of Greek and Oriental cults with their numerous parallels to Christian terminology, the fuller comprehension of the religious atmosphere in which so many of our sacred books were produced (see, for example, the very remarkable bas-relief from Koloe in Lydia, displaying the heavenly counterparts of the worship of earth, recently published by Professor Ramsay*), will help us to understand the records of the origins of Christian thought and worship as we have never understood them before. And side by side with this the might of the first Christian impulse will emerge with new power, and the conception of the Kingdom of God with its immense personal and social implications will send us forth afresh to work out in the conditions of the present day the deathless thoughts of Jesus Christ.

In this connection may be noted Dr. Robinson's cautious explanation of the Baptismal formula of Matt. xxviii. 19: "The Evangelist does not here report the ipsissima verba of Jesus, but transfers to him the familar language of his own time and locality" ("Encycl. Bibl.," col. 474).

THE RELATIONS OF LIBERAL RELIGION TO SOCIAL REFORMS.*

BY THE REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

IT is said that a most orthodox king once declared that, if the Almighty had taken his advice, he believed the scheme of creation might have been amended. I hope it may not be deemed improper for unorthodox persons like ourselves to express a wish that at least some things in this world were different. Doubtless we are men of faith, but we are (or ought to be) men of works as well, for we find ourselves in the midst of circumstances that call aloud for energetic action. Leaving to exponents of religious theory to reconcile the temper of trust with the spirit of profound dissatisfaction, I would respectfully urge upon all the impossibility of taking refuge from social problems in an easy-going optimism.

Are we—is anyone—satisfied with the social conditions of the present day? Do those conditions justify us in taking a merely academic interest in the subject? While we jealously preserve the speculative freedom of our theology, have we no settled and definite aims as social reformers?

We surely cannot need reminding that the contrasts between different grades of society are profound. Not to indulge in extravagant views, let us consider our own present lot and that of many of our brethren. I suppose we are mostly middle-class people. We meet to-day amid some of the most beautiful scenes on earth; we give and receive courtesies as persons who are exempt from the sterner severities of the struggle for life. Necessaries at least we possess, if not luxuries; and we have abundance not only for the body, but for the mind. To us a wide range of mental activity is possible; literature, science, art, and religion open before us ways into the highest realms of feeling. But, while we meet thus, we know well that millions are so placed that nearly their whole time and power are perforce spent in the endeavour to get daily bread, and what respite they have from burdensome toil is necessarily passed amid surroundings that forbid refinement of feeling, and that so deaden the intellect that much that is the daily food of the mind to us would be unattractive, if not absolutely unintelligible, to them. Let Liberal Religion preach its Gospel where it will, how small a hearing does it secure in the weltering slums!

We may be told by students of biology that stress elicits effort, and that vigorous life comes of manfully "suffering hardship." It is very true, but it is not the whole truth. Nature's methods are certainly not indulgent, but stern and uncompromising—until there is room and scope for a new and higher line of departure. The social reformer steps in, not as an opponent of Nature, but as an exponent of Nature's "second thoughts." When the organism is worth preserving, and too hard a discipline would not really develop its latent resources but would simply crush it out of existence, mitigating influences are introduced. Infancy is prolonged by extended parental care; the individual is protected by the group; and thus, and thus only, are the higher possibilities of human life realised. Humane co-operation and re-adjustment of the common burden, the foresight of the prudent, and the succouring care of the large-hearted—these are among the "second thoughts" of Nature, without which there is no one of us here present but would have perished miserably long ago. When, therefore, a reference is made to the necessity for struggle in human affairs, whether that reference be made in strict loyalty to the laws discovered by our science, or insincerely as a cloak to cover indolence and selfishness, the wise answer must be one that is based on a wider view of the subject.

There is no need to labour this point. All religious groups that rightfully claim our regard have simply—I would say honourably—accepted the challenge which is clearly offered to man in the harsher conditions of his world. Whatever their philosophy may have had to say as to the problem of evil, their practice has been to try by all means in their power to lessen its incidence. Looking back upon the story of Christian benevolence, we can, no doubt, detect many mistakes. We might, without difficulty, point to present-day methods of charity which are something worse than failures. Narrow and short of vision, would-be reformers have forgotten the complexity of human nature; they have adopted plans for immediate relief which have ultimately aggravated the disease. All this is painfully obvious to the student of social science; but the question for us is: Are we, who are indefinitely, but perhaps sufficiently described as belonging to the Liberal Religious group, to stand aloof from these endeavours to lessen the sum of social misery? Have we satisfied ourselves that our whole duty is done when we have laid a finger here or there upon the mistakes of predecessors or contemporaries?

Surely there is no one of us who would willingly be only a "hearer of the word" and not a "doer" also. If ever there were a group of thinkers upon whom there lay a supreme obligation to act, it is ourselves. As theologians, our characteristic note is "the Man above the Dogma." Our theology is, in fact, largely an outburst of protest in the name of the simple human instincts that have been outraged by the abstractions and artificialisms of the schools. As regards our ecclesiastical polity, doubtless considerable variety shows at present upon the surface, but at heart we all approve the declaration: "The Man above the Church." Our love of individual liberty does not stop short of the contest with even the most august of social organisations; and if a crisis arises in which the nation itself, acting through its officers, seeks to crush out the free life of the citizen by sheer weight of authority, our sympathies go with "the Man" even before the nation. Our reason for laying this emphasis on the rights of the individual soul and conscience is a ready one: there, in the inner life of a man, and not in things external, however dignified and imposing, lie the highest values of existence.

It is easy to say such things, and easy to applaud them; but they imply a corollary of vast significance. The more clearly we discern the worth of every individual soul, the more imperative the duty becomes to secure, as far as we can, that every individual soul has a chance of living its worthiest life. What we see around us in the case of many, if not the actual majority of human beings, is surely, in heaven's name, not their worthiest life. By every declaration we make of the rights of men we are the more bound to do battle for them. Others may do as they will, but we cannot evade the duty of directly interfering with the drift of things, lest the brute elements crush out the human. The way of civic and commercial life must be altered till no unnecessary obstacle stands in the way of individual development. The social reform we desire is simply this—the opportunity for men to be men indeed, not drilled all into one pattern, but every one his best self.

But, to secure it, how much is needed! The pith and centre of our reformation is just there. The struggle has its political aspect, and here, I am well aware, we meet with disturbing passions which are more keen to-day, I think, than those of the theological world. Pitiful it is that the simple desire for "all men's good" is so often missed amid party conflicts; but, at whatever risks, Liberal Religion must do its duty, even at the risk of entering, when necessary, the field of politics. Imagine, if you can, a Moses, Amos, Jesus, or Paul, abandoning his duty to be a helper of men, and driven into religious quietism by the cry of "politics"! Rather let us be insistent that no department of human activity can be excluded from religious influences without suffering loss—least of all the department where laws are made and applied, where taxation is incurred, and the daily life of the people is involved in the quarrels of states.

Obviously, our time to-day permits of only the briefest reference to detailed facts; but two salient factors in the social problem demand at least a word or two. Who can consider without sadness and apprehension the Congested Population in our great modern cities? Even if the swarms of these human hives remained without increase, the spectacle of them must stagger all but the stoutest or the most callous. Here, in the densely thronged streets and alleys, is a source of enormous evils—physical, economic, moral. The sanitary inspector, the schoolmaster, the missionary, the magistrate and police—all are busy, and undoubtedly with good results—and yet, who of us would wish his own child to be a dweller in those mean streets? What a slender chance there is for a healthy mind or body to develop in such conditions? But the tide swells continually into these backwaters of civilisation, and ever as the numbers grow the problem deepens. We are doing what we can (I trust) to grapple with the misery thus generated; but let us be frank, and confess—as the first step to radical reform—that all we can do by way of amelioration is tragically insufficient, especially while this tendency to congestion continues and increases as it does.

Let us also be honest, and confess that some of the worst evils in these overcrowded centres arise through the luxurious and vicious tastes of the well-to-do. An idle rich class, with its propensity to extravagant outlay, to silly or pernicious amusements, to incessant gambling, sets the pace to those who think it fine to imitate the so-called leaders of society. Frugality and industry, such as might thrive in self-respect in simpler communities, find themselves out of fashion where artificial needs are so ingeniously multiplied. Well may the voice of the reformer be heard amongst us pleading for La Vie Simple. The welcome given far and wide to that voice is a gratifying sign; but, after all, it is, I fear, but the sign of a bad conscience, and the evidence of genuine repentance is but slight. What room is there for the works of repentance while Vanity Fair is still so densely crowded around us? What possibility is there of "sweeter manners" for the poor and healthier virtues for the rich in such vast, bewildering mælströms as these that swirl around us?

Glance also at the Chaos in Industrial Life that leaves, as one very obvious evidence of its existence, the ragged regiments of "unemployed" in our streets, not only in winter time, but all the year round. It is an old evil, and the resulting waste and woe have been a theme for warning voices since the rise of modern industrialism. Granted that some progress has been made towards the better organisation of labour; granted, also, that there is grave risk of increasing the evils of the present state of affairs by short-sighted (still more by self-interested) interference—still, laissez faire is impossible. The poverty, crime, and misery, more or less directly resulting from the absence of intelligence and morality in our industrial and commercial methods, are too awful to be let alone. "Why this waste?" Men and women, who are of our own flesh and blood, do not become paupers, criminals, drunken, and depraved by deliberate preference!

Must not our relation to social reforms, then, be one of more than mere criticism, more than sentimental and fruitless sympathy? Must we not, in due gravity, dare to interfere, so that Nature's "second thoughts"—thoughts of kindly graciousness to her human children—may be brought to bear? By all means, let us study; but, while we are studying, men are corrupting and women are starving—or worse. Some things, surely, we see clearly; and where the vision is clear, who will shrink from the responsibility of taking action? Rather, who will not shrink from inaction? Better a mistake, if honest, than inhuman disregard of the woes of men.

We are servants of religion. In our "ministry of the Word," whether in the Press or in the Pulpit, we must protest incessantly against every form of the assumption, often so thoughtlessly and selfishly made, that the masses at the base of society must of necessity be degraded, and the weakest be crushed out of existence by the strong and clever. But we must go beyond this protest. Our "ministry of deed" must be earnest, however isolated our work. In our separate apprenticeships to the work of redeeming souls and bodies from wretchedness, we are preparing the world, let us believe, for a more collective advance. Perhaps any proposal at present to establish among ourselves a new "Institute of Social Progress" would be deemed premature; yet, will it not come by-and-by? Scores of beneficent agencies exist among us—would it not be worth while to get them all in full view? To realise how many there are, and how nobly served, must encourage us—even if, the next moment, we realise afresh their inadequacy.

We have schools and classes, temperance and thrift societies, labour bureaux, relief committees, and so on; our coming together should serve to incite each to further work in his own place. Co-operation will surely and naturally grow among these our agencies, where so much sympathy already exists.

The world, if it takes notice of us, may observe that we describe ourselves as "thinkers and workers." The need for everybody's work in this field is clear. Whether Liberal Religion can materially affect the course of Social Reform, some may doubt. I do not. The research for truth which we have made, long and earnestly, in matters critical and speculative, has not been without results (we are bold to think) in affecting the course of theological reform. If only we bring the same zeal and intelligence into this part of our duty, we may hope, few as we are, to work not in vain. Be that as it may; if the crying need for Social Reform does not seriously affect Liberal Religion, kindling in it more and more the fires of a sacred passion, perish such liberalism from the face of the earth!

THE war is ended. Russia and Japan have at last agreed to terms, principally owing to the intervention of President Roosevelt. It is as though the whole world breathed one great sigh of relief, after waiting with every nerve tense, now hopeful, now doubtful, whilst the makers of history decided what should and what should not be conceded. Peace is assured, the cloud is lifted, but the terrible effects that war leaves in its train will be felt for long in desolate homes—maimed bodies, and memories of the scenes of horror to those who have passed through it all. The resolute stand taken by the Japanese nation from the first against her powerful neighbour cannot but be admired by all. There has been a calm, quiet order in her going that has seldom failed to reach the goal at which she aimed, an apparently unemotional attitude which is a source of wonder to the western mind. We have heard reports of the consulting of astrologers before taking any decided action, the invoking of so-called supernatural forces; but, by whatever power she has succeeded, it seems she has proved that a nation working in harmony—the mind fixed on one point, the determination unwavering—is adamant against superior material wealth. The war is ended, and may the day soon dawn when we shall turn our instruments of warfare into "ploughshares and pruning-hooks," and the brotherhood of nations be no longer the dream of idealists, but a practical possibility.

TRUTH is a conquest, and no man holds her so fast as he who has won her by conflict.—Channing.

UNITARIAN CHURCHES IN GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.*

By W. COPELAND BOWIE.

I HAVE been invited to give a brief account of the number, organisation, and condition of Unitarian Churches in Great Britain and Ireland. Had I been addressing an audience of Unitarians in England, objection might have been taken to the title of the paper, for there are some Unitarians who have a deeply-rooted antipathy to calling their churches by the name which fitly enough describes their worship. The late Dr. Martineau, a robust Unitarian, in a speech at Leeds in 1888, rhetorically said that a Unitarian, who designated his church by his own name, was "a traitor to his spiritual ancestry." But no Unitarian who does this (and a great many do) feels in the least like a traitor to any principle of liberty or progress. The distinction has its meaning and value, but its discussion is academic, usually barren, and to one unacquainted with traditional Unitarianism not a little perplexing. The etymology of words carries us only a short way in reaching their real implication. The word "Unitarian," first used in English literature in 1687, has passed through various changes in its meaning and application. It has become enlarged and ennobled in its use. In recent years a worse fate has befallen the word "Free"; for the nonconforming Evangelical denominations in England have applied it to churches and societies from which Unitarians are rigorously excluded. This has made the use of the Unitarian name more necessary than before.

"Churches free in their constitution and open to the laws of natural change"—that is what we mean now-a-days when we speak of Unitarian Churches in England. At the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, held in June, 1905, a resolution was adopted unanimously, in which it was laid down that the only way to safeguard the truths of the Christian religion is steadfastly to adhere to the principle of non-subscription to creeds and formularies, so that no restriction may be imposed on the liberty of a congregation to change its opinions with regard to religious doctrines or modes of regulating worship. This principle of non-subscription to creeds is the key to the meaning of the Unitarian movement in Great Britain and Ireland; and amid many changes and much diversity of opinion this principle gives unity to its history.

Unitarians at the present time hold divergent views on many questions, and yet they are probably fundamentally more at one than any other denomination. If you attended regularly the Sunday services in any one of the 364 places of worship whose names appear in the Essex Hall Year Book for 1905, you would discover, among other things, an entire absence of certain doctrines upon which the great churches of Christendom continue to lay the emphasis. The doctrines of the Trinity, the Deity of Christ, the Atonement, the Infallibility of the Bible, Eternal Torments, and other orthodox beliefs would not be mentioned, except by way of disputing their truth or rejecting their validity. Incarnation and Revelation would be proclaimed not as partial but as universal truths. Articles of faith, confessions, creeds, and priestly rites would be treated as of small moment; the worship which is in spirit and in truth would be held to be supreme. The development of character would be insisted upon, and the good and simple life presented as the ideal for this world and a fitting preparation for the next. Truth, goodness, and justice would have no barriers placed in their way; nor would science, criticism and evolution have any terrors for the worshippers. Unitarian Churches, if they are true to their principles and to their traditions, welcome every fresh gleam of truth and right revealed by God to the human mind and conscience, and seek to cultivate the natural pieties of the soul which never grow old. They are free because they are Unitarian; and it may be added that some of them would probably never have become free, if they had not first become Unitarian.

ENGLAND.

There are in England 285 places of worship, named in various ways, but all Unitarian in their principles. The early history of several of them is wrapped in obscurity. Twelve, mostly of Baptist origin, place themselves before 1662, the year in which the Act of Uniformity was passed, the year also when the Unitarian John Bidle died. Twenty-three exisiting churches give this memorable year as the date of their birth; and to the ten following years thirty-two others belong, so that 116 of the 285 were founded before the close of the seventeenth century. During the eighteenth century 38 existing churches were founded, among them Essex-street Chapel, London. In 1774 Theophilus Lindsey seceded from the Established Church of England, and opened the first avowedly Unitarian chapel in Essex-street, Strand (transferred in 1888 to Kensington, the building in Essex-street being converted into a hall, book-rooms, and offices for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the Sunday School Association). In Lindsey's time it was a crime publicly to profess Unitarianism in England, punishable by forfeiture of citizenship and by imprisonment; in Scotland it was a capital offence. The law had not been enforced for many years, and it was repealed in 1813, when civil rights were accorded to Unitarians.* During the first half of the nineteenth century 31 Unitarian Churches were founded; in the second half, 91; while from 1900–1905 nine new movements have been started. Of course several of the older churches in town and country, owing to various causes, have disappeared; and although the total number of Unitarian places of worship at the present time is larger than at any previous period, the increase is not, I fear, keeping pace with the growth of population.

There is now no legal impediment in the way of Unitarians worshipping God as they deem truest and best. Difficulties which had arisen in connection with some of the older churches, originally more or less orthodox, were set at rest by the Dissenters' Chapels Act of 1844, which provides that where there is no express statement in the deed of foundation as to the particular doctrines for which a church building was to be employed, twenty-five years' usage shall be conclusive evidence of the legality of the doctrine.

It is difficult accurately to determine the number of members belonging to these 285 places of worship, as statistics are not usually kept. Several of the congregations are very small, and only a few have a membership exceeding 200. There are probably connected with these Unitarian Churches about 35,000 adults, while the 254 Sunday-schools in 1904 had 32,000 scholars, of whom 8,500 were over 16 years of age. These form only a small proportion of those holding Unitarian opinions in England; the Anglican, the Congregational, and other so-called "orthodox" churches contain large numbers, and there are many Unitarians who do not connect themselves with any church. I doubt whether the number of members in several of the older churches is so large to-day as it was thirty years ago. The sons and daughters of Unitarians are seldom as zealous as their parents were; and the influences which make against attendance at worship are operative in a peculiar degree among people over whom the old religious motives exert little influence. Tolerance and indifference sometimes go hand in hand. Speaking generally, it is the newer churches, and those that display some measure of propagandist zeal which attract the largest congregations, especially if the minister be a cultivated and interesting preacher, alert and in touch with living problems of thought and life.

ORGANISATION.

In respect to organisation, several of the older churches were nominally Presbyterian, while others were avowedly Independent, but the congregational principle has prevailed (sometimes in a narrow and exclusive form) throughout their history, and is now accepted by all. There were in early days Assemblies in Lancashire, London, Exeter, and elsewhere, to which some of the churches belonged, but these bodies exerted very little ecclesiastical control over individual congregations. Nowadays, so far as England is concerned, the Presbyterian name is employed by Unitarians as an expression of the undogmatic principle (orthodox Presbyterians vigorously protesting against its use in this way); and beyond this, as the Rev. Alexander Gordon observes, "it is little more than a London court-dress in which Unitarians, since 1836, have enjoyed a privilege of separate access to the throne."

The church property is legally held for the congregation by a small body of trustees; and usually the management of affairs is entrusted to officers and a committee elected annually by the subscribers or enrolled members. The minister in a few cases is appointed by the trustees, but generally by vote of the congregation at a duly convened meeting. His engagement may be for a fixed period, terminable by three or six months' notice on either side. The salary paid to the minister is fixed by the congregation, and varies according to its position and wealth. £800 a year is the highest salary paid to any Unitarian minister in England, and few there be that receive so much as £500. The average salary does not exceed £200; and there are at least fifty congregations unable to pay £100 a year. There are no grants in aid from the State, but some of the older churches possess endowments, yielding in some cases a large proportion of the income. The majority of the churches, including those founded in recent years, are supported by the voluntary contributions of the members, aided by grants from local Missionary Societies, Sustentation Funds, and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The subscription entitling to membership is sometimes as low as one shilling a year, and occasionally as high as two guineas a year; a minimum of five shillings is the more general rule. An offertory or collection is taken at each service in about half the churches, and for special purposes on fixed days in all. Some Unitarian Churches are managed on the most thorough-going democratic principles; others by an oligarchy. Both methods succeed; both occasionally fail. In some churches the minister is a member of the committee; in others he is carefully excluded from all participation in the management of secular affairs.

There are sixteen district missionary societies in England with which most of the churches are loosely connected, and through the agency of which aid is given by the richer congregations to the poorer. These local societies, aided by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, originate church extension and propagandist work. There are two chief funds for the augmentation of the salaries of ministers, and several smaller funds from which occasional grants are made. A Benevolent Society and a Pension and Insurance Fund provide for the needs of infirm and aged ministers. A National Conference of the Churches, formed in 1885 on the model of the Conference of the Unitarian Churches in America, is held every third year, and its meetings are largely attended. It possesses no ecclesiastical authority over the churches. Unitarians are exceedingly jealous of any infringement of their liberty, and are therefore the despair of the church organiser, as the late Dr. Martineau discovered to his grief. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association, founded in 1825, is the chief national and international missionary organisation of the Unitarians of Great Britain. Its income is derived from the annual subscriptions of individuals, collections by congregations, donations, and investments. The Association supports ministers, sends out missionary preachers, assists in establishing and maintaining churches, holds conferences and meetings, publishes books, sermons, hymnals, devotional works, and tracts, controversial and practical. It is managed by a committee elected annually by the general body of subscribers. Its income and expenditure last year (1904) exceeded £8,000. The office, book and assembly rooms are at Essex Hall, London. The secretary has to deal with upwards of 6,000 letters annually, and the book-room staff are busily employed in sending publications to all parts of the English-speaking world.

Education of Ministers.

There are three Colleges at which Unitarian ministers are educated—one in Oxford, one in Manchester, and a third at Carmarthen, but their combined annual output of students is generally small. The Essex Hall Year Book for 1905 contains the names of 364 ministers: of these about 100 were educated at the College now in Oxford, 100 at Manchester, 25 at Carmarthen, while 75 were formerly Roman Catholics, Anglicans, Baptists, Congregationalists, or Methodists; the remainder, among whom are several very earnest and efficient ministers, received no regular collegiate training. Congregations are free to appoint anyone they like, and their selections are occasionally a little surprising. A man who has had no special education for the ministry is sometimes preferred to one who has spent three or four years at College in Manchester, or six years at Oxford. The freedom of entrance brings into the ministry now and again meteor spirits who light up the Unitarian sky for a few moments and then disappear into the unseen. The same freedom has also attracted to the Unitarian ministry some of its ablest and brightest men.

Ireland.

In Ireland not only were the Unitarian Churches of the present day Presbyterian in the beginning, but they still remain, with few exceptions, Presbyterian in their constitution and general management. Of the 39 existing churches, 30 were originally "orthodox"; 23 were founded in the seventeenth, 6 in the eighteenth, and 10 in the nineteenth century. With the exception of Dublin and Cork, and small places in Tipperary and Derry, the congregations are confined to the counties of Antrim and Down.

The Presbyterians of the north of Ireland were mainly of Scotch descent, settlers and exiles, who in their native land had withstood Popery and refused to submit to Episcopacy. In 1726 several ministers and congregations, forming the Presbytery of Antrim, separated from the General Synod, for the purpose of maintaining Christian worship on non-subscribing principles. They were known as the "New Lights." In the early part of the nineteenth century, the Arian controversy raged hot and strong, culminating in the formation of the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster in 1830, the members of which refused to insist on subscription to the Westminster Confession of Faith. The Remonstrants maintained that the Bible was the only infallible rule of faith and duty, and that it was the inalienable right of every Christian to search the Scriptures for his own instruction and guidance; to form his own opinions in regard to what they teach; and to worship God agreeably to the dictates of his own conscience "without privation, penalty or inconvenience inflicted by his fellowmen." Five years later the Association of Irish Non-subscribing Presbyterians was established for the protection of its members, and the maintenance and extension of the principle of non-subscription. For thirty or forty years onward the non-subscribing congregations in Ireland were exceedingly active and eager in the promotion of their work; they were led by able and devoted ministers; and many of the laymen exercised a deep and widespread influence upon the thought and life of the community. In more recent years there has not been much missionary activity displayed. Several of the churches are largely attended, but the majority have only sparse congregations, and a few are decadent. There are probably at the present time about 10,000 members and adherents holding Unitarian opinions connected with the 39 non-subscribing churches in Ireland. Dr. John Campbell, in an address at the annual meeting of the Association of Irish Non-subscribing Presbyterians, held June 29, 1905, said:—"We badly want some of the old fighting instincts of our forefathers, and their determination to make their opinions felt in the world." In their theology the ministers and congregations, speaking generally, adhere more closely to what may be called primitive Christianity than their English brethren; although complaint has recently been made that emphasis is not now laid on the sufferings and sacrifice of Christ and the future consequences of sin, after the manner of the old Remonstrants.

Since 1870 there has been no State Church in Ireland. The bulk of the population is Roman Catholic. Protestantism has a very limited existence outside Ulster and Dublin.

Scotland.

Presbyterian Scotland has never taken kindly to Unitarian Churches, but in no other part of the British Isles, during recent years, have the faith and principles held by Unitarians made greater progress. The land which owed its theology in such large and deep measure to John Calvin, and which remained true to his teachings for a longer period than any other country in Europe, promises to become thoroughly liberal and progressive in its religious thought and life. There is little danger of the United Free Church expelling from its ranks any future Professor Robertson Smith; and now that Mr. Balfour's Government has made it possible for the Established Church to relax the terms of subscription to the Westminster Confession of Faith for its ministers, progress is not likely seriously to be impeded.

It is evident that for the younger Presbyterian ministers of Scotland, as well as the educated and thoughtful laity, the theology of Calvin has lost its hold, and is rapidly being replaced by a wider and more humane religious faith, which in its essential spirit closely resembles the teachings of Unitarians like Dr. Channing and Dr. Martineau. The sturdy character and high intelligence of the people, along with their keen inborn interest in questions of theology, the thorough and systematic education of all accredited Presbyterian ministers, the absence of creeds and fixed liturgical forms in their religious services, place Scotland in a most enviable position, and mark her out for leadership in the greater reformation proceeding in our own day. Many of her sons are eagerly devoting themselves to the task of reconciling reason and religion, criticism and faith, nature and God.

There are seven Unitarian Churches in Scotland. The date of the establishment of the oldest, in Edinburgh, is 1776; the present church was erected in 1836. There are churches in Glasgow (1810, with a second church in 1871), Aberdeen (1833), Kirkcaldy (1890). The church at Kilmarnock, springing from the mother church of the Evangelical Union movement in Scotland, drifted into Unitarianism in 1885, under the influence of one of its ministers, but its strength departed, and it soon became a burden rather than a help to Unitarianism in Scotland. At Paisley, Perth, and a few other towns, religious services by Unitarian ministers were held at intervals, but with no permanent result so far as the establishment of churches was concerned. Each congregation manages its own affairs, although only two are entirely self-supporting, the other five being aided by substantial grants from the McQuaker Fund. The total number of members in the seven Scotch Churches is about 1,000; and the returns for 1904 show that there were 486 scholars and 44 teachers in the Sunday-schools. There is a Unitarian Association in Scotland, but its operations and the support it receives are very limited. Apart from the efforts of the ministers and congregations, the duty of maintaining and diffusing the principles of Unitarian Christianity in Scotland is discharged chiefly by the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, to whom Mr. McQuaker, of Glasgow, bequeathed in 1888 a sum of nearly £30,000, the annual income of which is used in supplementing the salaries of ministers of congregations who show such an amount of income as attests a living interest in the work, in contributing to the support of missionary preachers, in printing and circulating Unitarian literature, and in various other ways. As showing the interest taken in Unitarianism by so-called "orthodox" ministers, students, and teachers in Scotland, I may mention that a few months ago, in response to an advertisement offering certain books expository of Unitarian Christianity, five hundred applications were received in the course of a few days. It is also reported that Dr. Martineau's "Seat of Authority in Religion"—his most radical and outspoken theological pronouncement—had a larger sale in Scotland than in any other part of the British Isles.

If I read the signs of the times aright, the church of the future in Scotland will gradually approach more and more closely in its theology to what may be described as Christian Theism, that is to Unitarian Christianity. The churches will doubtless retain their own names, and follow the line of national development, ultimately to become "Free" in a far wider and truer sense than the leaders of the disruption of 1843 conceived.*

WALES.

Unitarianism in Wales, as a distinct movement, had its origin in the revolt of Jenkin Jones, of Llwynrhydowen, in 1726, against the doctrines of Calvinism. His Arminianism became Arianism in the preaching of his successors, David Lloyd and David Davis, the famous bard of Castel Hywel, great-grandfather of the Rev. V. D. Davis, editor of THE INQUIRER. Dr. Charles Lloyd and John James were the pioneers of Unitarianism at the beginning of the nineteenth century; and it has ever since kept in close touch with the Unitarianism of England and of America, and has followed the same general lines of development.

There are at the present time 34 Unitarian Churches in Wales. Several of these churches were originally "orthodox;" one, that of Ciliau Aeron, has 1650 as the date of its foundation; but the majority were Unitarian from the start. They are confined to South Wales; and all except three to the counties of Cardigan and Glamorgan. It is almost the dominant sect in central Cardiganshire, to which it has imparted the name of "The Black Spot." The congregations have had to contend against bitter and sustained attacks from the orthodox bodies. It is estimated that the Unitarian Churches in Wales have at present about 5,000 members and adherents; the Rev. W. James, of Llandyssul, to whom I am indebted for aid in preparing this brief record, says that this number would have to be multiplied by five if all those in Wales who hold or sympathise with Unitarian opinions are to be included. In 25 of the churches the Welsh language is employed; in 9 English is spoken. There are 28 Sunday-schools, with 1,960 scholars and 174 teachers; 900 scholars are upwards of 16 years of age. Each congregation manages its own affairs. There are two missionary societies—one in connection with the Welsh-speaking congregations dating from 1802, a survival of "The Society of Believers in the Divine Unity," the other with the English-speaking congregations, founded in 1890. The South Wales Association publishes a monthly magazine, "Yr Ymofynydd," with a circulation of 1,200 copies.

Several of the ministers take charge of two congregations; their salaries do not average £150 a year. Few of the congregations are wealthy, and were it not for the grants received from the Sustentation Fund it would be impossible for them to retain the services of educated ministers. Students for the ministry in Wales were, some years ago, educated mainly at the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, an institution open to all denominations, and dating from the latter part of the seventeenth century; at the present time, many are educated along with English students at the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, and at Manchester College, Oxford.

CONDITION OF THE CHURCHES.

There is no ecclesiastical organisation or priesthood which fixes the theology, or defines the work, or moulds the character of Unitarian Churches. They are made what they are by the men and women connected with them. When a strong, eager man, belonging to one of our churches or societies, tells me that he is disappointed with the poor achievements of the denomination, I immediately reply: "Set to work yourself, lend a hand, strive to make the Unitarian body what you would have it be." We are not lacking in candid critics. The trouble is that our critics are so often smitten by paralysis when it comes to doing any work.

It is not easy, therefore, to indicate in a few words the condition of these churches. Many of them are a strong and vivid influence for good in the towns and villages in which they are placed; some are somnolent, only dreamily conscious that they are alive. The late Charles Wicksteed, after travelling for nine years in all parts of England as a missionary minister, testified that "the mere existence of a Unitarian congregation in a place, however apparently feeble and decadent it might be, exercised a marked educational influence, and insensibly enlarged the views and leavened the ideas of the neighbourhood." In Parliament, on Municipal bodies, on School Boards, as Poor Law Guardians, as workers on behalf of social reform, Unitarians have always been represented far beyond their numerical proportion in the community. They have laid emphasis on character not on creed, and have shown readiness to co-operate with men of all churches and of none in promoting the public good. The Domestic Missions in London, Liverpool, Manchester, and other cities, and several of the Churches and Sunday-schools, in Lancashire and Cheshire more particularly, are hives of industry, and centres of wholesome helpful life.

On the practical side of religion there are few who would question the earnestness and strength of Unitarians; on the devotional side they are sometimes represented as defective. There may be a degree of truth in the complaint; and yet you will find among the older Unitarian families of England beautiful examples of reverent trust, of strong tender piety. It is a type peculiarly Unitarian; calm, self-contained, unobtrusive, optimistic, thinking no evil—a type which may be a little out of touch with present day thought and life, but its passing away will leave the world the poorer.

In theology there have been many and deep changes, and the end is not yet. It is sometimes said that if the Unitarians of a century ago had found the doctrine of the Trinity explicitly taught in the Bible, they would have believed it. I have my doubts about this. Their rationalism would have discovered some other way out of the difficulty. To-day, Biblical perplexities have no disturbing influence upon Unitarians. The method, spirit, and results of modern criticism are accepted, and produce no alarm. Conceptions of the person and mission of Christ open a wider field of difference. Some ministers and congregations hold opinions and employ language concerning Jesus which others have abandoned. The Communion, or Lord's Supper Service, is observed in the majority of the churches, but only a small proportion of the members participate. The rite of infant Baptism is generally, but not universally, observed among Unitarians: a few General Baptist Churches, holding Unitarian views, adhere to adult baptism, at least in theory.

What the future of these Unitarian Churches will be, no one can tell. I do not even venture to prophesy. I do not know that the problem need disturb us, for each succeeding generation has a way of settling its own questions. But of this I am convinced, that our country would be benefitted if there were more of these churches; and if those that already exist could renew their strength. They have done heroic service on behalf of civil and religious liberty; they have helped to cleanse and sweeten public and private life; they have brought the inspiration and joy of faith and hope and love to many perplexed and troubled souls; they have made the thoughts and emotions which centre round the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man more real; they have sought to infuse into the thought and life of men the strength and tenderness of a reasonable religion. "Christianity without priest, or creed, or ritual" has been one of their guiding principles. The force and truth of the words recently spoken to his former students by Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, are recognised, I believe, by all Unitarians:—"Our negations have no value except as they render more distinct and glorious the great affirmations which can never die; and a great work still lies before us in presenting to the world a religion which, along with truth for the free intellect, has warmth of sentiment and depth of devotion for the longing and aspiring soul."

* The Rev. R. B. Drummond, of Edinburgh, to whom I submitted the MS., writes:—"As regards your forecast of the future, no doubt Dr. Dods, Prof. G. A. Smith, and others would have something to say in deprecation of its claim that they are approaching Unitarianism. They would not deny having departed from Calvinism, but the Church, even in her most advanced section, is likely, I think, to adhere to the Nicene doctrine of Christ's person, notwithstanding any broadening of her views of Scripture."

ROUSSEAU AND WORDSWORTH.

SIR,—So far as I know, Mr. E. L. H. Thomas is right in denying that there is any direct influence of Rousseau upon Wordsworth. Yet beyond this point there would certainly appear to be room for speculation. That Rousseau's visit to England made some stir, we have the evidence of Burke's well-known diatribe, and the pension that was granted to him by George III. Nor can Wordsworth's visits to France twenty years after and his youthful enthusiasm for the Revolution have left him in entire ignorance, one would think, of a name and doctrine so much "in the air" as those of the philosopher of Geneva. As regards the poetical treatment of the "return to nature," Wordsworth owed much to both Goldsmith, Cowper, and Burns, upon each of whom Rousseau's influence is acknowledged. In the first volume of his "Essays on Literature and Philosophy," Dr. Edward Caird has shown that Wordsworth's teaching had some important points of contact with that of Rousseau—his love for the wilder and grander aspects of natural beauty, his vindication of the dignity of simple peasant life, and his faith in the individual man. "Wordsworth," says Dr. Caird, "is Rousseau moralised, Christianised, and, as it were, transfigured by the light of imagination." May we not add that, in a way, Wordsworth was Rousseau "Anglicised"? A more favourable estimate than Mr. Thomas's of the work and personality of "Dr. Jean-Jacques"—though still discriminating—is to be found in James Russell Lowell's Essays, published in the Camelot Series.—Yours, &c.

AN OBJECT-LESSON.

SIR,—The war, now happily brought to an end, is a signal instance of the insanity of the doctrine that the way to secure peace is to prepare for war. When Russia took possession of Port Arthur its real interest was peace, in order to consolidate its useful work in Siberia and Manchuria, in relation to commerce and agriculture. The strong probability is that it would have secured peace by keeping Port Arthur as an open commercial port. What did it do? It vigorously applied the doctrine that in order to secure peace you must be prepared for war; and it turned Port Arthur into one of the strongest fortifications in the world, and filled its harbour with ships of war. What was the result? The creation of a mightier fleet by Japan, and the creation also of warlike suggestions and terrorisms. What came of that we all know, and yet some of us go on repeating, like a lunatic parrot, that the way to secure peace is to prepare for war.—Heartily yours,

August 30. J. PAGE HOPPS.

A VAN MISSION.

SIR,—The idea of instituting a Unitarian van seems to me in every way an excellent one. Surely there should be no doubt among the hearers as to what is being taught from the van. In view of the false creeds insisted upon still by what are called the orthodox churches, and so persistently preached therein; remembering, moreover, the doubts, difficulties, and unrest sown in many minds by such teaching, why not proclaim boldly the Unitarian gospel?

I see no need for trouble with curates or local preachers; but I do perceive the necessity of carrying the glad tidings of Christianity as understood by Unitarians to many a doubting, struggling soul, separated from the Church of his fathers, hungering and thirsting after what Unitarian Christianity can alone supply.

So long as Trinitarian doctrine finds a place in the Christian Church, so long is there need for the Unitarian protest against it.

Do not Unitarians seek to know and teach the truth about God and Christ and our daily duty?

Have not great and gifted men associated themselves with the Unitarian body and preached and written with no shadow of uncertainty of the faith that was in them?

It seems to me that there is room for more than one Unitarian van to visit places where the truth is neither known nor taught. Doubtless many people are not yet ready, but "the truth spoken in love" from such a platform would, I believe, win respect everywhere, and would carry help to many in urgent need.—I am, Sir, faithfully yours,

ARTHUR E. GAMMAN.

WHERE'ER a single slave doth pine,
Where'er one man may help another—
Thank God for such a birthright, brother—
That spot of earth is thine and mine!
There is the true man's birthplace grand;
His is a world-wide fatherland!

CENTENARY OF FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE.

II.

WHEN Maurice was ordained in the Church of England (1834), he expressed the belief that all sects were fast breaking up and that we might again have one Church throughout Christendom, with the parts nationally and universally united under their true Head. Disillusionment soon followed, and he found his ecclesiastical life did not lead along the paths of peace. He obtained, indeed, at once a hearing; his books were widely read, and men of mark became his constant hearers and devoted followers. Such men as Ludlow, Tom Hughes, and Charles Kingsley were co-workers of whom any leader might be proud; and the causes for which they laboured, Christian Socialism and the larger education of the people, were in themselves noble inspirations. But Maurice and his friends were attacked by the so-called religious newspapers of those days with a bitterness and injustice which is now scarcely credible. Sometimes a chapter in the history of the nineteenth century should be devoted to the Record; it will furnish a record of calling good evil and evil good likely to remain for ever unbroken, especially in view of the sequel in the biographies of some of its writers. These attacks, at the time anonymous, were very cruel; they were most unscrupulous in their misrepresentations; and those who read them never read any replies, seldom, indeed, read anything but their favourite periodical. No doubt Maurice lent himself to misunderstandings through his attempts to combine incompatibles. When a lad on a walking tour he and a companion of his own age received an invitation to dinner. Maurice alone possessed a clean pair of stockings, which with characteristic generosity he offered to his friend The friend could not accept such sacrifice, but was finally persuaded to take one clean stocking, and the two boys entered the drawing-room each presenting a remarkable contrast on his two legs, and were observed all the evening to be very anxious to put the best foot foremost. Somewhat similar was Maurice's conduct in reference to many theological difficulties. He would never join in an attack on a man who was already being assailed, he always wanted to lie alongside of the man who was down, or to do something on behalf of anyone whom he thought hardly used, however much he disagreed with his views generally. Thus he objected to the prosecution of Colenso as much as to the books which formed the grounds of the charge, and it is not wonderful that he was often credited with sympathy for views from which he profoundly dissented. But there was no excuse for Croker pretending that Maurice and his friends shared the Socialistic follies and worse which Christian Socialism was expressly designed to extirpate.

The largest trouble of this kind was connected with the meaning of the word "eternal." Maurice taught that in the New Testament eternal punishment does not mean punishment lasting through endless time. He insisted that the word eternal must mean the same in the two phrases, eternal life and eternal death, and eternal life he found defined as knowledge of God and Christ. Eternal life he maintained to be life in the presence of God, life in the Divine communion, the reward of righteousness, while the punishment of eternal death meant being deprived of such presence and communion. This teaching, which he found clearly stated in the New Testament, he accepted and taught with all his power. He found no clear statement there about the final fate of the wicked, and he, too, was content to leave that a solemn mystery. This was the teaching which was again and again most fiercely assailed during his life. In 1846 he was appointed Theological Professor at King's College, London. An attempt was made to turn him out in 1852, but failed because there was some sort of a trial, and competent theologians reported in his favour. The attack, under the leadership of Lord Radstock, was renewed the following year. An amendment proposed by Gladstone referring the charges to the Bishop of London was defeated, and at a subsequent meeting of the Council when the "Nobodies" attended in full force and most of the "Somebodies:" were busy elsewhere, the desired condemnation was secured. This action was especially noteworthy in contradistinction to the decision of the Privy Council in 1864 in regard to Inspiration and Eternal punishment giving the Church of England legal freedom in such matters. One consequence was that Maurice was set free to found the Working Men's College, London, where Ruskin promptly offered his services as art master, and other remarkable men, including Woolner, D. G. Rossetti, Fitz-James Stephen, Godfrey and Vernon Lushington, Frederick Harrison, M. E. Grant-Duff and others, came together and helped to influence the leaders of the working classes during the eventful years which led from 1848 to the establishment of household suffrage and the ballot. Maurice's own share in the work may be best judged from his book entitled, "Learning and Working," six lectures delivered in Willis's rooms in 1854. His contributions to a series of tracts entitled "Politics for the People," were also important.

A final outburst of impotent rage accompanied the offer made to Maurice by the Government of the living of St. Peter's, Vere-street. The Record called for signatures to protest, and a few insignificant henchmen responded. In reply came a memorial signed by hundreds of the true leaders of English thought, both lay and clerical; and the date, 1860, commemorates a significant change in the influence of anonymous journalism. Six years later he was appointed Professor of Moral Theology and Philosophy at Cambridge. He had devoted his best energies to the study of Ethics and Metaphysics for very many years; his book on "Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy" is one by which he wished to be judged, and he thus won a tardy recognition of his position as one of England's greatest teachers. It is curious, however, to learn how largely and how long his books have been used as useful "quarries" without the pilferer deeming it prudent to acknowledge the source. His Cambridge lectures on "The Conscience" and on "Social Morality" are solid contributions to a school of philosophical thought opposed to that which unfortunately has some claim to be called the English school. This was the last public recognition that his services received. His health became infirm, and, after a quiet, happy eventide, he died in 1872. That the nation, and in particular the English Church, made the best use that might have been made of his gifts and zeal few now reviewing his life will be disposed to admit.

It must often have been difficult to foretell which side Maurice would take in a controversy, save that if he took an active part in the warfare it would be on the weaker side. He warmly supported the Dissenters' Chapels Bill, and perhaps on the same principle we may explain his advocacy of the belief in a personal devil. He warmly upheld Co-operative Societies at a time (about 1850) when they were denounced with a bitterness now incomprehensible. But his sympathy with working men and zeal on their behalf never brought him near Republicanism during the period when such a feeling was rather widely prevalent. He believed in a Theocracy as a living fact, and this passed him on to a belief in a sovereign invested with a certain divine right to rule, and to be, under Heaven, something more than the mouthpiece of the majority. He believed in an aristocracy having a similar divine right of leadership. And he believed in Humanity, as we all do in theory.

Another characteristic position he took up was in strong opposition to Dean Mansel when that dignitary essentially anticipated Huxley's Agnosticism by eleven years, and denied us all possibility of knowing anything about God. J. S. Mill's powerful rejoinder, with its "To hell I will go," met with Maurice's warm commendation. A final indication of his habitual bent of mind is afforded by his attitude towards the Pan-Anglican synod which met at Lambeth in 1867. Their encyclical spoke of Christ reconciling the Father to us. So does the second of the Thirty-nine Articles. Maurice had spent his life preaching that Christ reconciles us to the Father, which is also what St. Paul says. Maurice had maintained that the Article derives all its force from the opposite statement in St. Paul, and in that sense had accepted the Article. But he did not like its reproduction by the Bishops. It was a bad case of "odd stockings." The truth seems to be that Maurice was great in affirmations, but never realised the importance of the corresponding negations. No man was a more sincere lover of truth than he, but he did not see that clear thinking requires the distinct denial of that which contradicts the truth. He was a fearless witness to what he felt to be positive truth, but he continued to combine with this something which is really incompatible, with the result that his theology is involved in an obscurity from which disciples vainly endeavour to rescue it.

But it was a life full of splendid purpose and fine achievement. The corner-stone of his religion was faith in a Deliverer. He heard the cry for this Deliverer all through the pages of the Old Testament, as well as the promise that one should come. He found the fulfilment of this promise in the New Testament. So do we. So did St. Paul find the deliverance which he describes in passing from the 7th to the 8th chapter of the Epistle to the Romans. With this Maurice could not rest content, but it is difficult to believe that he attained any deeper, clearer knowledge of the truth when he passed on from the teaching of the Bible to that of the ecclesiastical creeds.

Now leaving theology, we will conclude our notice with an extract from a letter written, 1862, to a son who had entered the army and was going out to India. He begins by speaking of the calling which clergymen receive, and of that which is common to all men, and proceeds to the special calling of the soldier. "They will "say that your calling cannot be a godly "one, that I am profaning what is holy "when I am daring to talk of a Spirit "of love and peace as dwelling with the "soldier and prompting his deeds. I "have considered the arguments of those "who speak thus—I was brought up to "regard them as almost self-evident; "I have deliberately rejected them. The "Bible has convinced me, history has "convinced me, personal experience has "convinced me, that they are not true. "I find the expression, Lord of Hosts "everywhere in the Scriptures, and I "accept it as a right and honest expression "of a great truth. I find that the leaders "of armies and that armies themselves "have done nobly, works which I recog-"nise as God's works. I find a spirit "of order and obedience in them which "I scarcely find elsewhere, and which I "wish civilians could imitate. I find "justice, gentleness, tenderness, not merely "mixing with such qualities in military "men, but eminently characteristic of "some among them. That being the case, "I have solemnly and with my whole heart "and soul refused to make an exception "from the maxim which I think governs "all offices and undertakings in the case of "the office and undertaking of the soldier. "I recognise him in battle and in the pre-"paration for battle as the servant of the "living God. I believe the Spirit of God "really calls him to his duties and fits "him for them as He calls me to mine. "And having this faith—without which "it would be anguish to think of you in "India or anywhere—I feel more bound "to insist on this principle when I discourse "about soldiers than in almost any other "case. For I see how terrible have been, "how far more terrible must be, the "effects of a loss of this faith, in the mind "of armies generally, and of the indivi-"duals who compose them. The sense "of power which armies give is so tremen-"dous—the illustrations of it in the history "of the Roman armies, which had pre-"vailed through discipline and obedience, "when they began to think they could "govern the state and make emperors, "are so palpable; that every true citizen "must ask himself, 'Who will guard "'our guardians, who will keep them "'from being our destroyers?' The "question is serious at all times; it was "never so serious as now, when the faith "in mere constitutional arrangements "is growing faint, when so many are "crying out for that organisation of force "which they say is only to be attained "under a military despot. If while this "temper is appearing among civilians, the "soldier parts with the feeling, which "has never been extinct yet in the English-

"man, though at times desperately weak,
"of a vocation, if he accepts the state"ment of pious men that he is only a
"devil's instrument, the prospect for this "land and for all other lands is darker than "one dares to contemplate. But a mere "vague impression of there being some"thing good, gentlemanlike, patriotic,
"in your profession will not avail to "counteract this temptation, which will "become greater every day, which many "of the circumstances of such a country
"as India is likely to foster. Nothing,
"I believe, short of a firm conviction,
"growing with the experience of personal
"weakness, that you have a calling,
"that it cannot be fulfilled unless you are
"just, manly, gentle, in all your doings
"to all the people with whom you con-
"verse, and that there is a Divine overseer
"of your thought and purposes who is "inspiring you with justice, manliness,
"gentleness, who is fighting in you against
"what is false, inhuman, ungracious,
"and that your Guide, Teacher, Restrainer,
"is the Guide, Teacher and Restrainer,
"whether they heed him or not, of all your "superiors, equals, dependents, of your "own countrymen, and of the natives,
"nothing but this will stand you in stead
"when savage impulses get hold of you,
"and there are motives which seem to "justify them, and the public opinion of "your class is in favour of them, and you
"have the power of indulging them."

Some of us know how grandly this ideal of the true soldier was fulfilled in one of our own household of faith, the late Sir Neville Chamberlain. But Maurice was a follower of the Prince of Peace, and the divine calling which he would not deny to the soldier he laboured all his life to set forth as a divine reality for every one.

THE OMISSIONS OF RATIONALISM.

II.—THE MORAL SENSE.

THE Rationalist holds that the improvement in the moral and social conditions of mankind has been due to the exercise of reason and is consequent upon advances in knowledge. In a former article I pointed out that the principal agent in the improvement of the social conditions has been due to sympathy or love. And to this also in a large measure may be traced the improvement in man's moral condition; by moral, as distinguished from social, I mean the improvement of the individual as distinguished from the improvement of the general condition of the community; but the social improvement of the community depends upon the moral improvement of the individual. And, particularly, very often the improvement of the social conditions is consequent upon the moral superiority of a few individuals, who are morally more sensitive than the bulk of the community. Their sympathy not only leads them to feel acutely for the sufferings of others, but their moral sense leads them to regard these sufferings as wrongs.

But this conclusion is not arrived at by a logical process of reasoning; it is intuitive or instinctive, it is felt directly though subsequently it may be justified by evidence. The sufferings, which are further recognised as wrongs, caused by injustice, inhumanity, oppression, extortion, tyranny, cruelty, fraud, robbery in all sorts of shapes, which deprive the poor of the due reward of their labour, which curtail their liberty, which inflict upon them innumerable injuries, arouse in the morally sensitive and sympathetic man not only feelings of pity but of indignation, and he pleads for justice, mercy and freedom, and his pleadings excite the sympathies of other like-minded men; wrongs are remedied or diminished, and not only are particular evils abolished, but a general improvement in moral and social conditions is effected. In other cases in which no direct or intentional wrong is inflicted, society often suffers by the immoral conduct of its members; vices of various kinds prevail, and moral degradation is widespread. Again, it is the moral sense of a few which comes to the rescue; their sorrow and indignation arouse the moral sense of the community and a moral reformation ensues. Mr. McCabe admits that "there have been great outbursts of moral fervour over large districts, and even over whole countries, when the fiery words of some religious teacher have swept over them." (Agnostic Annual, 1905, p. 66.)

Moral feeling, then, is one of the great agents in the improvement of mankind, and whatever may be its origin, and however it may have been developed, for ages it has been instinctive and does not wait for the exercise of reason before it is aroused by the sight of injustice or wickedness. Moral feeling in both of its aspects is admirably and tersely expressed by R. L. Stevenson in one vigorous sentence: "There are some things I cannot do, and some things I will not stand." The sentiment of what Herbert Spencer calls "altruistic justice" may or may not have been developed from the sentiment of egoistic justice, but the importance of the sentiment in the progressive improvement of human conditions cannot be denied. It has destroyed social wrongs, it has cleared away obstructions to progress, it has raised whole communities to a higher level. And yet it is only a "sentiment." But the man who from time to time comes forward in the presence of some great injustice and says he will not stand it is not only a hero but a deliverer and saviour of his kind. It is this impulsive justice which is most effective; theoretical justice, the justification of the impulse upon rational grounds may follow, but that is not the force which moves.

Arguments in favour of justice are undeniably useful, but to effect a reformation more is required. Anger and indignation are often necessary to arouse the feelings of a community to a proper pitch, and the moral sense of a community once aroused is overwhelming. "Man," says Herbert Spencer, somewhere, "is a bundle of passions," and the bad passions cannot always be held in check or overcome by reason, but they can and have been often checked and overcome by good passions; the passions of justice, mercy, freedom have broken the chains of slaves, rescued the weak from oppression, delivered the poor from their misery. In comparison with this, advances in knowledge, the exercise of reason, the weighing of evidence seem tame, cold and ineffectual. Erasmus tried what reasoning would do; Luther himself tried what reasoning could do, but he found it powerless to destroy the corruptions of the Papacy; he had to resort to different means before his purpose could be accomplished. "If he shewed any great severity," said Melancthon, "in combating the enemies of the true doctrine, it was from no malignity of nature, but from ardour and enthusiasm for the truth."

"I care not," said Luther himself, "about being accused of violence, it shall be my glory henceforth to have it said how I rage and storm against the Papists. For more than ten years I have been humiliating myself and speaking them fairly, to what end? Only to exasperate the evil. Well, since they are incorrigible, since there is no longer any hope of shaking their infernal resolutions by kindness, I break with them, and will leave them no rest from my curses till I sink in my grave."

It was not reason, but passion which made the Reformation effective. As men are not always swayed by reason it is not by reason alone they can be improved. Even the politician knows this; when he is dealing with his colleagues he must appeal to their reason, but when he wishes to carry his point with the people he knows he will fail if he does not appeal to their feelings. The religious teacher knows it as well, but both politicians and preachers sometimes make the mistake of appealing to the lower feelings of the people instead of to the higher; but still they recognise the truth that the mass of men have to be moved as well as instructed, to be agitated in order to be persuaded. It is true that sometimes feeling needs to be directed by reason, but it is none the less true that, more often, feeling instinctively finds the right road and goes direct to the proper end. It would have been a sorry thing for the human race if it had had to wait for the "Rationalists" of the twentieth century to show it the right road in its pursuit of the moral life. Their criticisms of some by-products of religious belief may be very useful in their way, but the manner in which they ignore the part which moral feeling has played in the improvement of mankind seems to show a great neglect of the study of history and of human nature.

WALTER LLOYD.

WHAT is wrong? It has been the unfortunate experience of two inquiring non-Unitarians to visit three of our churches in London on recent Sunday evenings, only to be met by closed doors, notice-boards giving the time of evening service, and no information as to its discontinuance or date of re-opening. This is not encouraging to those who are trying to get into closer touch with Unitarianism. Responsible officials should see that their work is properly done.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A SEASIDE HOLIDAY.—VI.

ELSIE and Mab left the boys and Uncle Ned to continue their search among the rock pools, and went towards the tent to prepare for their bathe. As they approached it they saw Mrs. Holden and Maggie waiting for them. Maggie, who was an expert swimmer, was going to join the two younger girls in their bathe, and give them such instructions in swimming as they needed. Nip also was waiting eagerly for an excuse to plunge in and show them that he also was a swimmer.

As the tide was by this time very far out the girls had to run a considerable distance from the tent to reach the water, and this they enjoyed greatly, as the moist sand was pleasantly cool to their bare feet.

When they reached the water's edge, they found the little waves languidly breaking with hardly any commotion at all, as if they were overcome by the warmth of the day, and were too tired to exert themselves.

The three girls waded out some distance until they were in water deep enough for floating and swimming, and then Maggie gave the two learners directions as to how to float, and the best swimming strokes. They were both very eager to learn, and the calmness of the water enabled them to make rapid progress. Altogether they were less boisterous at first than the boys had been in the early morning; but I believe they enjoyed their dip just as much, and when Mrs. Holden came down to the water's edge to tell them it was time to come out, they, like the boys, begged for "five minutes more," and I regret to say that she relented and gave them the extra time. Then, instead of continuing their swimming practice, they began frolicking and chasing each other, tumbling and splashing, greatly to the delight and excitement of Nip, who had been thinking them rather slow before.

At last, when the extra five minutes were up, the girls lay down on the sand at the water's edge, and allowed a wave to roll up and break over them and then flow back, leaving them to jump up and run to the tent in as great a state of delight with their first bathe as the boys had been.

Meanwhile, Uncle Ned and his party followed the retreating tide further out, and out, to dead low water, finding many objects of rare beauty and interest. Some of the rarest were found in a large shallow pool, into which Uncle Ned waded in order to raise and overturn some large flat stones, which lay at the bottom, on the undersides of which the sharp eyes of the boys discovered many prizes; sea urchins and brittle stars, beautiful sea slugs, and still more beautiful many-jointed worms, glowing with all the colours of the rainbow.

But of all the creatures found, none delighted Uncle Ned more than some lovely rosy-feather-stars, which he found lying curled up in a nook of the rock, and which had to be got out with great care. These wonderful creatures are very delicate and fragile, their arms, or rays, of which they possess ten, will break off if at all roughly handled. The body, in the centre, is something like an ornamental vest button, nearly as large as a three-penny-piece. From this central body the ten arms branch out, each about three inches long and made up of about forty joints. From each joint a side ray, also jointed, branches off, so that each arm is like the pinnacle of a fern, only, instead of being green, it is a delicate transparent rosy pink in colour, and it can move and bend itself into most graceful and perfect curves. Of all the living creatures to be found in the rockpools I think hardly one is more marvellous in form, colour, and structure than the rosy-feather-star.

So keenly interested were our four pool-hunters that they were surprised and startled by a wave which came rolling in, re-filling the half-empty pool, where they were capturing the feather-stars, and warning them that the tide had turned and was now rising, and that, for the next two weeks, the pool would not again be bare and approachable.

"We were indeed fortunate in finding these beauties, boys; they can only be found at dead low spring tide, and that is why I wanted to be here to-day," said Uncle Ned.

"But can't we come again to-morrow?" said Frank, who was keenly interested in natural history, and who had been in a state of great delight all the morning.

"Yes, but we shall have to be content with the pools higher up to-morrow, and, indeed, for the next fortnight," answered Uncle Ned. "Still they contain many more wonderful things than we shall have time to deal with!"

Whilst they lingered and talked another wave came, and drove them yet further back, and then another, and another, so that, bit by bit, they had to retreat until they came once more to the "anemone pool," as Charlie named it. Here they could not resist the temptation to have another admiring look at the lovely rocky cavern and its gorgeous inhabitants, and Uncle Ned, with his chisel and hammer, knocked off a corner of rock on which was an anemone, and another on which a tuft of coralline weed was growing. These were at once transferred to the big jar of sea water, and then the four naturalists hastened to join the girls who, after their bathe, had been carrying out Mab's suggestion of a lie down in the tent shade, watching the white summer clouds sail past and day-dreaming.

As it was now nearly time for lunch the whole party trooped back to Brookside, well pleased with their morning's experiences and captures.

"And what are we to do this afternoon, Uncle Ned?" the children asked.

"Well, we have found so many things in the rock pools that I must spend it in the ogre's den dealing with our prizes," answered Uncle Ned. "I think the rest of you had better do just what you like until tea, at half-past five, after which there will be a great exhibition of marine marvels in the den, to which you are all invited, free of charge, but you must come in slippers and quietest manners."

"Hurrah!" "How delightful!" "What shall you do this afternoon?" "Where shall we go?" These were the exclamations and questions of Ernest and the girls. Frank and Charlie, however, said nothing; what they very much desired was to be allowed to remain with Uncle Ned and watch his proceedings with the specimens.

Over lunch, Mr. Holden asked the children if they would like to walk with him and Mrs. Holden to a small fishing village, which lay on the other side of the hill opposite Brookside, about two miles off. Ernest and the two girls said "Yes!" eagerly, but Frank and Charlie looked at each other and remained silent.

"Don't you want to go too?" Uncle Ned asked them.

"No! We want you to let us stay and watch your preparations — will you, please? We'll be very quiet," said Frank, and Charlie echoed the wish, and said it would be a great treat to see Uncle Ned's manner of dealing with the living specimens.

Now, although Uncle Ned preferred to be quite alone when he was doing work of this kind, he could not resist the pleading of the two youths, so he said they might stay "and help him." Then, turning to Ernest he said, "I want you to help me too. Will you, laddie? I want you to take a message to a fisherman named Joe Kelly who lives in the village. Anyone will direct you to his cottage. When you have found him, ask him to come round to the bay with the nicest of his sailing boats next Monday morning, at nine o'clock, if the weather is fine and the sea not rough. We shall want him and his boat all the day, tell him, as we propose to do some fishing and tow netting."

Ernest, who had looked a little glum when Frank and Charlie got permission to remain with Uncle Ned and he did not, brightened up at once, and promised to deliver the message. He was proud and glad that he had been entrusted with it, and felt very important in having to make arrangements for a day's sailing and fishing.

So all things having been satisfactorily fixed up, they all rested for half an hour in the garden, and then divided into two parties—Mr. Holden's "walkers" and Uncle Ned's "workers"—each party going its own way until tea time.

T. ROBINSON.

THE recital of the Apostles' Creed at the international meetings of the Baptists, recently held in London, gave Earl Nelson "the greatest possible satisfaction." Writing in Church Bells on the subject of "Home Reunion," he expresses the belief that the Congregationalists would be ready to go and do likewise, and so also the Wesleyans. In regard to the English Presbyterians, he thinks that if they would recite the Apostles' Creed at all their meetings it "would be a great panacea against the drifting into Unitarianism." The English Presbyterians drifted that way long before Earl Nelson was born; and, as for the Presbyterians now in England, the drift towards Unitarianism is quite as strong among Baptists and Congregationalists, and among not a few Anglicans. The noble Earl must look round for some more effectual "panacea."

QUIET in inquietude, calm and silent in the rising tides of death, untroubled, undefeated, blessed and blessing, behold the perfect repose of the saint in "God our home."—P. C. Mozoomdar.

MUSINGS.

By a Minister.

XXVIII.

VALENTINUS asks me to explain more fully what I mean when I say that there is much that is humorous in the Bible. Is it that he is a little shocked? Does he think that humour and seriousness cannot go together? Truth, said Horace long ago, may be told in jest. And there is a way of looking at it deeper still. A clergyman once wrote to Kingsley as to the possibility of a sense of humour in the Creator, and Kingsley's answer was that he did not see why the possibility should be denied. This is not a thought that I care to pursue, though there is so much evidence of pleasantry in creation—of fun in nature—that it would not be difficult to follow it further. The thing to be asserted is rather this, that there is no unworthiness in the sense of the ridiculous, though there may be unworthiness in the way in which we are affected by it. Moreover, there are laughable things which, to use Augustus Hare's happy paradox, are "pathetically ridiculous," and then smiles, as he says, are as near to sorrow as tears. The humour of the Bible is of this softened kind, and it is the good-humouredness of it that makes us forget that it is humour.

To the Hebrew mind nothing was more pathetically ludicrous than idolatry. Pity and derision run together through the passages which deal with it. The helplessness of the idol is a point often seized. He must be set in a wall, and fastened with chains, that he may not fall; when he falls, his fall is as grotesquely pitiable as fall can be. Carried in procession to-day, to-morrow he is part of a bundle put together for hasty flight. In the end he is cast to the moles and the bats. The manufacture of idols is touched in the same light way; the interior of the factory is exposed with indulgent glee; but you cannot miss the absurdity of deities made by their worshippers, planted before they are made, and furnishing fuel in the making; of limbs which cannot be moved, of organs which cannot be used; and raillery reaches, for once, an almost boisterous height in the mocking excuses made for unheeding Baal.

Sloth also is a mark for many shafts. The sluggard's hands, now folded, now hidden, his broken wall, his over-grown field, his swinging door, and, most of all, his weak excuses, are all turned against him to his own confusion.

The failings of women, it must be confessed, are more severely handled, their vanities and affectations almost caricatured. One prophet, with deliberate minuteness, gives an inventory of feminine adornments, twenty-one in number; hoping, it would seem, in this daring way, to laugh the love of dress and jewellery out of fashion. Next to frivolity in public, nothing is so grievous to Eastern gravity as the disturbance of domestic peace, and for this reason many jests are levelled at scolding wives. There is a glimmer of sad, yet half-amused, experience in some of these sayings—in this, for instance, of the Son of Sirach: "As the going up a sandy way is to the feet of the aged, so is a wife full of words to a quiet man."

On the other hand, the "fool" in Scripture is always a man. He is a contemptible figure, and more than redresses the balance. It is better to meet a bear robbed of her whelps than to fall in with him; his lughter is as the crackling of thorns under a pot; his eyes are in the ends of the earth; his heart is at his left-hand; a parable in his mouth is like a lame man's legs, or a thorn in a drunkard's hand, or a gem in a heap of stones; brayed in a mortar, his foolishness will not leave him; to teach him is to glue a potsherd together.

It is pleasant to turn to the witty comparisons drawn from animal life. Ill-gotten gains are like a partridge's unhatched eggs; to be cruelly forgetful is to act the ostrich, whose wings are strong, but unkindly; a harried land is like a speckled bird beset by her fellows; the sluggard should go to school to the ant; the spider (lizard?) is little, but wise, and makes her way into king's palaces; to interfere in a quarrel is to take a dog by the ears; those who oppose heaven's will are like shepherds shouting at a lion; the wicked can as little be tamed as the deaf adder can be charmed; to threaten the unresisting is to hunt a flea; a wise man may lose all his credit through a little folly, as ointment may lose all its sweetness through a dead fly; those who can act together voluntarily are like the banded locusts who have no king; to old age troubles, light as grasshoppers, are a burden; the never satisfied might be the two daughters of the horseleech (vampire?), crying, Give, Give.

It is the humour in a proverb that makes it live, and there are proverbs so familiar in their English dress that we have forgotten their Jewish origin: Riches make themselves wings; In vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird; Lean not on a broken reed; The washed sow turns to her wallowing in the mire; If ye had not plowed with my heifer, ye had not found out my riddle; Wine is a mocker; The ass knoweth his master's crib; A living dog is better than a dead lion; A bird of the air shall carry the voice; Where the tree falleth, there it shall be. There are many more proverbial expressions which do not fail in wit, though they sometimes lack brevity: Be not as a lion in thy house; What fellowship shall the earthen pot have with the kettle; Poor men are pasture for the rich; A slip on a pavement is better than a slip with the tongue; As a jewel of gold in a swine's snout is a fair woman without discretion; Whose trust shall be a spider's web; No doubt wisdom shall die with you; Doth the wild ass bray when he hath grass? I have said to the worm, Thou art my mother; He trusteth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth; Canst thou play with leviathan as with a bird? They have sold the needy for a pair of shoes; Ephraim is a cake not turned.

The fable—fancy's fairest child—can hardly be said to have a place in Hebrew literature; its ludicrous associations, and the violence of attributing human qualities to lower animals, made it unsuitable for higher teaching; but there is true Æsopic humour in the two stories of talking trees in the Old Testament, and in the story of trees and waves taking counsel in the Apocrypha. And here and there in plain narrative traces of playful suggestion appear, and especially in description of living characters, as in the presentation of Samson and Goliath and Balaam and Ahab and Jehoiakim and Haman and Nebuchadnezzar.

This, then, by way of illustration of Jewish humour. I hope to convince Valentinus, another day, that the vein which runs through the Old Testament is not altogether lost in the New.

SHORT NOTICES.

From the De La More Press we have received two volumes of the "King's Classics," issued under the general editorship of Professor Gollancz: The Gull's Hornbook, by Thomas Dekker (1609), edited by R. B. McKerrow (1s. net); and the Memoirs of Robert Cary, Earl of Monmouth (1560–1639), edited by G. H. Powell (1s. 6d. net); also two volumes of the "King's Novels," edited with introductions by Dr. Richard Garnett: George Eliot's Silas Marner, a charming edition (2s. 6d. net); and The Household of Sir Thomas More, by Anne Manning (1s. 6d. net). The little books are beautifully printed and attractively bound. (Alexander Moring, Ltd., 32, George-street, Hanover-square.)

Immortality, and Other Sermons. By the Rev. A. W. Momerie, M.A., D.Sc., LL.D. 4th edition. This is the volume published four years ago by his widow after the author's death. In addition to the sermons on the main theme indicated by the title, it contains an address on "My Position in the Church," delivered by Dr. Momerie in October, 1898, on the first Sunday of his services in the Portman Rooms, and also another brief sermon on "Broad Churchism," delivered at the same place, October 7, 1900, after the disappointment of his hope as to Berkeley Chapel, Mayfair. (Allenson. 3s. 6d. Popular edition, 6d.)

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Lewins Mead.—On August 18, at the Domestic Mission, Montague-street, Mr. J. B. Robinson was presented with a travelling case as a mark of appreciation of his unwearied labour and untiring energy in directing the musical services at the Mission during the past four years, with the hope that God's richest blessing may attend him in his new sphere of labour at Shepton Mallet. Mr. W. G. Fry, the organist, made the presentation on behalf of the choir, and Mr. Robinson very feelingly responded, thanking the choir most heartily for their beautiful present, saying it would always be a constant reminder of the many happy hours spent with them. The members of the mothers' meeting presented Mrs. Robinson with a hand bag as an appreciation of her kindness to them.

London: Kilburn (Appointment).—The Rev. Charles Roper, B.A., of Moss Side, Manchester, has accepted an invitation to the pastorate of Quex Road, and will take up his duties in December next.

Manchester: Willert-street Mission.—A sale of work will be held on Saturday next, to be opened by the Mayor, Sir T. T. Shann, at 3 p.m. (see advertisement column). The object is to raise a substantial sum to help on the very necessary work of extension, which it is hoped will be commenced early next spring. Contributions in goods or money will be very acceptable.

Portsmouth: St. Thomas's Street.—A very large congregation was present on Sunday evening, including many of the former friends of our cause, to hear Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, a collection being made on behalf of the General Baptist Assembly. In the afternoon the rev. gentleman addressed the Portsmouth P.S.A. Mr. Bond presided. One gentleman offered to take 100 copies of the address if the speaker would have it printed. The chairman also offered to take 100 copies, so the consent was readily given. Friends wishing for copies please send P.O. to T. Bond, 19, Hanover-street, Portsea.

To steady fidelity come steady growth and enlarging vision, as surely as the harvest follows the sowing.—G. S. Merriam.

FREDERICK LONG, Manager.

"Never writer wrote with deeper conviction than George Gissing; every sentence has come straight from the heart, and this fact alone, apart from its artistic merit, gives a poignancy and strength to his work which separates it at once from the common ruck of novel-writing. These books are terrible arraignments of life—their peculiar characteristic is this poignancy, this painting of life at its moments of unbearable crisis. Between misery and despair lies a whole world of difference; misery is what can be endured—despair is the unbearable, and George Gissing is the spokesman of Despair." —Jane H. Findlater, in the National Review.

"Fate set him for his life-task the study of the swarming miseries of our human ant-heaps and the pettinesses of our mortal nature. . 'The Nether World,' 'New Grub Street,' 'Demos,' 'The Odd Women,' 'The Whirlpool,'—these are all monumental titles, mighty themes. None of his contemporaries in England—only Zola and Tolstoi anywhere else—even attempted to wrestle with such big canvases, and if Gissing did not always rise to the height of his great argument, the conception was at least Herculean."—I. Zangwill, in To-Day.

PEACE.

THAT was the joyful word passed from one to another on Wednesday morning last week. Peace, a message echoed with the greater gladness, because the nations had almost despaired of any good result from the Conference at Portsmouth. The news came to us at Geneva, and added a deeper note to the thanksgiving in that morning's Cathedral service. The preacher having spoken in his sermon of the true freedom, to be gained in the spirit of Christ, through love and self-sacrifice, gave thanks in his closing prayer for the glad tidings that had come, and the International Congress, meeting immediately afterwards in the University, joined with its President in fervent rejoicing, and sent messages of congratulation to President ROOSEVELT for the beneficent part he had played in securing the happy result, and to the MIKADO and the TSAR, rejoicing that Russia and Japan were once more at peace. Again and again throughout the day reference was made to this triumph of wisdom and moderation, as when the venerable Hyacinthe Loyson turned aside in his discourse to ask why we spoke of the Japanese as heathen, who, with the glory of their victorious arms had covered themselves with the greater glory of a people magnanimous in making peace, and when, at the evening reception, Charles Wagner and Edwin Mead joined their voices in ardent expressions of thankfulness.

On Tuesday afternoon this week the Treaty of Peace was actually signed at Portsmouth, and we can realise more clearly what has been accomplished. After eighteen months, the war between the two great Powers in the Far East, unexampled in the magnitude of the carnage and suffering it involved, is at an end. It has been an object-lesson to Europe, which, we must earnestly trust, will not be without lasting effect for good.

Now we can realise, as never before, what present-day warfare between two great Powers must mean, and in particular what an awful thing a great naval conflict must be. And another most salutary result of this war is that Europe now sees a new Power risen in the East, which commands respect, and can put a check upon the greed and violence of nations professing to be Christian, whose dealings in the Far East have too often brought disgrace upon the great name they bear. We may feel it a humiliation to be compelled to greater justice by superior force, but the fact remains that Japan is now teaching Christian Europe lessons which it has been lamentably slow to learn.

Speculation has been rife as to what it was which actually induced the MIKADO and his Elder Statesmen so unexpectedly to agree to the conclusion of peace, giving up the very natural claim to an indemnity, and allowing Russia to retain so much, which an overbearing Power would have insisted on wresting from a defeated foe. There appears to be some popular discontent in Japan, on the ground that too much had been conceded; but the really substantial things have been secured, and it is the more noble in the victors to be willing to pay the heavy price of relinquishing the money claim rather than let the war drag on for months and perhaps years to come, with its hideous carnage, and the long train of misery which follows for victor and defeated alike.

Wisdom, moderation, magnanimity, these seem to be the lessons of the hour, which "Christian" Europe may learn from the statesmen of Japan. May the lesson be taken to heart in Russia, for the welfare of her suffering people, and in all the nations who have still so much to learn of self-control and mutual consideration, to secure the concord of the world. In any case, let the motive have been what it may, the great word of Peace is spoken, and over this the people of all nations must rejoice.

THE GENEVA CONGRESS.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

THE third biennial meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers was held at Geneva, from Monday to Thursday of last week, August 28-31. Established at Boston, on occasion of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the American Unitarian Association, at Whitsuntide, 1900, the first International Meeting was held in London, 1901; the second at Amsterdam, 1903. The Geneva meeting worthily maintained the tradition of fraternal cordiality, of lofty aspiration, and unity of spirit, established by the previous meetings. Eleven different nationalities were represented, and fifty-four different religious associations, so the zealous general secretary, the Rev. C. W. Wendte, reckoned; there were members present from twenty-two different church connections. About 500 members took part in the meetings, and a considerable number of others had given in their adhesion, but were unable to be present. The Cathedral services, especially the opening service on Monday evening, were attended by large congregations, in addition to the members of the Council.

The countries represented were Switzerland, France, Germany, Holland, Belgium, Italy, Hungary, India, Japan, Great Britain, and America. Prof. A. Chantre, of Geneva, was President d'honneur of the Congress, and Prof. Montet, Dean of the Theological Faculty of Geneva, the working President. Among the Swiss representatives were Dr. E. Rochat, secretary of the local committee, and M. J. Roux-Eggly, the treasurer; the venerable M. Hyacinthe Loyson, of Geneva, Professor Furrer (preacher of the German sermon), Professor Schmiedel, and the Rev. G. Schönholzer, of Zurich, and the Rev. A. Altherr, of Basle, President of the Swiss Verein für freies Christentum. From France, the Rev. E. Roberty and Professor Jean Réville represented the Délégation libérale, with whom were also Professor Albert Réville, of the Collège de France; the Rev. Charles Wagner, of Paris; the Rev. A. Reyss, editor of Le Protestant; Rev. A. Bourrier, of Sèvres, editor of the Chrétien Français; Rabbi L. G. Levy, of Dijon; the Abbé Houtin, of Paris, and others. Germany sent only a few representatives, but Professor Pfleiderer, of Berlin, was a host in himself; and Professor Harnack sent a cordial message. So did Herr Direktor Schrader, President of the Protestantenverein, which was represented by its secretary, Dr. Websky, editor of the Protestantische Monatshefte. The Netherlands Protestantenbond was represented by Miss M. van Berlekom, the Rev. J. van Loenen Martinet, editor of De Hervorming, and Dr. C. J. Niemeyer, the secretary; and the Remonstrant Community by Professor H. Y. Groenewegen. Among others who came from Holland were Professors B. D. Eerdmans and F. Pijper, of Leiden; Professor Meyboom, of Groningen; and the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz, of Amsterdam; Professor Oort, of Leiden, who was President at Amsterdam, sent a cordial message of greeting and regret for absence. The Revs. J. Hocart, of Brussels, and A. Rey, of Liège, were among the Belgian representatives; while from Italy came Dr. Tony André, of Florence; and from Hungary, Dr. George Boros, of Koloszvar, and the Rev. N. Jozan, of Budapest, with others. The Indian representatives were Professor B. Nath Sen, of Calcutta, and Mr. V. A. Sukhtankar, of Bombay, recently the Brahmo student at Manchester College, Oxford, now continuing his studies in Germany. Islam was represented by Mr. Abd El-Hakim, of Fez, Councillor at the Court of Morocco; and among the party from England was Mr. Toko Murakami, of Japan. The American contingent included Dr. M. J. Savage, of New York (preacher of the English sermon); the Hon. S. J. Barrows; the Rev. C. E. St. John, secretary of the American Unitarian Association; President Southworth, of Meadville; Mrs. Hackley, founder of the Hackley School, N.Y; Mr. Edwin D. Mead, President of the Free Religious Association; Rev. J. W. Day, of St. Louis; Rev. C. W. Wendte, the general secretary. It had been hoped that Professor F. G. Peabody, Dean of the Harvard Theological School, who is in Europe, would be present, but he was prevented from coming, and the Rev. S. A. Eliot, President of the American Unitarian Association, also sent a message of warm greeting and regret for absence. From England came a party of over 220. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association was represented by two vice-presidents, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., and Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe, nine members of the Committee, and eleven other members of the Council, and the secretary, Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. The National Conference was represented by its president, Mr. W. B. Bowring; the vice-president, Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter; and the secretary, the Rev. James Harwood; while fourteen local associations were represented and seven other bodies, including the Sunday-school Association, by its president, the Rev. C. Hargrove, and Miss M. Pritchard, vice-president. Of English ministers, in addition to the above-named, there were present the Revs. Dendy Agate, V. D. Davis, S. Farrington, F. K. Freeston, J. L. Haigh, Alfred Hall, W. Harrison, W. H. Lambelle, W. Lindsay, R. Lyttle, J. McDowell, J. J. Marten, T. Paxton, W. R. Shanks, T. P. Spedding, F. W. Stanley, C. J. Street, F. Summers, W. G. Tarrant, L. Tavener, F. H. Vaughan, E. A. Voysey, J. Wain, Joseph Wood, F. Wood, and W. Wooding. Dr. Baart de la Faille represented the Dutch Church in London.

The sessions of the Council were held in the Aula of the University, where, in the Professors' Room on the ground floor, the local committee also had its office. From the University, across the pleasant gardens and up the hill to the Cathedral, was a short walk, and the rooms of the Literary Society, in the Corraterie, where the Monday evening reception was held, and the Palais Eynard, the scene of the Wednesday evening conversazione, were still nearer at hand. Nor was it far to the quay from which the steamer started for the Tuesday evening excursion on the lake; while a convenient tram or the electric launch across the lake took many of the guests to the final banquet on Thursday evening in the Parc des Eaux-Vives. If there was any drawback in the arrangements, beyond the broken weather, it was the narrowness of space at the Literary Society's rooms for the crowd which thronged to the reception; but there was no drawback in the happy spirit which prevailed throughout the week nor in the warm hospitality of our Genevan hosts.

MONDAY, AUGUST 28.

Members arrived at Geneva for the most part on the previous Saturday, and of the special service for the English contingent in the Chapel of the Maccabees, conducted by the Revs. C. Hargrove and Joseph Wood, we wrote last week. Monday morning and afternoon saw the committee room in the University busy with the issue of membership tickets, and the ready furnishing of information of many kinds to the visitors.

The Opening Service.

The actual proceedings of the Congress opened on Monday evening at eight o'clock, with an impressive service in the Cathedral of St. Peter, conducted by the Rev. E. Roberty, the eloquent liberal preacher of Paris. The "stiff-backed chair of Calvin," to which we referred last week, and which on Saturday occupied its accustomed place beneath the pulpit, had been removed, doubtless from no symbolic motive, but in expectation of the crowded congregation, which did, in fact, fill all the space within reach of the preacher's voice. There must have been at least a thousand people present.

The whole of the service was in French; and, while the congregation stood for the opening invocation and the prayer, the hymns were sung sitting. So also at the German service on Wednesday morning. On Thursday the congregation stood up to sing the English hymns. The book used on Monday was the revised Psautier Romand of the National Protestant Churches of Neuchatel, Geneva, and Berne, issued in 1899.

After the opening invocation, the first and last stanzas of the version of Psalm cxviii were sung—"O give thanks unto the Lord, for He is good; for His mercy endureth for ever,"—and then M. Roberty read lessons from John xv.: "This is my commandment, that ye love one another," and from Gal. v.: "Ye, brethren, were called for freedom." An earnest prayer followed, and, after the singing of the first two verses of Luther's hymn, "A mighty fortress is our God," the sermon. It was a very striking utterance. The preacher, with his keen face, grey-bearded, robed and with the white bands upon his black gown, as he rose to the height of his impassioned eloquence, in word and gesture alike, recalled pictures of John Knox preaching before Queen Mary; but there was no threatening in this sermon; it was aglow with the holier passion of freedom and charity, and its whole burden was against anathema, making for those fruits of the Spirit, which are love, joy, peace.

The text was from Rev. xxii. 3: "There shall be no curse any more." The preacher recalled, at the outset, the great memories of the cathedral in which they were met, so significant in connection with the spirit and purpose of their gathering—the proclamation of the Reformation from that pulpit, and of the establishment of the Academy, of which Beza was the first teacher, for the education of ministers, out of which their University had grown; the welcome given to refugees from France, Italy, and other countries in the days of persecution. Other memories there were, of the days of Calvin, and they rejoiced now in the progress of freedom and the victory of a milder spirit, so that now heretics from every quarter of the globe, could gather there for worship and bear their witness to truth. The sublime prophecy of the Apocalypse was that in the new city of God there should be no more injustice, no more anathema or curse; no one, on account of doctrine, should be shut out from communion either with God or man. Thankfully they came together as enemies of fanaticism, and recognised how far that prophecy was now fulfilled in the victory of the spirit of truth. There were those who thought that the scientific spirit could not be reconciled with ardent religious faith, but he pointed to what he held to be the true way of reconciliation. Criticism of history and of dogma had done their work; they sought for a theology scientific and philosophical, and yet faith remained, a practical need of the spirit. That faith they would preserve as they entered into the full meaning and the mystery of personality; it would be not merely a negative faith, but strong in the power of will and of love. The dangers of Protestant individualism were escaped as they realised the life of true humanity, at one in God; and to that end they must preserve their living communion with Christ, because in him they found the fullest personal life, and the mystery of the divine in man. In that communion they found health of spirit and a true human brotherhood. The prophet's answer to the cry: "Watchman, what of the night?" was enigmatical. "The day cometh, but the night cometh also." "Yes," said the preacher, "if you neglect communion with Christ, you compromise the future of the church, and the night will come. But if you consecrate yourselves practically, personally, in family and in the state, to that communion with Christ, in fellowship with his spirit, then the day will come—the great day in which there shall be no curse any more!"

This is a most imperfect attempt to catch the drift of the sermon, which we must hope that M. Roberty will be able to reproduce for our perusal, though no printed word can recall the fervour and dramatic eloquence of his appeal. A hymn of invocation to Jesus as King and Saviour followed the sermon, and then a prayer to the Father ("Thou knowest in what spirit we have sung that hymn"), the Lord's Prayer and Benediction, brought the service to a close.

The Reception of Delegates.

From the cathedral members made their way through drenching rain to the Rooms of the Literary Society in the Corraterie. There, in the course of the evening, PROFESSOR MONTET, on behalf of the Genevan Committee, offered a very hearty welcome to their guests. The Rev. CHARLES WAGNER, of Paris, well-known as the author of "The Simple Life" and other popular books, was the first to respond. Mounting on a high stool in the midst of the crowded room, the genial Alsatian beamed upon the company. "The tribune is narrow," he said, "but the heart is large." He stretched out his hands to brothers unknown, and rejoiced in the unity which brought them all together, by different ways, with their different thoughts, yet all to one end and as one family.

The Rev. P. H. HUGENHOLTZ replied for Holland, and spoke of the close ties which united them with Switzerland, the two little countries, strong in democratic principles, having both owed much to the old Calvinism, and now rejoicing in liberal government and political and social progress.

The Rev. N. JOZAN, of Budapest, replied in English for Hungary, delivering the greetings of the Koloszvár Consistory and Bishop Ferencz. They were thankful, he said, for the aspiration after higher thoughts which had brought them together there. A torch had been lighted at Boston, it had been handed on to London, and to Amsterdam, and now was aglow in Geneva, not to burn heretics, but to kindle the hearts of men with living fire, in the fear of God.

Professor PLEIDERER, of Berlin, who spoke in German, said he rejoiced in that council of heretics meeting in the city of Calvin and Rousseau. Calvin, with his strong character, secured the freedom of the Gospel for his church, yet bound on it the fetters of the letter. Then, two centuries later, came Rousseau, who secured freedom for man—freedom of heart and conscience; freedom from all political, social, and church conventions. The cry, "Back to Nature," had, perhaps, nowhere such deep influence as in his own country; their greatest spirits had been pupils of Rousseau. They had realised the significance of a free personality on which their preacher that evening had laid so much stress. Their present problem was to determine how such a free individual might be a member of an organised society. It was a question for the State, and it was now the greatest question for religion. Whether their preacher had given the right answer he was the less ready to say, because he was not sure that he had fully caught his meaning. He did not think there was one simple solution of the problem, but a modus vivendi they would surely find. They must live together, man to man, respecting one another, if possible loving one another. That was the true way for people of all countries, and it was the way in religion. Their meetings in that Council must help to that end.

Mr. V. A. SUKHTANKAR replied on behalf of India, delivering the greetings of the Brahmo Samaj—greetings, as he said, from the Himalayas to the Alps. The Spirit of God was working for liberty, old barriers of traditon and national pride were being broken down. In the name of that universal faith, which they cherished in the Brahmo Samaj, Hindus of the Hindus, but also close to the Christian spirit, he came to that gathering, as one of those working, from different traditions, but for the same cause, in the search for truth, and for the establishment of God's kingdom on earth.

The Rev. C. E. ST. JOHN, secretary of the American Unitarian Association, brought "with both hands and a full heart" the greetings of their friends across the Atlantic. The Unitarians in the United States and Canada, he said, had fought a good fight for freedom, and were stronger to-day than ever. The days of controversy over creeds were past. They held to their Unitarianism in no sectarian fashion, but with absolute hopefulness, setting aside the supernatural and miraculous, feeling deeply the bond which united their souls with the heavenly Father, with abundant faith in the ever-present power of God and the bright vision of the immortality of every living soul. A Unitarian church was simply a body of people brought together by the common purpose to make the world purer, sweeter, more beautiful, as God's world, regardless of creed, respecting every man's honest opinion. They might be little churches, but they were full of hope for all, full of faith, each doing its own work.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE responded on behalf of England, and delivered the greetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. They must have been of dull mind and cold heart, he said, if they could have taken part unmoved in that great service in the beautiful cathedral. They were touched by one common feeling, inspired by the same ideals of life and duty, the same faith and hope and love. He still felt as though it were a dream. When, as a youth, some thirty years ago, he left the Calvinistic Church of Scotland, it would have seemed to him impossible that he should so have worshipped with many brethren in the church of Calvin; but they were moving on, and the world was moving. The meetings of that Council had been a great gain to them, and had brought them many new friends. To none were they more indebted, or more drawn in love and admiration, than to their friend Professor Montet, who had done such splendid work for those meetings. They who came from the British Isles came not as Englishmen, but as brethren.

These various speeches were a happy reflex of the spirit which prevailed throughout the week.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 29.

At nine o'clock on Tuesday morning the first session of the Council opened, in the Aula of the University, with the Lord's Prayer, repeated by a venerable minister, the Rev. L. Audemars, of Lausanne.

PROFESSOR CHANTRE, as Président d' honneur, then delivered the opening address. Having welcomed the members of the Congress, he said Unitarians ought to feel at home in Geneva. From the earliest days of the Reformation Unitarianism had set itself against the Trinitarian theology; and, though Calvin made short work of it, scattering its representatives to the four winds, there came a change, when, after a century and a half, Turrettini broke the yoke of the Calvinistic Confession of faith. Then the Reformed Church in Geneva moved in the direction of Arminianism, on to Unitarianism. In the second half of the eighteenth century the great majority of the ministers in Geneva were Unitarians. The revival at the beginning of the nineteenth century, beneficent in many respects, brought a doctrinal reaction to the creeds of the sixteenth century; yet Unitarianism was not supplanted in the church, and now many who professed semi-orthodox or evangelical opinions were not really Trinitarians.

The Unitarianism of to-day was not merely opposition to an article of the ancient creed. Its horizon was infinitely wider; it represented free and independent theology, repudiating authoritative creeds, enthusiastically welcoming the religion of the spirit. It desired that the Church should be founded as truly on liberty of thought as on a personal, vital, and active faith. They held to genuine freedom of thought, declaring that Truth must come first, and that there must be absolute sincerity in religion. And he continued:—

"Free Thinkers, sincere Men, we are at the same time and in the best sense of the word religious men, Christians. The essential principle of religion, as Vinet has well said, is outside dogma; it is time to make this principle clear, to draw from it its inferences, to proclaim that a man is religious not by the creeds he professes, but by the direction in which his conscience and life are turned. The religious soul is the soul constantly turned toward the ideal; its impress it bears within itself, as no vain dream, no flower without root, but the higher law in man, the mark of his destiny, and, at the same time, the sovereign order of the universe, the energy which shall one day triumph over all opposition, the will which is leading the world towards its supreme goal, the ideal—in a word, God. That, in its essence, is our religion—as firm on its own foundation as it is respectful towards the rights of thought; that, I say, is our faith. It nourishes itself on the words, the thought, and the spirit of Jesus of Nazareth, recognised by us in the dignity and greatness of his spiritual personality as it stands out from the tradition of the first century of the Christian era, independent of Church dogma. In him we find religion exalted to the height of morals and morals exalted to the height of religion, a mysticism as healthy as it is profound, calming the soul, and, at the same time, illuminating and inspiring, allied as it is to the most effective motive of individual and social activity. In a word, we find in him the secret of life, and so we joyfully confess him before men. Many amongst our contemporaries who are animated by the same aspirations after the ideal and urged on by the imperative desire to realise it in the midst of the world, do not confess his name; yet we extend to them also the right hand of fellowship, because the unity we seek is that of the spirit, not of opinions.''

More complete unity, he said in conclusion, would come through the natural attraction of sincere feeling, in the encounter of individual beliefs, purged in the crucible of science and experience. That Congress, he trusted, would throw their principles into clearer relief, dissipate prejudice and misunderstanding, and strengthen them in the endeavour to render the world in which their lot was cast happier and purer. He offered them a cordial welcome.

Professor Montet's Address.

Professor MONTET, who was the working President of the Congress, followed with a more extended address, in which he referred to the founding of that Council, on May 25, 1900, and the progress it had made, in carrying out its object: ''To open communication with those in all lands who are striving to unite pure religion and perfect liberty, and to increase fellowship and co-operation among them.'' The need of a Christianity, at once vital and broad, was felt, he said, more and more. There were many souls, both in Europe and in America, and beyond these two continents, who felt profoundly the need of faith, but of faith unshackled; and as representing that position he referred to two distinguished teachers of theirs, both closely associated with Geneva—Auguste Bouvier, who had been a Professor in their University; and Auguste Sabatier, who had been a warm supporter of their Theological Faculty, and had been heard there as a lecturer. They two were inspirers of free religious thought in French speaking countries. They represented in the heart of liberal Christianity two different tendencies; they formulated diverse systems of dogma; but the method they adopted, the spirit with which they were animated, and the religion they professed and lived were the same, viz.:—the scientific method, the broad Christian spirit; the religion of Jesus. Bouvier, Professor Montet spoke of as a deeply religious soul, who sought to express what was fundamental in his nature in his theory of ''The Divine Life.'' This he conceived sometimes as the immanent God and sometimes as the evolution of the divine in man and the universe. That conception was to him the foundation of all religion, and it implied the harmony, especially of all monotheistic faiths, and the great duty of religious brotherhood. To Sabatier, on the other hand, the central thought was of salvation; Christ, he regarded not as a great philosopher, but as physician of souls—his mission was to bring new life to men. Thus religion to Sabatier was built upon the personality of Jesus, practical religion, free from the limitations of creeds. Such free and vital faith was the rallying point of their International Congress, which had drawn together representatives not only of different Christian Churches (Protestant and Catholic), but also of Jewish and Hindu Theism and of Islam. Their friends of the Brahmo-Samaj had been the first to respond to the invitation; and to the representatives of progressive Catholicism and progressive Hebraism they gave a hearty welcome. All the monotheistic faiths were represented though not all religions. Islam had sent a representative of that liberal religion which existed among its adherents as truly as among themselves; and such a representative was not out of place in that assembly, for there was a veritable bond of union between Islam and Unitarianism. As the Rev. James Harwood had recently written in his tract, ''A Message to the Mohammedans,'' ''In the sublime doctrine of the unity of God, the Mohammedan and the Unitarian are at one.'' ''What fills me with pleasure,'' said Professor Montet, ''as I look upon this assembly, what not only fills me with pleasure, but lifts my heart up in devout thankfulness to God is this spectacle of the union in common religious fellowship of so many eminent men, belonging to different Churches and even different religions, each having his individual theological opinion, belief, conviction, but all united by the same religious idea, that of the adoration of our Heavenly Father.''

He then spoke with regret of the absence of a number of distinguished men, whom they had hoped to welcome—Professor Harnack; Dean Fremantle, of Ripon; President Eliot; Dean Jalabert and the Baron F. de Schickler, of Paris; Professor Bonet-Maury and M. Paul Sabatier; Dean Kambli, of St. Gall; and Pastor Bost, of Brussels, and concluded as follows:—

''Before declaring the Congress open, I desire solemnly to affirm that we are believers. It is because we have a profound faith in the truth of the cause of religion, that we defend it, and that we have worked with such zeal in preparing for this Congress. It is because we are men of faith that success has crowned our efforts: It is because we are men of faith that our deliberations will be fruitful in results. We shall work with joy and enthusiasm, for we can take up in all sincerity the words of the Apostle and say, 'I believe, therefore have I spoken.' ''

Report of the Executive Committee.

The Rev. CHARLES W. WENDTE, of Boston, the General Secretary, then read the Committee's report. It dwelt upon the significance of that meeting in Geneva, and upon the value of such an International Association. ''As we survey the religious situation throughout the world,'' it was said, ''we find that while there exists everywhere a vast amount of latent, inorganic liberalism, the representatives of conscious, reasoned, and reverent free-thought are everywhere in a minority. Everywhere, too, this liberal minority is engaged in a determined struggle to maintain the religion of the spirit against an aggressive orthodoxy and reactionary powers in Church and State. The forces of modern science and scholarship fight on our side, the constant growth of political liberty and social justice exercises a great influence in our favour, yet arrayed against us are the principalities and powers of the earth, entrenched in ignorance and timidity, prejudice and superstition, the very loyalty and unreasoning affection of mankind. Great is our need, therefore, confronted by such adversaries, to unite our scattered forces, to hearten and strengthen each other, that we be not discouraged and overborne in the struggle for religious freedom. For our own sake, for the truth's sake, for the sake of our brethren who are still in bondage to erroneous beliefs and unworthy spiritual autocracies, we must come into closer, more fraternal relations with our fellow liberals throughout the world. We must extend to one another that sympathy and co-operation which alone can assure our individual safety, and the ultimate and general triumph of our cause.''

Details were then given of the steps that had been taken through extensive correspondence and through personal visits of representatives to the meeting of various religious associations, to bring the liberals of different countries into closer touch; and the report added:—''No Church or sect in Christendom can be perfectly free or prosperous until all are free and prosperous with it. None should stand selfishly apart, and disregard the struggles and needs of the others. In the work of religious enlightenment and emancipation the saving word is together. According to our loyalty to that sentiment we all alike stand or fall. Beneath all ties of blood, or nationality, or language, or custom, or doctrine, there is a deeper union. It is the oneness of principle and method which unites the lovers of truth and freedom in all lands in a common endeavour for 'pure religion and perfect liberty.' Only as we are loyal to this ideal, and combine for the common welfare, can we be victorious in our struggle with unreason and tyranny, both at home and abroad.''

Suggestions for a central treasury and a missionary agent were then made, and the idea of a representative organ, which had been considered by the Committee, was left with the recommendation that wider use should be made of existing organs of liberal religion in the various countries. Sorrowful reference was made to the loss sustained by the death of Richard Armstrong in England, Protab Chunder Mozoomdar in India, and John Kovacs in Hungary, and the report concluded with a note of confident hope. The general tendency of modern society in things religious, it was declared, is onward and upward, from bondage to freedom, from night to light and the glorious liberty of the sons of God. The granting by the Tsar of Russia of religious toleration to Dissenters was noted as a remarkable sign of the times, and the report concluded:—''When such a measure can proceed from such a country we have reason to take courage, and look with faith upon the incoming century as the era of a new spiritual resurrection, the dawning of freedom, fellowship, and character in religon.''

REPORTS ON THE POSITION OF LIBERAL RELIGION IN VARIOUS COUNTRIES.

German Switzerland.

The Rev. A. ALTHERR, of Basle, read the first detailed report, on Liberal Religion in German Switzerland. He brought the greetings of the Swiss ''Verein für Freies Christentum,'' expressing their thankfulness to have part in that Council. They had received great spritual gifts from other lands. As the streams from their home country flowed out to many seas, so many streams of spiritual life and blessing flowed into their land. ''We give you water, you give us wine of the spirit.'' In the first centuries of Christianity it was monks from Irish cloisters who brought with them the message of the Cross; and in the Reformation time it was such Frenchmen as Farel and Calvin who were their teachers; while refugees from Italy, Spain, and other countries were now represented by families who were the pride and blessing of their land. From America, also, they had received much through Channing, Parker, and Emerson. As to the religious condition of German Switzerland, they had had to fight for their freedom, and through political they had gained religious freedom. Since 1864 they had secured freedom in matters of doctrine and of conscience. All penalties on that account were banished, and they had free, compulsory, interconfessional schools. The religious orders were not allowed to interfere in school or home. He referred also to the Old Catholic Movement, and to the presence among them at Geneva of that great orator and defender of freedom, with a young heart in his old age, Père Hyacinthe. There was movement also among the orthodox, or the semi-orthodox, and they were all living at peace with one another. Their position as liberals had been gained not without difficulty, and they might learn much from one another. Yet there might be a heavy hour before them. Their churches were, to a large extent, State churches, and in France they saw what was being done to separate Church and State. If the State interfered with liberty, he should be the first to say: ''Throw off the fetters! Do not sell conscience to Mammon!'' In Switzerland, however, they had not to do with such a master, but with a Father, and there was something to be said for the State caring also for the culture of religious life. Two years ago he had been in America and had seen something of Church life there. He bore willing testimony to the greatness of the impression made especially by their works of beneficence. But their development in Switzerland had been different. Yet, if it was to come, he had confidence in God that their religious needs would ever find satisfaction. ''God our Father, all men his children and brethren, Jesus our leader, salvation by character, unlimited progress of mankind upward and onward for ever''—that was a confession of faith and programme of work in which they might all unite.

French Switzerland.

The Rev. J. MAYOR, of Motier-Vuilly, Fribourg, followed with a report on French Switzerland, where, he said, except in Geneva, there was little of the avowedly liberal movement remaining. The movement of M. Buisson in Neuchâtel, in 1869, and Dr. Forel's League for moral action at Lausanne, had not had the permanent results hoped for them. In Geneva, for the last twenty-five years, liberal theology had enjoyed a free course, but not many of the younger men in the ministry now stood openly on that side. At the same time progress was being made throughout the French-speaking cantons, and the old dogmas were losing their force even in professedly orthodox circles.

Great Britain and Ireland.

The morning session concluded with the paper by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie on ''The Number, Organisation, and Condition of Unitarian Churches in Great Britain and Ireland,'' which we published in full last week.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

After lunch six more reports were read, of which we can furnish only the briefest notes.

France, Italy, Belgium.

First came M. BOURRIER, of Sèvres, editor of the Chrétien Français, telling once more the pathetic story of the priests who have broken away from the Roman Church, for whom it is often so hard to find any useful career, and noting how the seriousness of the movement of revolt has led to a more conciliatory attitude on the part of the French Bishops. Then the Rev. TONY ANDRÉ, D.D., of Florence, spoke of the great difficulties besetting liberal Protestantism in Italy, and the Rev. J. Hocart followed in a similar strain on the work in Belgium.

Holland, America, Hungary.

Professor EERDMANS, of Leiden, then read a paper, in German, on ''Liberal Theology and Religion in Holland.'' He referred to Dr. Kuyper's Conservative majority of 1901, and the attack of his party on the Liberals as anti-Christian. The independence of the Theological Faculties at the Universities had been secured in 1876, but the new Universities Bill, which had been passed, opened the way for the establishment of private universities in which dogmatism would be supreme. But now again there was a Liberal majority, and the new law would probably not be able to do serious harm to the old universities. The position of the liberal theologians was established on a scientific basis, but there were serious questions of practical religion which had to be faced. The older generation had a strong dislike of Socialism, but the younger men were attracted by the Socialist ideal, some had even joined the Social Democratic party and others published a paper, to maintain that social efforts must look to religion for their true strength. In liberal circles the wide-spread indifference of educated people to religious observances was a very serious problem; he also deprecated the tendency of the smaller religious bodies to multiply their societies in the same towns, when it would be better to unite to form one strong liberal congregation. They hoped that the Protestantenbond would prove effective so to unite the liberals in common work.

The paper of the Rev. FRANKLIN C. SOUTHWORTH, President of Meadville Theological School, on ''The Condition and Prospects of Liberal Christianity in the United States,'' we hope to publish in full next week.

The last paper of the afternoon, was by Professor GEORGE BOROS, D.D., of Koloszvar, on ''The Position and Prospects of Religious Liberalism in Hungary.'' He referred to the fact that he belonged to a church with a bishop and a consistory, organised 360 years ago, and he had come straight from the meeting of this consistory, which represented a community of 80,000 souls. He delivered the greetings of Bishop Ferencz. The Reformation had been a popular movement in Hungary. When in 1526 the Turks had annihilated the Hungarian army, with their king and the flower of the nobility, the whole nation turned, amid the ruins of desolate towns and villages, to the consolation of religion, and carried on the great work of Reformation. It was soon after the death of Servetus, that Francis David began to teach in Hungary, and became the founder of their Unitarian Church. He noted the strong movement in Austria at the present time towards Protestantism. 40,000 Catholics had come over, but it was partly a political, as well as a religious movement. This ''Los von Rom'' movement was not known in Hungary. There the Roman Church was making progress, partly through want of zeal on the part of Protestant leaders, and neglect of the light of the new age. But the liberals were making progress, and the condition of the ministry had been recently improved, so that men would be able to devote their whole lives to that high service. Socialism was growing strong in the land, and thus the liberal thinkers and workers had a great opportunity. As real friends of the people they must find a way to open channels of new truth, which would satisfy the popular aspirations. He brought also hearty greetings from three Protestant professors, not of their fellowship, and from a liberal Jewish Rabbi.

There was to have been another paper by Professor Nat Sen, of Calcutta, but he telegraphed that his ship was delayed, and he could not arrive in time.

EVENING EXCURSION ON THE LAKE.

Towards five o'clock the weather was fair, and the company, on the invitation of their Geneva friends, embarked on board the fine steamer Général-Dufour for an excursion on the lake. Supper was served in the saloons at six, and again at seven for the second half of the party. Later in the evening cold wind and a storm of rain beat upon the ship, but after this came wonderful effects of cloud, lying along the low hills bordering the lake, and although a quiet, sunny evening would have been very delightful, and would have better served the purposes of sociability, it could not have furnished anything more striking and beautiful than what we saw. The course taken was close along the Savoy shore to the point beyond Yvoire, passing on the return close by Nyon. As the steamer approached Geneva, on a signal from the bridge the towers of the Cathedral were illuminated by the burning of Bengal fire with very fine effect. The stars were out, and it was again a quiet night when the party disembarked.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 30.

On Wednesday the news of peace was joyfully spread by those who had seen the morning papers. At nine o'clock a German service was held in the Cathedral, conducted by the Rev. Professor Furrer, of Zurich. The hymns were taken from the ''Gesangbuch für die Evangelisch-reformirte Kirchen der deutschen Schweiz.'' (Zurich, 1891.)

Dr. Furrer's Sermon.

The sermon was from 2 Cor. iii. 17, Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.'' All great emotions, the preacher said, were associated with freedom. '' Froh und frei, wie klinkt das gut zusammen ! '' All higher life was possible only in the air of freedom. There must be freedom in the search for truth, and for the creative artist. And so it was with the highest life of communion with God. There could be no compulsion in the holiest life of the human soul. Yet freedom must be distinguished from licence. The good soldier was under discipline, and the freest of the free had said, '' Whoever would follow me, let him take his cross.'' A true man must hold fast to his obligations. To be truly free was no easy thing. How could that freedom be won ? One of the freest of men, the Apostle Paul, gave them the answer : '' Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.'' He himself won his freedom in closest spiritual union with Christ. It was Christ who brought freedom into the world. He was free in presence of the piety of the fathers and of old traditions. The Son of Man was Lord also of the Sabbath. His great rule was, ''Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and mind and soul and strength, and thy neighbour as thyself.'' Love was the freest thing in man ; what we do for love is done in the most joyful freedom—love that endures and hopeth all things. Such love was perfected in the cross. So Christ gave us an example of the perfect life. They must hold fast to Christ, because so only could they keep their hold on the love of the eternal God. Without Christ, in face of all the sufferings and sorrows of the world, it was too difficult. They needed the cross as witness of the eternal love and pity of God. It was needed under the sense of guilt, when a man could not forgive himself or trust in the forgiveness of others. Only the thought of God almighty, our Father, forgiving, as Christ has shown us divine pity and forgiveness, can take away the burden. There was no other appeal, that would compel men to trust, than that to the crucified, who was nearest to the heart of God, and went to his death, that men might believe in the eternal mercy. That was the truth of vital religion. Life in God and with God, the reconciled life, from person to person. It they would maintain that true life, they must again and again renew their inward union with Christ, entering deeply into the meaning of his life and death. Then they would have the true freedom, and the joy of youth and great thankfulness.

In his closing prayer Dr. Furrer gave thanks for the glad tidings of peace.

The Morning Session.

At the opening of the morning session at the University, Professor Montet referred with thankfulness to the news of peace, and amid a scene of great enthusiasm it was agreed to send telegrams to President Roosevelt and to the Mikado and the Tsar of Russia, congratulating them on the conclusion of peace, and invoking the blessing of '' God, the Father of all men,'' on the rulers and their respective countries. The session was devoted to communications '' d'ordre religieux théorique'' though the classification did not prove very exact.

Mohammedan Women.

The first paper, in English, was by Madame Loyson, of Geneva, on '' The religious condition of Oriental monotheistic women.'' It gave an enthusiastic and, we should say, somewhat rose-coloured description of the condition of Mohammedan women, but with salutary notes of comparison between the condition of these women and their Christian sisters, and pointed comment on the quality of our professed Christianity.

Liberal Judaism.

The Rabbi Levy, of Dijon, followed with an eloquent address : '' An attempt at a methodical deduction of the fundamental principles of Judaism.'' He noted it as a sign of true progress that he should be invited to speak at that Congress, and pointed to the close kinship between liberal Christianity and the progressive movement among the Jews, which turned back from the Talmud to the ancient prophets for their ideal of religion. He concluded by reading the printed theses, which succintly stated his position. Religion he defined as '' the effort of man to apprehend the absolute essence, the whole trend of things, in order to bring his actions into harmony with this reality, this universal order.'' Self-knowledge led to knowledge of the eternal spirit, God, '' an eternally living principle of order, beauty and love.'' And because such knowledge had been revealed in a marked degree in the Hebrew Prophets the Bible gained its supreme religious value. The theses concluded with a demand for religious worship in harmony with aspirations and needs that are ever evolving.

At the conclusion of this paper the Rev. Charles Wagner added a few words of appreciation and of sympathy with the spirit of progressive Judaism.

Professor Pfleiderer's Paper.

The concluding paper of the morning was by the veteran Professor Otto Pfleiderer, of Berlin, on '' The Sources of the Christian Doctrine of Redemption.''

A doctrine of redemption, he said, was found in other religions before Christian times ; they must strive for a brotherly understanding of those other religions. They no longer received the orthodox doctrine, but when they argued against it, they did not touch those who believed, for their belief did not rest on reason, but on feeling and tradition. Reason, they said, reason spoilt in sinful man, can have no power against the doctrine ! But when they turned to history, and showed how the supposed supernaturallygiven doctrine had been gradually formed in the course of human experience, before Christian times, then something was effected. Of this paper, which traced in a most interesting manner two forms of the Christian doctrine of redemption to the separate sources of their origin, we hope to give some fuller account in a subsequent issue.

The Afternoon Session.

The first paper in the afternoon, begun during the last quarter of the eclipse of the sun, was that by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter on '' The recent progress of New Testament Study in Great Britain,'' which was published in full in last week's Inquirer. At the conclusion the Rev. J. Hocart rose and said that Mr. Carpenter had modestly passed over the part he himself had played in the progress of those studies, particularly in his book on '' The Bible in the Nineteenth Century,'' and the two lectures he had given in Brussels, subsequently published at Paris, on '' The Gospels in the light of modern criticism.''

Of the next paper, by Professor J. J. Gourd, of Geneva, on '' The distinctive character of Religion,'' a paper referred to as marked by great philosophical power, we must not attempt any synopsis, but shall look forward to studying it, when published in its complete form.

Humanitarian Ideas.

The Hon. S. J. Barrows next read, in what the President described as excellent French, a paper on '' The Influence of Humanitarian Ideas and Sentiments upon Christian Theology,'' noting the modification of the old dogmas, and particularly that of the damnation of infants and of the heathen by the growth of a more humane spirit and the progress of thought. The new philanthropy, he said, was a new victory for the principles taught by Jesus of Nazareth in the parables of the Good Samaritan, the Good Shepherd, the Golden Rule, and the Lord's Prayer.

Père Hyacinthe.

Then came a striking address on '' Monotheism and its forms'' by the venerable M. Hyacinthe Loyson, of Geneva, formerly so well known as the eloquent and popular Catholic preacher in Paris, Père Hyacinthe. He received a very warm welcome from the audience, and still in his old age displayed the great orator's skilful mastery of words. He spoke of himself as still holding to a form of the doctrine of the Trinity, as his friend Sabatier did, believing in God, in His interior nature as Power, Thought, and Love. Yet he had always regarded the unity of God as the supreme doctrine of religion, and thought of Jesus as man not as God. To him the first Œcumenical Council was not that of Nicæa, but that of the Parliament of Religions at Chicago in 1893, opened by a Roman Catholic bishop with the Lord's Prayer, and closed with the same prayer by a Jewish Rabbi. Therefore, he would salute men of all religions, not only Christians, but Jewish, Mohammedan, and Hindu. In religion he was a man, and nothing human was alien to him ; he was a Christian, and in the same way nothing human could be alien. He maintained that Christ did not institute a church or a new religion, but simply pleaded for the ideal of the kingdom of God, established in justice and love. He believed in the true humanity of Jesus, subject to the limitations of his time, but with a fervent loyalty and devotion to him as a pure soul in whom was manifest the eternal word of God. He looked forward to a universal church founded on faith and the immortal soul of man, with room for all, trusting always in the Divine compassion. It would unite the three great monotheistic faiths of Judaism, Christianity and Islam, and there would be no curse any more. In a passage loudly applauded, M. Loyson referred to the message they had sent that day to the Mikado, and asked why the Japanese should be spoken of as heathen, who were distinguished not so much by the glory of their success in battle as by the greater glory of their generosity in making peace. The whole audience rose to greet the aged orator as he descended from the platform.

There was another item in the programme, but it was postponed to the following day.

To the Memory of Servetus.

Later in the afternoon a large company of English and American delegates, with other friends, made their way to the Servetus monument at Champel, to add their own tribute to the martyr's memory by laying a wreath upon the monument.

Professor MONTET spoke a few introductory words, saying how natural it was that English and American Unitarians should wish to perform that act of homage, and thanking them for the generosity of their thought.

Miss TAGART then gave an address, in which she spoke of Servetus as a martyr to the bigotry, not merely of a man, but of a church, and went on to speak of modern martyrdoms which still had to be endured. They desired, she said, to express their faith and their love of truth and progress.

The Rev. C. W. WENDTE then took the wreath and conducted Miss Tagart to the monument, that England and America together might place the wreath at its foot.

The Hon. S. J. BARROWS afterwards spoke of that monument as one of the mile-stones of history. There was another wreath, recently laid at the foot of the monument by the Anatomists of Great Britain and Ireland, which reminded them that Servetus was also a distinguished man of science. He referred to those noble men, Castellio and others, who at the time protested against the putting of Servetus to death, but paid a warm tribute also to the greatness of Calvin, as one of the makers of his age.

THE EVENING RECEPTION.

In the evening the local committee gave a reception to the members of the Council at the Palais Eynard, adjoining the grounds of the University. The building was admirably adapted for such a purpose, and there was a large gathering of friends. A band played in one of the rooms, and the pleasant garden was lighted by Chinese lanterns. During the evening the news of peace was again celebrated by representative speakers.

Mr. EDWIN D. MEAD said there was good reason why an American should be heard on that occasion, because their President had played so decisive a part in bringing about the result over which they were rejoicing. He spoke in high praise of the magnanimity of Japan. She had shown such self-control that the "yellow peril" could not be for them compared to what the white peril must be to those people of the Far East. The one thing he feared was that possibly Russia had not suffered enough to be compelled to do justice to her own people.

The Rev. CHARLES WAGNER spoke of war as contrary to the spirit of the time; since the terrible war in the Far East had been going on, it had meant the shipwreck of their principles. He referred with warm regard to the splendid character of President Roosevelt, who had done so much for the concord of the nations.

The Rev. G. SCHÖNHOLZER referred to the eclipse of the sun they had witnessed that day, a thing of nature, which soon passed over and all was clear again. Now the long eclipse of the war was also over, and the news brought them a great joy. He spoke also of the unity of spirit in that gathering from many nations, and found a happy parable for it in their own Swiss geography. From their St. Gotthardt four great streams ran down to as many lands, and when he asked what it meant, the Netherlanders came to him in a dream, and said, "You simpleton, it means, the heart of God." So where there were waters of life, they were born in the heart of God, and would lead them back thither. And when they asked a company of people whence all the different national words and thoughts and feelings, the answer was the same, "out of the heart of God." The Gotthardt represented a system, which was a unity, and held all together. There was one feeling which animated them all: "Alle nach dem St. Gotthardt reisen!"

THURSDAY, AUGUST 31.

The last day of the Congress opened at 9 o'clock with the English service in the Cathedral, conducted by the Rev. C. J. Street, of Sheffield, when the sermon on "Religion: its changing forms and its eternal essence," which appears in full in our present issue, was preached by Dr. M. J. Savage of New York. The hymns were printed on a special hymn-paper, and were very heartily sung. They were, "All people that on earth do dwell," "God of ages and of nations" and "Nearer, my God, to thee." The lesson was from 1 Cor. xii. and xiii.: "The greatest of these is love."

Papers on Questions of Practical Religion.

Such was the classification of the papers for the closing day, but again not to be taken very exactly, especially as the programme had been somewhat rearranged.

The first paper in the morning was by the Rev. A. BERTRAND, of Castres, an academic study of "The holiness of Jesus." The Rev. P. H. HUGENHOLTZ, of Amsterdam, followed with a paper on "The Church and Free Religious communities," setting forth (in French) his ideal of the religion of the future, in which the church would be simply a free congregation, devoted to the religious instruction and edification of its members. The last paper before lunch was the Rev. W. G. TARRANT'S, on "The relations of Liberal Religion towards Social Reforms," which we published in full last week.

In the afternoon Professor JEAN RÉVILLE opened with a paper on "The Separation of Church and State in France," of which we hope soon to be able to publish a complete translation. Then followed Professor B. NATH SEN'S paper on "The problem of Religion in modern India," which we shall also publish in full. Belore reading his paper Mr. Sen delivered the greetings of the Brahmo Samaj to the Congress, the cordial greetings of India and the East.

The concluding paper was by the Rev. M. REY, of Liège, on "The opportunity for Liberal Protestants to frame a Declaration of Faith." It pleaded the need for a clear declaration of principles, as a standard and rallying point for their efforts, and as helpful for popular propagandism.

At the close of the paper, Professor ALBERT REVILLE proposed that the executive should be charged to appoint a special committee to draw up such a statement for the consideration of the next meeting of the Council.

After a brief discussion, in which Professor Pfleiderer urged the gravity of such a step, and several English members spoke of their experience of the danger of any attempt to formulate a general confession of faith, and it was made clear by the movers that it was principles and not doctrines which were to be formulated, it was agreed that the Committee should consider the whole question and report thereon to the next meeting of the Council.

Concluding Resolutions.

The proceedings of this third International Congress were then brought to a close by a series of resolutions. The questions referred to in the report of the Committee as to a central fund, a missionary agent, &c., were not discussed, but were left to be dealt with by the new Committee, which was unanimously appointed, on the motion of the Rev. James Harwood, seconded by Professor H. Y. Groenewegen, as follows:—

Professor Dr. Edouard Montet (Geneva), President; the Rev. Charles W. Wendte (Boston), Secretary; the Rev. Dr. George Boros (Hungary), the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie (London), the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter (Oxford), the Rev. Dr. Samuel A. Eliot (Boston), Professor Dr. B. D. Eerdmans (Leiden), the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz (Amsterdam), Professor Dr. Otto Pfleiderer (Berlin), Professor Dr. Jean Réville (Paris), the Rev. G. Schönholzer (Zurich). One other member, from Germany, is to be elected by the Committee as the way becomes clear.

(II.)

Moved by the Rev. M. J. Savage, D.D., and seconded by Dr. Herbert Smith:—

"That this Congress assembled in the historic city of Geneva expresses its conviction that the cause of religious progress is inseparably linked with personal and civic freedom, and offers its earnest sympathy to all seekers after truth and workers for righteousness in every land."

(III.)

Moved by Professor F. Pijper and seconded by the Rev. Dr. Rochat:—

"That this Congress, having already offered its congratulations to the Mikado of Japan, the Tsar of Russia, and President Roosevelt, of the United States of America, on the conclusion of peace between Russia and Japan, requests Professor Montet, as President of this assembly, to convey to the forthcoming Conference on Peace and International Arbitration at Lucerne, its earnest and fraternal greetings, and the declaration of its profound hope that the spread of true religion may establish among the peoples of the world those sentiments of brotherhood and goodwill, which it is the purpose of the Conference to promote."

(IV.)

Moved by Mr. W. B. Bowring, seconded by Miss Marian Pritchard, and supported by Professor F. C. Doan, of Meadville:—

"That this Congress expresses its warmest gratitude to the Municipality and the citizens of Geneva for the facilities which they have so considerately given for the meetings of the Congress; to the Consistoire for the permission to hold religious services in the noble Cathedral of St. Pierre; to the Conseil d'Etat for generously granting the use of the Aula and associated rooms in the University; to the Hon. President, Professor Chantre, the Hon. Secretary, Pastor Dr. Rochat, the Hon. Treasurer, M. Roux-Eggly, and to the local Committee of Organisation, for their admirable arrangements and conduct of the proceedings; and, above all, to Professor Dr. E. Montet for his untiring labours and ever-ready courtesy, to which the success of the Congress is so largely due."

This resolution was passed with the utmost heartiness, the whole audience rising amid loud applause to express its gratitude especially to Professor Montet. Mr. Bowring said that the city of Geneva had set a bright example to the whole of Europe by its hospitable reception of the Congress. Miss Pritchard, speaking in French, said that it was fitting that a woman's voice should be heard in support of that resolution, as they by their presence had taken so large and appreciative a part in the proceedings. Professor Doan, in a few earnest words, said that in offering their gratitude to the friends who had done so much for the Congress, in which they had felt the Divine Spirit very near to them, they were at the same time rendering thanks to God for what that week had been to them. The resolution was gratefully acknowledged by Professor Montet.

The Rev. J. W. DAY, of St. Louis, on behalf of the American Unitarian Association and the National Conference, extended a very cordial invitation to the International Council to hold its next session in America, at a time and place to be hereafter fixed. Whether the time should be two or three years hence they could not at present decide, but he was charged by Dr. Eliot, President of the Unitarian Association, who regretted very much that he was unable to be present, to urge the acceptance of that invitation. A most cordial welcome was assured to them, if they would come to America.

The invitation was unanimously accepted, and the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz then delivered a message of greeting and regret that he had been unable to be present, from Professor Oort, of Leiden, who was President at Amsterdam in 1903.

The final resolution was a warm vote of thanks to the Rev. C. W. Wendte, the general secretary, for his devoted services to the Council, which he accepted on condition that they included in their thanks the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, than whom no one had given more faithful and efficient services to their cause. This was very heartily agreed to, and the President declared the Congress at an end.

ORGAN RECITAL. BANQUET.

At half-past five an organ recital was given in the Cathedral by M. Otto Barblan, the Cathedral organist, which opened with passages from a Mendelssohn sonata and closed with a Fantasie of Bach's. Mr. Francis Thorold sang some solos, and a small choir rendered a setting of the Twenty-third Psalm by M. Barblan.

Then in the evening came the final social gathering of the week, the banquet held in the beautiful Parc des Eaux-Vives. Some five hundred guests, it was estimated, sat down together in a large pavilion, which was decorated with the flags of many nationalities, and which is used, we believe, as a kind of summer theatre in the park. It was an animated scene, over which Professor Chantre and Professor Montet together presided, and the evening was much enjoyed. The programme of speaking, however, had to be curtailed, for it was impossible for a great part of the audience to hear, nor did time and some of the actual speakers quite fit in together.

Representatives of the city and the churches were, however, present as guests, and the toast of the City and the authorities of Church and University was very heartily received, and responded to by M. Henry Fazy, President of the State Executive Council, M. Deletra, Vice-President of the Consistory of the National Church of Geneva, and Curé Chrétien, of the old Catholic church. Then Professor Albert Réville, mounted on a chair, gave an address, recalling the former battles of liberalism, and expressing his confidence in the good cause. Even those who could not hear were glad to see, and the venerable man received an ovation at the conclusion of his address.

Then it appeared that the meeting was dissolving itself, and a succession of electric trams drawn up in the Park hospitably carried a great proportion of the guests back into the city. Thus the third International came to a happy close, and Friday saw the members scattering for home, or for further holiday in Switzerland.

Here, in concluding this long report, we can only repeat what we said last week, that to the memories of London and Amsterdam we now gratefully add those of Geneva.

THE gratitude of the members of the Congress to the President and other members of the local committee, was very warmly expressed on more than one occasion. A word of acknowledgment is also due to Professor R. Mobbs, who has been resident for some years in Geneva as a teacher of English language and literature. He not only contributed two articles on the Congress to the Anglo-American Gazette of August 28 and September 4, published in Geneva, and rendered admirable service in the translation into English of the Presidential addresses and various synopses of papers distributed to members, but was constantly active in helpful kindness towards visitors who needed direction in seeing the things of chief interest in the city.

RELIGION: ITS CHANGING FORMS AND ITS ETERNAL ESSENCE.*

BY THE REV. MINOT J. SAVAGE, D.D.

I WILL ask your attention this morning to the theme which I will thus put into words—Religion: its changing forms and its eternal essence.

As a text I have chosen the last clause of the 20th verse of the 5th chapter of St. Paul's second letter to the Corinthians: "Be ye reconciled to God."

It is not so many years ago, as the epochs of history are measured, that the creed of Christendom was supposed to be in all its grand essentials substantially fixed and settled for all time. The Reverend Doctor Richard S. Storrs, of Brooklyn, now a part of the greater city of New York, once said that progress in theology was absurd. From his point of view, and granting his assumption, there would be no questioning the statement. Theology, as he regarded it, was only the rational interpretation and manifestation of the divine and infallible revelation of truth which God had made to man. In such a revelation, of course, there could be no progress. I suppose that it could hardly have entered into the mind of the great man who used to stand in this place and rule from here as from a throne, that the essential teaching of his creed could ever be in any definite way changed or outgrown. John Milton, when he made this theological scheme the framework of his great epic, could not for one moment have imagined that he was constructing it of such stuff as dreams are made of. And yet we are to-day face to face with the fact that not one single item of the supposedly fixed creed of Christendom remains unchallenged. And it is not the bad people who are asking questions; it is not those who wish to destroy the faith and the hopes of the world. Neither is it the ignorant people, those who do not know any better. As a matter of fact, it is the very wisest and best people of the age who believe the least in nearly all of these once so firmly established dogmas.

Something has happened, during the last hundred and fifty years, that has already changed the face of the world. The world has been explored, nations have come into communication with each other, and in this way the great religions of the world have been brought face to face. We have studied other religions, their growth, their decay, and to-day we know that the pathway of human history has always advanced, from the jungle towards the angel that we believe to be its goal; that it is strewn all the way with decaying and dead religions, as the highways are strewn in the fall with the outworn leaves of the trees.

Another thing has happened. We have developed the great science of criticism. We have studied the origin and growth of these traditions; we have studied the origin and growth of these writings; we have found out, in some degree at least, the process by which human compositions come at last to be looked upon as divine.

Another thing has happened. There has been a great advance in scientific research and discovery, until to-day the theories once held in regard to the world, in regard to man, his origin, his nature, his destiny, are held among intelligent people no longer. In the old days men knew what God was thinking in the eternal ages before the world was created. They knew to a day when and why the earth was created. They knew when and why the race fell, and how it has lain under the wrath and curse of God since the very beginning. They knew, I say, or thought they knew, these things. To-day we know that none of them are true. We live in another world; other thoughts are ours; other dreams engage us; other hopes lead us on.

* A Sermon preached in the Cathedral of St. Peter, Geneva, on Thursday morning, Aug. 31, to the members of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers.

Now as a result of these great changes that have taken place, I wish to note the attitude of two classes of people toward religion. Were there time, or were this the place, I might enlarge this discussion, but for the present purpose I confine myself to these two.

Many of the finest people in the world believe that religion is dying, and are glad to believe it. One of the finest men I ever knew, a personal friend, used to say frequently, and say it with an exultant tone, "Religion is dying and humanity is taking its place." He believed, as do many others, that religion belongs to the childhood period of the race, that it is one of the things to be outgrown and left behind.

There is another class of people, those noble, sweet, true, faithful ones in the churches, who are afraid that religion is dying; that it is going to pass away; and under the impulse of this fear they attack and abuse science, criticism, investigation of every kind. They are alarmed, troubled, sometimes angry, and often indignant, when people raise these questions which appear to them to destroy the very existence of the Bible. They were indignant and angry with Charles Darwin and his compeers, because they dared to question the Mosaic statement as to the creation of the world and man. These men, I say, are afraid that religion is going to pass away. I wonder if it every occurred to them that this fear is not an indication of faith, but that it is downright infidelity. He who is afraid that God may be dethroned, that God's truth may be discredited, certainly is not entitled to the name of believer. If I find a man with his back firmly placed against a door and with his feet braced I feel perfectly certain that there is something behind that door that he does not wish discovered. If I find people afraid to have any of their beliefs investigated, I feel sure that there is a deep-down doubt in their minds as to whether they will bear investigation. God is not afraid of light; God's word cannot be afraid of the truth, for the truth, and nothing but the truth, is God's word.

I am not one of those who share the opinions of either of those two classes to which I have referred. I do not believe that religion is going to pass away, and I am not afraid that it is going to pass away.

I invite your careful attention now for a few moments, while I attempt to define religion, so that we may see whether there is any danger of its decay.

Looked at from the point of the intellect, religion is man's thought as to the relation in which he stands to the Power manifested in the universe. Men were polytheists when they thought there was more than one power. We are monotheists now, because science, so much dreaded, has taught us that the power manifested in the universe is one.

But the great thoughts of the world are always accompanied by feelings corresponding to those thoughts, so that we have the emotional side of religion, and the feeling or emotion will correspond to the thought and answer to it, being high and noble and inspired and fine, or fearful and degrading, as the thoughts are high or low.

But all the great thoughts and all the great emotions of the world tend inevitably to incarnate themselves in external forms, and so we have the institutional side of religion. We have altars and sacrifices and temples and mosques and churches; we have rituals, public services of every kind. We have ceremonials, sacraments; we have priesthoods and ministers; we have hymns, Bibles, prayers, all those things that attempt, however inadequately, to express the thoughts and the feelings that are essential to the religious life—thought, feeling, institution. But what are all these for? The attempt is to get into right relations with God. Men have always had their thoughts about God, their theories about themselves, their thoughts and theories as to the actual relations existing between themselves and God; their ideals as to what those relations ought to be, and the one peculiar aim and end of religion has been to get into right relations with God. This is true not only of Christianity, not only of Mohammedanism, not only of any one of those religions, it is true of them all. And so, in some certain profound sense, there has never been, from the beginning of the world, and there never can be until the end, more than one religion. There have been a thousand religions and ten thousand theologies, but one religion, from the Indian placing a tobacco leaf upon a stump of a tree and praying to the spirit that he imagined to inhabit the place, up to the temple at Jerusalem and St. Peter's at Rome. In the finest and highest religious service of the world there has been underlying it only this one single simple effort and aim to get into right relations with God. Suppose we could succeed in that effort!

But before discussing that question I wish for a moment to raise another and to answer that. When we look at the definition of religion, which I have attempted so briefly and baldly to outline, do you not see how in the very nature of things, it is utterly impossible for religion to pass away, or to be outgrown? No matter what theory you may have concerning the Power manifested in the universe, that Power is there. That Power is your Father. Out of that Power you have been born. It was there before you were born and it will be there after you have passed away. And meantime, while you are between the earth and the sky, the one essential, important, supreme thing for you is that you should know something concerning the laws of that Power, and that you should be obedient to those laws. All the things you desire turn simply upon that. Here is life, here is health, here is happiness, here is prosperity, here is manhood and womanhood. This, then, the relationship existing between you and this eternal Power manifested, in the universe—this is the essential thing in religion, and this in its very nature is eternal.

Suppose you are an agnostic. No matter, so far as this argument is concerned; that Power is there. Although you may say you do not know anything about it, you do know something about its laws and manifestations, and meantime your life, your happiness, your prosperity, all your desire, turn upon so much as you know about them, and on the degree of your obedience to those laws. Suppose you are an atheist. No matter, so far as this argument is concerned. This Power is there, though you call it matter, though you say it is only force, though you degrade it till you think of it as dirt. It is there. It was there before you were born; it will be there after you have passed away, and meantime your life, your health, your happiness, your prosperity, depend upon the degree of your knowledge of that Power and of your obedience to those laws. So long then as the universe exists, and so long as there is a man in it capable of thinking, of feeling, and of action, so long religion must abide in the nature of things. You can change your attitude toward it, you can forget it, but you cannot destroy it. A shipmaster might as well imagine that he could outsail the horizon which for ever closes him around; the eagle might as well imagine that he could outsoar the atmosphere in which he finds leverage for his wings, as for man to suppose that he can outgrow or escape the eternally enclosing force of religion.

Suppose, then, we could live out completely this religious life, what would be the result? In the case of the individual it would mean perfection. Suppose I could become completely related to God as far as my body is concerned, that would mean perfect health. So far as the mind is concerned, it would mean perfect adjustment to the truth; so far as my moral nature is concerned, it would mean perfect righteousness. So far as my spiritual nature is concerned, it would mean a perfect filial relation to the Eternal Father on the part of His eternal child.

Suppose this relation could be perfect so far as society is concerned, it would mean a perfect world. Consider for a moment. I have time only to suggest, in the briefest possible way, what deserves careful elaboration. If the race could become perfectly religious, that is, perfectly related to God, vice would cease, crime would be wiped out, and forgotten; poverty would be no more. If all the men in the world to-day were obedient to the laws of God, loving and helping each other, poverty would speedily be a thing of the past; disease would be outgrown, for that means always a breach of God's kindly and loving laws. Commercial dishonesty would be no more; political corruption would pass away; tyranny on the one hand and abject slavery and submission on the other, would be things of the past. War would cease, and all men under the roof of the common house of the common Father would recognise each other as brothers. All evil then would pass away if the world should become perfectly and completely religious—that is, if all men should be rightly related to God and rightly related to each other.

Does it ever occur to you that we are civilised just to the extent and no more that we are religious? It is not the telegraph, or the telephone, or the railway, or the automobile, or the attempt to fly in the air, or the ships that cover the sea: it is not the exploration, not the discoveries, not the control of the natural forces of the world, that make men civilised. It is not literature, it is not science, it is not music, it is not art, that make the world good. Herbert Spencer—and he is not a man to be prejudiced, at least on this side of the question—in the last book that he published before his death, tells us that the intellectualisation of the world is not necessarily accompanied by its moralisation. The educated, intelligent man may be only the keener, sharper scoundrel. He is not necessarily good because he has learned literature and art and music. These things do not necessarily make men civilised. They express the thought, the feeling, the life, of the age. They do not necessarily lift it or lead it forward. Ancient Athens and Italy at the finest artistic period of its career—the period of the Renaissance—teach us the truth that art and literature and music, oratory and painting, may be accompanied by inexpressible personal and social corruption.

What is it that makes men better? It is simply the development of love, of sympathy, of the sense of justice, of the willingness to co-operate and be brothers; it is helpfulness and care; it is these spiritual qualities, these religious virtues, that make men and women civilised, that lift up and lead on mankind. Why am I any better because instead of being able to be heard fifty yards away I can speak from Geneva to Paris, from Paris to London, from New York to Chicago? The distance my voice may be heard is not so important as the kind of man I am when I speak, and what I have to say.

When my father was born, in 1794, no man that lived could travel any faster than Abraham could. All these marvellous changes have come since that day. But why should I ride at the rate of fifty miles an hour instead of four, or six, or ten? It is a great convenience, but I am not necessarily a better man, and the errands on which I go may not of necessity be any more kindly, just, or humane. It is what we are, not what we can do, or how rapidly, or how astonishingly we can do it, that makes us civilised.

The one thing, then, in all the world of chiefest importance to us is this kind of religion of which I am speaking: getting into right relations with God and with our fellowmen. This is the hope of the world.

I am now ready to speak for a few minutes about the church and its relation to this kind of religion of which I have been talking. The church at any particular period of the world—and when I use the word church I include temple, mosque, and every kind of religious institution—the church is only the organisation of the religious life of the time and place in which and where it exists, and it shares the characteristics of the people of that time. That old New England minister put a profound and important truth into a humorous and quaint statement when, apologising for the church over which he was minister, he said that if the Lord was going to have a church at all in that place it had got to be made up of the kind of people who were there! If you are going to have a religious organisation at any period of the world's history and in any place under the sky you must expect it to be made up of the kind of people who are there, and you must expect to find that it is limited, that it is crude, that it is superstitious, that it is barbaric and cruel, if the people and the age are characterised by these qualities.

But I wish to pronounce what I regard as a most important truth—namely, that I consider the church to be the best and the grandest organisation on earth. It always has been and always must be. Why? Because it is the only organisation that ever existed that has for its one distinctive, definite purpose to make men and women what they ought to be, to get them into right relations with God and with each other. There is no other organisation, and never was or can be, unless it becomes a church, that has that one distinctive purpose and aim.

Faulty, then, crude, superstitious, cruel at times though the church may have been, we must remember that the age was no better. We sometimes think of John Calvin as though he were the only cruel man of his time, because through his influence Servetus was put to death. But were the other organisations and institutions of Calvin's day wise and liberal and humane and broad, and tender and true, and he the only one at fault? He was representative of his time.

And now let me put my finger upon what I regard as the most distinctive, peculiar, and definite fault of the church in all ages, one that has been at the root of most of the evil that has attended its action and career. If there were time I might show you how this evil has virtues connected with it, but for the present that must be passed by. The one fault of the church has been its unauthorised and utterly unsupported assumption of infallibility. Until modern times every religious organisation in the world has claimed to be infallible, to speak for God and to rule man by God's truth and God's power. From this have come nearly all the religious tragedies of history. Why was Jesus led out on that Friday afternoon to the hill just beyond the limits of the city to hang upon the cross between the earth and the heaven, in the agony that lasted until he gave himself into the arms of his Father? Because the Jews believed that they had all of God's truth which was necessary for the world, and that he who dared to question that truth, or add to it, was an enemy of God and man. Why was Servetus burned? Because John Calvin believed that he had in this book an infallible revelation of God, and Servetus had questioned what he regarded as its teaching. And so many of the great tragedies of the world spring out of this assumption of infallibility. Infallibility cannot be improved, infallibility cannot grow, infallibility cannot advance, and so it has been the office of the church to hold the world back in the name of God in all ages. Religion has been the one thing on earth that men have not dared to improve.

Along with this infallibility of its creed has gone, of course, the assumption of the infallibility of its sacraments and its rituals; and so we find that these have hardened themselves into immobility and have become substitutes for character. Creeds, rituals, sacraments, services, symbols, services—all these are good only when they express or stimulate life. When they are offered to the world as substitutes for life, it is giving men stones for bread; they become not helps, but hindrances, and evil. The church must learn that the revelation of God is not a fixed and finished quantity, that it must go on for ever. John Robinson uttered a truth that the world will never forget when he said to the Pilgrims, in his farewell sermon, that they must look for more truth to break forth out of God's holy word. And we must widen our definition of God's holy word, so that it shall include more than this book, include all books, and all religions, include the universe and man, include whatever expresses God, for that is God's holy word. We must learn that a mistake, however old, may not be venerable, and that a truth, however young to our apprehension, is still as old as God, and demands the reverence we accord to Him. Truth is the one thing that is sacred, and the truth-seeker is the God-seeker. We must, then, assert not only our right to truth, but we must proclaim the universal duty to seek for truth. We must not simply tolerate people; I want no man's tolerance; I claim the right to be free.

This, then, being the object of the church, what is our duty in regard to it? Let me suggest what may seem a commonplace, and yet to me it is especially important. It is our duty to become members of some church, some religious organisation, for the sake of the church and the world. If you can help men better single-handed and alone, well; but we have found out in every other department of life that we cannot do as much alone as we can through organisation. Organise, then, for the sake of God and humanity. What church shall you join? Join that church which will best answer to your ideals, which best answers to your place; but remember that you are to keep your eyes and your heart open for any new truth that may come to you, and be ready to listen and to come out like Abraham, though you may not know where you are going; going out at the call of what you may believe to be the voice of God.

We are sometimes discouraged that the world seems to progress so slowly. God does not appear to be in a hurry, but it does advance. I was trained in the idea that the world was near its end, that the morning and noon were passed; that we were well on toward the evening twilight, and that we might soon expect the end, to be followed by the day of judgment; but we have learned in this modern time that hardly as yet has the sun risen. It is early morning, and humanity instead of being old and decrepit, and hastening to its doom, is in its infancy. Humanity is the child Hercules strangling some of the serpents that hiss round its cradle; but the great labours that are to cleanse and purify the world are still ahead of it.

Look up and on, then, with hope and cheer. It is possible for us as individuals to climb up out of the animal into heart and brain, and live as sons and daughters of God! It is possible for the race to achieve this same result, and to conquer, control, and glorify the world.

I see a time when all the evils of the past shall be forgotten, remembered only in contrast with the glory that has been attained, universal peace, universal brotherhood, the lines between nations blotted out in the intermingling of peoples everywhere; freedom and joy, all natural wants supplied, the earth become a great garden, the world controlled and finished by perfecting the religious thought and the religious life. And this life I see only as a vestibule, leading to that low, dark doorway, through which we pass only to emerge into another room of the eternal Father's house, where the sun shall no more go down.

Father, we thank Thee for the light that has come to us, for the hope that cheers, for the consecration that may be ours; may we be glad that we can co-operate with Thee for the saving of the world. Amen.

AGAINST THE WAR SPIRIT.

SIR,—The letter by Mr. Felix Moscheles and Mr. J. F. Green in a recent issue of the INQUIRER was a protest against the proposal of Lord Roberts to establish compulsory rifle shooting in our schools. It is a protest which, in my opinion, ought to be strongly supported.

The arguments in its favour rest mainly on the assumption that the best security for peace is preparation for war. The history of Europe for the past two generations and its position to-day illustrate the effect of this doctrine. During that period the struggle for military superiority or equality, always demanded under the sanction of this ancient formula, has been continuous, with a result disastrous to civilisation and shocking to its higher sentiment. Take the last twenty years. During that brief space of time—a period of "peace" (I do not include the war in South Africa)—the nations of Europe have expended on preparations for mutual destruction, and wholly without economic benefit, about four thousand millions sterling. They have withdrawn from productive industry and maintained in complete idleness, save for the arts of destruction, during the whole of that time nearly three millions of men; they have passed through the ranks of their armies over sixteen millions more, and appropriated two to three years of the life of each—the total constituting, without counting the far greater numbers of the reserves, a waste of energy incalculable in its economic effects, and in its hindrance to human progress. International jealousy has been fostered; a false patriotism engendered; European civilisation has been degraded and distorted; right has been powerless against might, for war has been the sole international tribunal. Yet still the old, hopeless, helpless cry goes on: "Prepare for war; it is the only security for peace." If for a few years these vast forces of destruction are held back, and the nations stand with frightened gaze on the brink of nameless horrors, afraid to look forward, distrustful of each other, feverishly calling for greater and greater armaments, we call this peace. It is the only sort of peace we need expect, or ever shall receive, from such a preparation.

Are these the traditions we desire to hand on to the next generation? Yes, according to Lord Roberts, and to others who, if they could, would bring for us the unrighteous bonds of a military conscription. Cabinets, not Parliament, still less the people, decide the questions of peace or war in these days, and a dozen men, weak or strong, may irretrievably commit this country to war.

Then comes the whirlwind of passion and of "patriotism," the outpouring of life and of money, the reign of incompetence, to be followed by honours and rewards for some, a maimed and useless life for others, the silence of brave men rotting in their graves, and not seldom the stern condemnation of succeeding generations.

What is the force that has made possible and still maintains this state of things? Public opinion—that and nothing else. Let men once see the folly and futility of it, and it would cease there and then. It is only by a radical change in public sentiment in Europe that we can hope for the abolition of militarism.

It is, therefore, a clear duty not to make our schools the nurseries of the military spirit and warlike tradition which they unquestionably would become were rifle shooting encouraged and made compulsory. The very object of Lord Roberts is to ensure this.

Abroad, every citizen is compelled not only to learn to shoot, but to fully qualify for war. The "professional soldier" in the ranks has been eliminated. Has this, as Mr. Squire suggested, diminished militarism, or the military spirit?

I say, therefore, it is our duty to do our utmost that the next generation shall grow up with a truer appreciation of what war now means; what the armed truce of Europe means; how false and fatal is the doctrine if you desire peace prepare for war; how infinitely higher and stronger for this end is a policy based upon international justice and goodwill. In a word, that boys should be taught as a matter of ethics and of history the evil of war, how possible is peace, and its necessity for human progress. If this were done in every school in the country (I say nothing now of the homes), I venture to think it would in one generation do more to advance the cause of peace than many generations of compulsory rifle shooting. It is not suggested that our armies should be disbanded, or our fleets dismantled, but that by both people and Government the strongest effort should be made to bring about an international reduction of armaments, to create a public feeling convinced of the criminality of war, and determined to substitute for international violence international law.

Of one thing, indeed, I am well persuaded—namely, that the era of peace, and not merely a crushing military truce, has dawned; that forces are accumulating which will hasten on the day with ever-accelerating speed. The rapid spread in Germany and elsewhere of socialism, which, whatever else it stands for, stands at the opposite pole to militarism, the rise here to political activity of a Labour party whose ideals are wholly opposed to war, the establishment of an International Court of Arbitration, the multiplication of international arbitral treaties, the remarkable development of the peace movement in France—all these are facts which no one can mistake or ignore, and which show that the rule of the soldier, like that of the priest, is drawing to its close on the Continent.

We who ought to be in the van of this great progress are not, but at least let us not join the forces of reaction. However excellent Lord Roberts may be as a man, or distinguished as a soldier, it is not to him or his profession that we must go if we desire to help on the peace of the world and the evolution of a nobler social order.

RUSSELL SCOTT.

SIR,—Mr. Page Hopps' striking object-lesson seems to want another to complete it. Let us suppose our amiable friend, on high and peaceful thoughts intent, walking along a lonely highway. Suddenly he encounters a big bully, intent on purposes less high and peaceful, who, seeing our friend defenceless, proceeds forthwith to pound him into a jelly, and leaves him in the ditch, crumpled up and disorganised, and minus his watch and purse. May one venture to think that even Mr. Hopps would not have been sorry if a stout friend, prepared and willing to compel peace, had turned up coincidently with the bully? Would not the coward have slunk by, damning, like Mr. Hopps himself, those who try to ensure peace by being ready for war?

EDWARD S. HOWSE.

Lyncombe, Bath, Sept. 3.

SIR,—I dislike and disapprove of needless polemics, and I hope it may be unnecessary for me again to address you on this subject, and also that what I say may be expressed with such moderation as to prove the strength of my conviction of the justice of my view. "The wise Jesus," to use Mr. Page Hopps' words, had a small following surrounded by hostile power which it was obviously futile to attempt to resist with a sword or two, and accordingly his injunction was wise, and was, apparently, given on account of its wisdom under the circumstances. The lesson of the South African war, begun by our opponents, was, as I read it, that we ought to have been much better prepared, so that the war might have been sooner finished, with less loss of life on both sides. It would not be desirable to name the two Powers I had in my mind, and I can give no evidence, as asked by Mr. Robinson, without naming them, but I gather that Mr. Hill knows which they are. By "Powers" I meant nations and their rulers, not newspapers. Mr. Hill is in error in thinking I am in favour of conscription. I do not believe that our free nation needs, or would submit to, it. I think all who are between certain ages should compulsorily receive military, or naval, instruction, and I believe that if war became necessary Englishmen would not flinch from the defence of their country. Practically British Governments cannot now engage in any considerable war unless backed by the large majority of the nation, and I submit the Government were so supported in the Boer War, and I believe that this majority may be relied on to fight in any war with which they are in sympathy. I do not think "recent wars" deserve the character Mr. Hill gives them, but of this each must judge for himself. Important changes, to be satisfactory, must usually be gradual, and it may be long before we can do without a considerable standing army, particularly for foreign service, and a navy also; but the more we can entrust our defence to the civilians the better, provided they do not think they can accomplish it by merely allowing themselves to "sleep peacefully."

DENNIS B. SQUIRE.

August 27, 1905.

SIR,—In a general way it is our filibusters who are so unctuous in their insistence on the blessedness of a state of preparation for war as a means of maintaining peace. But when they were trying to hound us on to fight the Boers they could think of no more effective lie than that the Boers had long been preparing for war. That was the strongest reason they could urge why we should lose no time in smashing them. And it was our own belief in our preparedness for war—illusory though it proved to a great extent—that encouraged our people to play the bully and thus to precipitate one of the direst calamities in English history. That is how it always works. Whenever one nation prepares for war, or is even supposed to be doing so, there is always another nation ready to assume that the preparation is a menace and a danger, and will immediately begin to make counter preparations. All the world over and all through history that has been the commonest course of things. It has led to innumerable wars, and has been one of the main causes of the piling up of our frightful modern armaments; and still there are seemingly sane and good people who never hesitate to promulgate and support that hoary humbug that the way to keep the peace is to prepare for war.

THE OMISSIONS OF RATIONALISM.

SIR,—An article has appeared in the INQUIRER under the above title. I shall not presume to offer any criticism upon its arguments, but it appears to me singular that it should appear in a Unitarian paper, since it aims to cut away the very basis of Unitarianism. I have sought for some principle that can explain Unitarianism, and I can find but this—Rationalism. Indeed, we shall find that human progress as a whole is best expressed by the same word. Reason, or Rationalism, is the mother of all religions, of all sciences, of all noble works. Lao Tsze says: "That which in its depth seems the first ancestor of all things may be regarded as the mother of the universe. I know not its name, but give it the title of Reason. Virtue in its grandest aspect is neither more nor less than following Reason."

Of wisdom the Jewish writer says: "Love is the keeping of her laws."

This is the Reason of the Stoics, the Logos of the Platonists—"that which was in the beginning with God."

Rationalism, then, must be "supreme in every department of human activity," so long as that activity is to be sane and wholesome. What the world has suffered from and still suffers from is defect of rationalism. We do not want less of it, but more. Nor do I think it desirable to use the word in some other sense (as logic or dialectic). If another sense is meant, another word should be used.

I do not know much about the "Rationalist Press Association," except that I see it is reprinting a Unitarian work—"The Creed of Christendom." Some of its writers may have made "omissions." We all make them—Unitarians among the rest. But I should think its writers wanting in common intelligence if they used the word "Rationalism" in the sense attributed to them.

THE SOUL OF JAPAN.

OWING to the sudden rise of Japan in national importance we are all interested to learn what are the ideas that have inspired this people. The following brief sketch is intended to indicate the main sources of their religion and ethics.

The chief religion of Japan is Shintoism, the worship of ancestors and of nature—a religion which bids men look inward and know themselves. Next to that stands Buddhism; but even those who are Buddhists are for the most part Shintoists as well. The influence of Confucius and Mencius also survives. But the great transforming power in Japan has been ethical rather than religious. It is the moral teaching known as Bushido, which has been rightly termed Yamato-Damashii, the Soul of Japan. In support of this statement we have the witness of unbiassed European travellers and the writings of the Japanese themselves. Professor Inazo Nitobe, who has written the best book available to English-speaking people on Bushido, says: "In a work of such magnitude as the transformation of Japan many motives naturally entered; but if one were to name the principal, one would not hesitate to name Bushido."*

What is Bushido? Bushido gets its name from the ancient knights of Japan, called Bushi, or the Samurai. As the knights of the middle ages in Europe had their code of honour known as Chivalry, so the knights of Japan had moral rules for their guidance in warfare and in peaceful daily life. These were known as Bushido, the Way of the Knights or Teachings of Knightly Behaviour. They were crude at first, encouraging suicide and giving instructions as to Seppuku—a most revolting way of taking one's own life. But Bushido has now been developed, added to, and refined, and it has been extended in influence until it has become the ethical teaching of Japan. It is now taught in the schools, and is part of the education of every Japanese boy.* It is not a religion, if we understand that word in its usual sense. It is certainly not a theology. It is simply morality.

This moral teaching, as it exists to-day, is not entirely a native product; it has taken to itself the best teaching of many faiths. It is still indefinite and incomplete; it has grown and is still growing. The Japanese are still using their remarkable eclectic power, and extracting and claiming as their own whatever they find to be good and true in the systems of morals, ancient and modern. At first there were only the moral ideas of the ancient knights. With these have been combined ancestor worship, filial piety, and loyalty to the Emperor. Professor Nitobe says, in "Japan by the Japanese": "I am strongly inclined to believe that the simple Shinto worship of nature and of ancestors was the foundation of Bushido." Calm resignation to the events of life and contemplativeness have been added from Buddhism; the simple, stern life from Brahmanism; the beauty of the five moral relations between master and servant, father and son, husband and wife, older and younger brother, friend and friend from Confucianism. And lately on to these has been grafted the ethics of love taught by Christianity."

Bushido is not, then, a native growth, and yet we must speak of it as native, for the Japanese alone have had the open mind and large heart that will receive good from all these faiths.

To come to the teaching itself. In the ancient form of it there was much that was brutal and repulsive. It glorified suicide. So much so that the Japanese still take their own lives for trifles. It was essentially martial. But the main outlines of the teaching command our deepest sympathy. They are summed up by Professor Nitobe as follows: Rectitude or Justice; Courage, the Spirit of Daring and Bearing; Benevolence, the Feeling for Distress; Politeness; Veracity; Honour; The Duty of Loyalty; Self Control.

Rectitude is placed first. It is higher even than loyalty to one's country. Conscience must always be respected, even though patriotism suffer.

Courage is scarcely considered a virtue. Rash physical courage in battle is spoken of as the courage of a serf.

Politeness has a prominent place. It means not the veneer of manners, as with us, but sympathetic regard for the feelings of others. That cold, distant, patronising politeness shown by the high to the low, so common in England, is vulgarity to the Japanese.

* "Bushido, the Soul of Japan." By Inazo Nitobe. (Simpkin Marshall, 2s. 6d.), from which most of the quotations in this article are made. See also chapter on religion in "Japan by the Japanese" (Heinemann, 20s. net). Monthly Review for March and April, 1904. Articles by Alfred Stead on "Bushido and Ancestor Worship."

* Two interesting little manuals which every Japanese boy learns by heart, as our children do the Commandments and the Beatitudes, are "Jitsu-go-Kyo" (The Teaching of the Words of Truth.) Translated in the Cornhill Magazine, August, 1876, vol. xxxiv., pp. 177-180; and "Doji Kyo" (Teaching for the Young). Translated. Asiatic Transactions, vol. ix.

Honour is at the root of Japanese virtue. Undoubtedly, what Bushido teaches more than anything else is the avoidance of those things that make men ashamed of themselves. Centuries before Carlyle lived it was taught in Japan that "Shame is the soil of all virtues, of good manners, and of good morals." This sense of shame is cherished in the Japanese from childhood. The reproof "You ought to be ashamed," appeals more to the Japanese boy than whippings and blows. In business relations it makes their men honest. It is the surest guarantee that a man will be faithful to his contract. "It was quite a usual thing," says Professor Nitobe, "to insert in promissory notes such clauses as these: 'In default of the repayment of the sum lent to me, I shall say nothing against being ridiculed in public'-; or, 'In case I fail to pay you back, you may call me a fool,' and the like."

One of the best and safest guides to character is money. Let us see a man's bank-book, ledgers, and accounts balanced up to date, and we can easily tell what kind of a citizen, what kind of a father, what kind of a husband, what kind of a man he is, and we can confidently assert whether he is just, munificent, patriotic, and loving. How did the ancient Samurai regard money? They simply despised it: "It was considered bad taste to speak of it, and ignorance of the value of the different coins was a token of good breeding." Some of this spirit still remains, though contact with the Western world is fast causing it to disappear. Judging from report, the Japanese can use their unique imitative power in copying the bad as well as the good. Still, the old proverb is repeated: "Less than all things men must grudge money; it is by riches that wisdom is hindered." The expansion of Japan in the commercial world was not due in the first instance to love for money or desire for trade, or increase of luxuries, but to the sense of honour. The Japanese saw the superiority of our Western commerce, and they could not endure being looked down upon. They were ashamed that they were behind us. And, with their marvellous adaptability, they assimilated the best the West had to give, just as they accepted those precepts of Christianity which they saw were better than their own.

This sense of honour also worked in the hearts of the soldiers who were fighting in the Far East. It is the chief secret of the daring and endurance which have been exhibited during this war, and which have never been surpassed by any people, ancient or modern. The sense of shame is so strong in a Japanese soldier that he would rather die the most horrible of deaths than prove a coward or a traitor. To be considered a true and worthy man, in his own eyes as well as in the eyes of others, is his great incentive to fight well and to die well. And, in addition to this, there is always in the background the consciousness that his family will remember him and his deeds, and respect and love him, not for a few years only, but through the centuries. So strong a hold has ancestor worship on this people.

Another important duty of the Bushi is loyalty to the Emperor, and many a heart-stirring story of Japanese allegiance to superiors could be told. But, while disobedience to those in authority is severely condemned, no one is required to be faithless to conscience even to please the Emperor. The teaching that underlies the Japanese idea of loyalty is that the individual must always sacrifice himself to the state. It is not self, but the Fatherland that must stand first.

It will be noticed that this teaching is stern and masculine. But the gentler virtues are not neglected. Benevolence, love, magnanimity, affection for others, sympathy, and pity are recognised as supreme qualities, the highest attributes of the human soul. This truth had been learnt from Buddhism before the arrival of Christianity. It is needless to dilate on their magnanimity and benevolence. The fact that the Buddhists of Japan, after the war with China, refused to take any compensation for the destruction of their sacred buildings tells of a magnanimity which we have not learnt in the West. Bushido teaches: "The best-won victory is that obtained without the shedding of blood."

We can see in what esteem this ethical teaching is held by the people from the proverb "As the cherry-blossom is among flowers, so is the bushi among men." The cherry-blossom is the national flower of Japan. It is the queen of flowers. So the bushi, the truly honourable man, is king among men. All men, of whatever class, who live moral lives can attain the position of Bushi.

Bushido has a strong hold upon the Japanese officers. The war correspondent of the Times says: "When a number of officers of any standing or rank are gathered together, it is nine chances that the doctrine of Bushido is the subject of conversation, since the practice and precepts of this philosophy exercise a passionate attraction upon those who study and endeavour to live in them."* Can we imagine the officers of the British Army discussing at even one meeting in ten the Sermon on the Mount, which is our system of morals, or is said to be? If it is true that Bushido does exercise this moral influence on the soldiers, then there is out in the East an army of men who are second only to Cromwell's Ironsides, who were animated by a lofty ideal and made the finest soldiers England ever produced.

Is Bushido capable of becoming the world ethics? Not in its present form. In the first place it is too national, and in the second place it is too martial in its spirit. These are its weaknesses. But it has a quality which the Christianity of our times sadly needs. It is capable of expansion. It is ready to learn and willing to receive the good that is in other faiths. It is progressive rather than aggressive. It is not so lofty as the best Christian teaching. It contains nothing that will compare favourably with the beatitudes. But hard-and-fast and unyielding dogma will never have any chance against it. Christianity has more elements of the world religion in it than any other; but Christianity, as at present understood, can never be a universal religion. It must learn humility from its founder. It must gladly take the best from Shintoism, Buddhism, and Confucianism, as Bushido has done. Christianity must once more be a living spirit, capable of taking on the forms of truth, whatever their source. We have much to learn from the East. Wisdom still comes from that direction. And our cry must not be—Christianity a complete revelation of God's truth, or Christianity against all the other religions of the world, but Christianity plus the best that is in all other religions.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A SEASIDE HOLIDAY.

VII.

MR. AND MRS. HOLDEN, with Ernest, the two girls, and Nip, crossed the stream by a wooden bridge, leading to a road over the sand-flats, and, by a cliff path, to the fishing village on the other side of the hill. From the top they had a glorious view over the sea, on one side, and up the wooded valley towards the moorlands on the other. As they looked down upon the sheeny surface of the water, they were charmed with the beautiful purple shadows cast by the light summer clouds upon the surface of the vividly blue sea, and, as they neared the village, they saw a number of fishing boats about to leave the tiny harbour, whose coffee-coloured sails, spread out to catch the breeze, made a lovely colour contrast with the vivid greenish blue of the sea near the shore.

All these things were noted with great delight by Mrs. Holden, who was a skilful artist, and so had her eyes always open to take in all lovely colour effects. What a world this is to live in, where on every side there are wonderful and beautiful sights for those who keep their eyes, and minds, open, and their hearts pure!

All along the way, over sand-flat and cliff-path, Mr. Holden and the girls had been finding flowers of kinds seldom or never found inland—yellow-horned poppy, wild mignonette, purple sea rocket, rock-rose, sea-campion, bugloss, mallow, stork's-bill, sea-thrift, sea-lavender, chicory, wormwood, centaury hare-bell, mullein, teazel, sea-spurge, scabious, and a score more, among which was the beautiful-leaved sea-holly, now nearly past blooming.

And whilst the botanists were busy Ernest also found the birds interesting—great white and grey-winged gulls, wheeling in easy soaring circles, graceful silvery grey terns, and jet-black jackdaws, all screaming and chattering. Sometimes a pair of long-necked cormorants would fly along close to the surface of the water in hurried, direct flight, looking, as Ernest said, "as though they wanted to catch a train and were behind time."

There were also multitudes of butterflies—painted ladies, tortoise-shells, dingy meadow browns and skippers, fritillaries, glowing small coppers, and vivid blues. Grasshoppers also abounded, and, occasionally, a bright green tiger beetle would run across the path, or fly in front of the party for a few yards. The heather and wild thyme were alive with bees—hive bees from the village and wild humble bees.

But although Ernest was greatly interested in all this teeming summer life, he was eager to reach the village and find Joe Kelly and give him Uncle Ned's message, so all the way he and Nip kept well ahead of the others.

When they had descended by a steep zig-zag path and suddenly found themselves in the very centre of the quaint little village, they were all charmed. There were lovely little white-washed cottages, each one in its own little garden, glowing with flowers and sweet with rosemary, lavender, and mignonette; there were rosy-cheeked, brown-skinned children playing about in the road; and, here and there, a dear old grey-haired grannie in white cap and blue-check apron, sat knitting or making lace in a cottage porch, looking like a picture framed with honeysuckle or climbing rose. One cottage was nearly covered with a great blue-flowered clematis in full bloom—another was smothered in Virginia creeper.

There was one shop only, but it seemed to contain everything likely to be wanted. Near to the shop stood a group of brown-faced fishermen, gossiping and waiting for the tide to rise and help them to float their fishing boats—many had already gone down to the "quay" and, as had been noted, were just putting off in their brown-sailed boats.

Ernest went up to the group of fishermen and asked to be directed to Joe Kelly's house, and one of the men was about to show him when Joe himself came up to the group.

"Here's a young gent lookin' arter ye, Joe," the man said.

"And what may he be a-wantin' wi' me?" said Joe, with a bright, good-humoured smile.

Joe was such a big strong-looking man that Ernest felt quite a dwarf before him, and, at first, almost forgot his message in his sudden sense of smallness. However, he soon recovered, as the giant appeared to be very good-natured, and gave him Uncle Ned's message. Joe Kelly said: "All right, sir, I'll come with the boat; but—would ye mind just telling me who your 'Uncle Ned' may be. My Uncle Ned's 'gone where the good niggers go'—who's your Uncle Ned, sonnie?"

Ernest blushed. He had forgotten that everybody did not know his uncle by that name. Then, recovering himself, he said with some dignity: "My Uncle Ned—our Uncle Ned, I ought to say—is Dr. Edward Ashton, and he told me that once when he was a student at college, years ago, he spent a long vacation here in the village at your mother's cottage, and you and he used to go out together tow-netting and fishing."

"And Ted Ashton's your uncle, sonnie! Is that so? And he a great doctor now! Well, well! Right glad shall I be, an' right glad will many another of us in the village be, to see Ted,—I beg his pardon—to see Mr. Edward Ashton once again!"

Mrs. Holden, who, with the others, had come up in time to hear the last part of the conversation, was delighted to find her brother so great a favourite in the village. On Joe's invitation they went to see his mother—still a very handsome old lady—who welcomed them joyfully into her little parlour, sweet with the scent of a mighty pot of musk which flourished in the window, and a bowl of dried rose leaves set in the fender.

The old lady presently produced dishes of white cream curds and stewed whortleberries, cool and refreshing, which the children did not need much pressing to partake of.

"And so young Mr. Ted is round in these parts again after all these years," said old Mrs. Kelly. "And why did he not come over himself, I wonder?" And the old lady pretended to be a little put out.

"Oh, he has been too busy planning for our pleasure," exclaimed Elsie, who could not endure to hear a word of blame against her dear Uncle Ned.

"Beside, we only came yesterday, and you would be surprised to hear of all the things we have done. Even now he and the two older boys are busy preparing for our entertainment when we get back," said Mrs. Holden.

"Well, well, I suppose I'll have to forgive him before he asks me," said the old lady. "He always was busy about one thing or another, and would have his own way too. Tell him there'll be fresh cream curds and whortleberries new gathered on Sunday afternoon if he cares to come and see an old body."

Joe laughed and added, "Tell him mother'll be puttin' on her new starched cap and lace apron too! That'll fetch him. Ha! ha!"

Mrs. Kelly blushed like a girl and told Joe "he'd get his ears boxed if she could come anigh him."

So they chatted and chaffed awhile, all of them falling in love with the dear old dame and her good-humoured giant of a son—who held his mother in great affection and reverence.

Then they walked down to the "quay" and saw the bonny sailing boat which was to be theirs all day on Monday, with Joe to manage it. Afterwards Joe and his "hands" got their larger fishing boat ready, and spreading its lovely brown sails glided out to the open water on the rising tide to catch fish.

As they walked home in the late afternoon, Mab went up to Mrs. Holden and putting her arm round her said, "Dear Mrs. Holden, I want to thank you all for bringing me and Charlie to such a beautiful place along with Elsie, and Frank and Ernest. It seems like a lovely dream and it gets better as it goes along." And Mrs. Holden stooped down and kissed the little girl, glad that she had overcome her shyness and spoken the joy she felt. "My dear," she said, "it is good for my boys and girl to have you two along with them as it is good for you to be with us. We all enjoy our joys more when we share them with others. Elsie, too, told Mab what a joy it was to have her school chum with her.

So, in friendly chat, they walked back over the hill to Brookside, full of pleasure in their afternoon's experiences.

Uncle Ned, who had found the two boys a help and no hindrance at all, had got all his live specimens into the tanks ready for the evening's exhibition, and the three had come out to meet the others, whom they saw descending the cliff path towards the sand flats. He laughed heartily over old Mrs. Kelly's messages, and thanked Ernest for the success with which he had carried out the commission to Joe Kelly.

OBITUARY.

MR. ROBERT FIELDING.

By the death of Mr. Robert Fielding, of Heaton Moor, near Manchester, the congregation in that place loses one of its most devoted members. Some fifty years ago an enthusiastic band of young people established a Unitarian Sunday-school in Miles Platting. By their zealous endeavours the school chapel was erected in Varley-street and, later, the church on Oldham-road. Mr. and Mrs. Fielding were both of them members of this little group, and set a healthy example by their regular attendance at public worship and their unflagging interest in all that concerned the welfare and prosperity of the church and its connected institutions. Their sympathy, encouragement and helpfulness will always be gratefully remembered by the writer, the first settled minister of the Miles Platting congregation. Mr. Fielding was, for more than twenty years, treasurer of the congregation, and it was a great loss when, for reasons of health, they removed from the neighbourhood. That removal, however, did not take place till they had found a house near enough to a place of worship to allow regular attendance at services in which they could join in perfect sincerity. First at Wilmslow, within reach of Deanrow, and afterwards at Heaton Moor they were among the most regular attenders at the Sunday ministrations. Mrs. Fielding died eight years ago, and Mr. Fielding, faithful to tradition, continued his interest at Heaton Moor to the very last, taking especial interest in the choir and the musical services. A few years ago he had a serious illness from which it was thought he had perfectly recovered; but of late his health became again unsatisfactory. Accompanied by two members of his family, he took an extended holiday on the Mediterranean. He returned only a few weeks since, but never regained his health, and died on Wednesday morning at the age of seventy-one. True to his principles, kindly in disposition, a faithful and valued friend, he will be greatly missed by all who knew him. Two sons and two daughters survive him, one of whom is the wife of the Rev. R. C. Moore, of Horwich.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Pontypridd.—The Rev. Simon Jones completed a series of open-air services on Sunday last, held on the common after evening service at the Vestry Hall. His addresses, founded upon the teaching of Jesus, have been very earnest and powerful. Crowds have been attracted to hear him, and much interest has been manifested in the services. There has been no interruption in the proceedings, and the people have listened to his pleadings for a truer and fuller life with rapt attention. At the end of each discourse, questions have been invited and many questions of a thoughtful nature have been put. Mr. Jones dealt with the questions with tact and skill, throwing much light on many interesting and serious subjects.

Rochdale.—Mr. Fred. Duxbury, known to many of our readers as an elocutionist and a member of the Manchester District Lay Preachers' Union, on Sunday conducted the services at Blackwater street Church. In the evening there was a large attendance, and after opening the service with a lesson and prayer, he gave three recitals—Tennyson's "Dora," Will Carleton's "The Settler's Story," and a pathetic piece, "The Irishman's Love for his Children."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

PROFESSOR BENOYENDRA NATH SEN, of the Presidency College, Calcutta, who attended the International meetings at Geneva as representative of the Brahmo Samaj, has been in London this week, and is proceeding shortly to America. It is hoped that, together with President Southworth, of Meadville, he will be the guest of the Ninety-Six Club in Liverpool, on Tuesday evening, and if a berth could be secured for him he would sail next day with Mr. Southworth. His intention is to spend a quiet month at Meadville, and then to see what he can of other cities in the States, returning to this country in December. Professor Sen, who belongs to the family of the great Brahmo leader Keshub Chunder Sen, and is secretary of the Brahmo Committee in Calcutta, is taking a special eight months' vacation from his college work, and on his return from America we shall doubtless have opportunities of hearing him in our churches.

THE Geneva daily Press took full cognisance of our International meetings last week. The Journal de Genève, in particular, published from day to day an admirable summary of the proceedings, completed in the issue of last Sunday morning, with some concluding notes on the permanent value of the contributions to the Congress, and a tribute to the religious seriousness and sincerity of the gatherings, and the positive nature of the liberal faith there presented.

A CORRESPONDENT, referring to Mr. Bowie's International paper, published in last week's INQUIRER, draws attention to the omission from the enumeration of Scottish churches by name, of Dundee, where Unitarian services were held towards the close of the eighteenth century, and where, from 1866 to the present date, services have been conducted uninterruptedly by the present minister, Rev. Henry Williamson.

OUR humanity, touched with divine freedom, has larger and more liberal limits than its critics and its students dream. It is not base; it is not noble: it is a vast possibility of baseness or of nobleness; and nothing so kindles its high spiritual consciousness and transfigures it with light divine as the appeal of trustful sympathy, and the expectant light of a brother's faith.—James Martineau.

"Never writer wrote with deeper conviction than George Gissing; every sentence has come straight from the heart, and this fact alone, apart from its artistic merit, gives a poignancy and strength to his work which separates it at once from the common ruck of novel-writing. These books are terrible arraignments of life—their peculiar characteristic is this poignancy, this painting of life at its moments of unbearable crisis. Between misery and despair lies a whole world of difference; misery is what can be endured—despair is the unbearable, and George Gissing is the spokesman of Despair." —Jane H. Findlater, in the National Review.

"Fate set him for his life-task the study of the swarming miseries of our human ant-heaps and the pettinesses of our mortal nature. 'The Nether World,' 'New Grub Street,' 'Demos,' 'The Odd Women,' 'The Whirlpool,'—these are all monumental titles, mighty themes. None of his contemporaries in England—only Zola and Tolstoi anywhere else—even attempted to wrestle with such big canvases, and if Gissing did not always rise to the height of his great argument, the conception was at least Herculean."—I. Zangwill, in To-Day.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OF the papers contributed to the Geneva meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers we publish this week that by the President of Meadville on "The State and Prospect of Liberal Religion in the United States," and Professor B. Nath Sen's on "The Problem of Religion in Modern India." Next week we shall publish a translation of Professor Jean Réville's paper on "The Separation of the Churches and the State in France."

ON the Sunday morning following the International meetings in Geneva, about eighty members of the English party, who had gone on to Chamonix, joined in a religious service in one of the hotels at Les Praz, a little hamlet about a mile and a half further up the valley, where the secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and a number of friends were staying for a week. The Geneva hymn papers were used, and Mr. John Harrison presided at the piano. The service was conducted by the Rev. W. Wooding, and brief addresses, happily appropriate to the occasion, were given by the Revs. C. Hargrove and W. G. Tarrant. Mont Blanc and the great glaciers seemed close to the worshippers as they looked out of the hotel windows. The service was beautifully simple and uplifting. It was a memorable gathering, for which those who took part in it will long be grateful.

THE fourteenth Universal Peace Congress meets at Lucerne on Tuesday next, Sept. 19, and its sittings will continue throughout the week. The usual September number of Concord, the journal of the International Arbitration and Peace Association, will not be issued, but a double number will be published in October, with a full report of the Congress.

ON Saturday week, Sept. 30, the memorial stone of the new Unitarian church in Skene-street, Aberdeen, is to be laid by Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart, M.P., supported by Mr. C. F. Pearson, president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The buildings, which are to be in the Italian Renaissance style, will have on the basement floor a hall, with seating capacity for 350, the church, on the upper floor, being seated for 600.

THE Trade Union Congress, which met this year at Hanley, was attended by 458 delegates, representing 214 organisations, with a membership of over one and a half millions. This great body of workers possesses a huge potential political force, and indications are not wanting of a clearer determination to use it for securing much-needed social reforms. Some of the unofficial meetings were among the most successful and significant. The speakers at a meeting on the Housing Question (noted below) included Mr. Robert Williams, F.R.I.B.A., and Mr. Geo. Cadbury, who declared for taxation of land values, and the socialisation of all monopolies. Another crowded gathering demanded adequate maintenance of all children in State supported schools. The full Socialist faith was sounded at the demonstration arranged by the Independent Labour Party.

THE chairman of the Congress, Mr. James Sexton, in his presidential address, ridiculed the inadequacy of the Unemployed Act, declared that the only solution of the unemployed question lay in abolishing the private ownership in land, and as a step to this appealed for political labour representation entirely independent of the Liberal or Conservative parties. On the whole we must recognise here the stiffening of the labour forces of the country, and a temper which will be less and less satisfied with the constant postponement of reforms. Among other points dealt with was that of Free Trade, which was affirmed by an immense majority. It was also stated that the necessity of placing a Trade Unionist representative on the proposed Royal Commission on the Poor Law had been pointed out to Mr. Balfour, and that the Prime Minister was giving this his serious consideration. The proceedings came to an end with the announcement of the election of Mr. Steadman, L.C.C., to the secretaryship of the Congress. Mr. Steadman, who has done sterling service in the past, thus enters on one of the most important positions in the labour world.

AT the Housing Conference preceding the Trades Union Congress, Mr. George Cadbury gave a very lucid account of the Bourneville Trust, its aims and methods. He made special reference to the benefit to working men and other householders of the garden plots which are preserved for every dwelling. Valuable as the Bourneville achievement is in itself and as an example of what may be done by others, Mr. Cadbury does not consider that such voluntary Trusts will be sufficient to solve the land question. Mr. James Sexton, Chairman of this year's Congress, pointed out that even Messrs. Cadbury's well-laid plans could not prevent an increase in land values all around the estate, due to the very success of the Bourneville Trust.

MR. CADBURY moved a resolution calling the attention of Members of Parliament and other authorities to the need for sweeping away slum areas and providing better housing, and also calling upon working men to endeavour to secure healthy and attractive houses with gardens, and to protest against the block dwellings and dreary, monotonous rows of houses so often provided for them. He said: "The suffering of some fifteen millions of our fellow-citizens in the slums of our cities calls for a drastic remedy. I believe this remedy will be found when we realise that the people of a country have a claim to the land on which they live." Before the close of the Conference Mr. Cadbury declared, with evident approval of his audience, that there could be no possible violation of justice in the resumption by the State of the people's heritage in the land after fifty years' notice to quit to the landlords.

THE Forty-Second Annual Report of the Working Men's Club and Institute Union records the existence of over 1,000 affiliated clubs with a membership of 350,105. There was a time when the increase of these clubs was looked forward to with enthusiasm as bound to lead to the speedy regeneration of society. The early and generous hopes have not been fully realised. Indeed, at the present time the feeling in regard to them has veered to an extreme pessimism. There are some bad clubs, and it is too hastily assumed that there are few good ones. For the most part the members are not men of a great devotion. They are just ordinary people, who crave recreation for over-tired limb and mind. They seek a not too exacting companionship. These needs the clubs largely supply. And a reading of this latest report of the Union certainly does not justify a gloomy view of their social influence.

WHEN we turn to the evidence as to the work of the Union, which still honours as its veteran President, Stephen Seaward Tayler, we find a record of excellent work. And the present report contains some features of special interest. The year has been marked by the unveiling of the portrait of Mr. Tayler, painted by Miss Minna Tayler, which is now placed in the Union Hall as a companion to the portrait of Mr. Hodgson Pratt, by Mr. Moscheles. The report contains a full account, which may serve as a permanent record of this interesting birthday party. We find also a full report of the visit paid by a large body of clubmen to France. In such ways the Union does bring vigorously before the members those thoughts of larger solidarity and nobler life—those ideals with which man cannot dispense.

A FURTHER feature of the report to which we would call attention is in reference to the Convalescent Home maintained by the clubs. It is hoped at an early date to establish a second Home for the Northern districts. This convalescent work is not only of great benefit to those who go into residence. They regain strength there. They also carry away a higher ideal of health, so that it often falls to a man who has been at the Home to become a health missionary to his friends, spreading a knowledge of the value of fresh air. The existence of this convalescent work gives point to the agitation of the need for increased sanatory provision. And the report includes two very valuable papers by Drs. Latham and Lister on this subject. It is not only more humane, it is also more economical to cure than to neglect consumption. Thus Dr. Latham refers to German experience. When the Sick Insurance scheme was enacted, the insurance societies, simply as a matter of business, began to build sanatoria for the workers. These instances must suffice to suggest the varied and valuable contents of this report, with its record of the social life of the workers of our country.

IT unfortunately became necessary at the last to find a new location for the Friends' Summer School, which was to have been held at Sidcot at the end of August. The choice of the Committee fell on the growing manufacturing village of Street, near Glastonbury; and the enthusiasm and ability with which the local Friends carried out at very short notice the necessary arrangements for accommodating two or three hundred scholars laid the foundation of what was felt to be a very successful gathering. The lecture timetable was a full one, but left time for visits to the ruins of the great western Abbey buildings, to Wells, and to other of the smaller but beautiful churches for which Somerset is famous. The two Sundays during the continuance of the School were pleasantly utilised in visits to some of the smaller meetings in the surrounding villages. The result of this stream of vigorous life is likely to be felt for long in this part of the country, and to strengthen the feeling, in itself a promise of its own fulfilment, that the Society has still a larger part to play in our common religious and social life. This faith in the future was very prominent, and linked itself to the memory of John Wilhelm Rowntree, whose leadership seems to become even clearer and bolder now that he himself in the flesh is no more. His message of Fellowship as the basis of life was constantly heard.

DR. RUFUS JONES' lectures on the "Psychology of Religion" proved very stimulating, and his fearless treatment of such subjects as the Atonement and Prayer was welcomed and received with deep attention. Other lectures were those by Dr. A. C. McGiffert on "Christian Thought in the Apostolic or Post-Apostolic Age." Four lectures on the "Meaning and Worth of Philanthropy" were given by Mr. Kirkman Gray. There were also courses on the Old and New Testaments, and other single lectures on social subjects. We are glad to know that Dr. McGiffert feels himself restored to full strength after the illness that threw him aside from work, and is returning with confidence to his professional tasks in America. It is good news, also, that we may shortly expect another book from him. Readers of the Hibbert Journal already know that his pen is not idle, and may guess at the direction of his thought.

THE recent appointment of Miss Gardner, of Tunbridge Wells, who is a Unitarian, to be head mistress of Blackburn High School for Girls (says Wednesday's Liverpool Echo), was discussed at a largely attended meeting of the Blackburn Ruridecanal Chapter yesterday, the rural dean presiding. A resolution was carried, almost unanimously, regretting the appointment, and recording an emphatic protest against Church bursary-holders being sent to that school by the education authority, believing, as the Chapter does, that a sound Christian education can only be imparted by one who acknowledges the divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ.

DR. W. F. ADENEY sums up some of the reflections prompted by a visit to America in an interesting article in the Christian World upon American Sunday-schools and problems of reform. It is well worth the attention of our own school managers. We even hope for some practical profit from the article, inasmuch as Dr. Adeney has it in his power to influence the men at the Lancashire Independent College in the right direction. Our colleges, he tells us, have done much to turn out scholars and preachers, but not much to fit them for that most important ministerial function, the religious education of children. He finds the Americans ahead of us in various ways; they draw their teachers much more than we do from their foremost men; and they have carried out more thoroughly the work of teaching their teachers what and how to teach. And this in part because the schools are not regarded as "secondary adjuncts to the churches."

IN the Fernley Lecture of Dr. Fitchett on "The Unrealised Logic of Religion," the man who doubts Christianity is reasoned with as follows:—

"Suppose it were discovered beyond "doubt that Shakespeare never existed; "his plays are forgeries; the grave at "Stratford-on-Avon is empty. Still, Ham-"let and Macbeth, the Midsummer Night's "Dream, and The Tempest exist. It takes "a Shakespeare to invent a Shakespeare." Perfectly correct. The argument may be commended to the writers of sensational tracts who go about to prove that if men lost faith in some supernatural story in St. Matthew or St. Luke, the whole world would be full of darkness, that all rational faith and all decent morality would be banished from the civilised world. In point of fact, what is most important in the work of Christ (as in the work of Shakespeare) is not at the mercy of investigation at all. The Sermon on the Mount is as independent of Joseph of Arimathea as the plays of Shakespeare are independent of his traditional burying place.

THE Methodist Pastoral, recently issued by the Wesleyan Conference, sounds a reassuring note on the subject of the "Higher Criticism":—

"Some men take fright because most leaders of Christian thought are no longer able to accept views about Holy Scripture which were generally held a few generations ago. But we believe that, putting aside the mischievous innovations of a few reckless extremists, the trend of modern Biblical study is decidedly to throw us back upon views of Scripture which can be deduced from Scripture itself, in the place of theories which only a later tradition has evolved. You need not fear that the Word of God has anything to lose from the minute examination of scholars who come to it with the same principles of study as are applied to secular literature. We commend to you the saying of a great Christian scholar, who records that he entered upon his studies determined to treat the Bible just like other books, and that it was in this way that he found it was not like other books. Such must always be the result of candid and reverent study of a Book whose all-sufficient evidence is the unchallengeable supremacy it holds among the books that have influenced mankind."

As regards the doctrine of the Deity of Christ, of which the Pastoral declares "It is everything to-day," the declaration is:—

"We have learnt the necessity of recognising in Him a humanity as real as our own; and when we come to define His Godhead we cannot agree on formulæ as precise and logical as former ages thought themselves able to frame. But Christendom has recovered its Te Deum laudamus, 'We praise Thee as God,' and is united in the conviction that every doctrine of the faith must be tested by this touchstone.''

Thus are we, as Unitarians, decisively shut out of "Christendom" by our Wesleyan brethren!

THE notes on the subject of amusements we have read with fuller sympathy:—

"There are men of education and refinement working to-day in our great town Missions who owe their own conversion to the cricket or the concert they undertook for the toilers of the slum . . . Do not, we pray you, leave the saloon, the betting-ring, the low theatre and music-hall to provide the recreations of the masses. Shun like the pestilence everything that is debasing and everything that is doubtful, but draw others to shun them by providing what is better—merriment which has the ring of health and purity in it, laughter which will be welcome to the Father's ears, 'in Whose right hand there are pleasures for evermore.'"

THE September number of the Mill Hill Pulpit completes the thirteenth year of its monthly issue of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermons. This sermon is on "The First Harvest and the Last," and has on its title-page those splendid lines from Browning's "Abt Vogler" beginning, "There shall never be one lost good." From the wonder and the faithfulness of the annually recurring natural harvest we learn to look with deeper faith to the things which abide, in the spiritual life with God.

"Wisdom, Power, Love, shown in the never-failing gifts of Providence, these are one and these are God; as they sung of old in the Temple Courts: 'Who giveth food to all flesh; for His mercy endureth for ever.' And in return for the Love which desires our good, for the Wisdom which contrives, for the Power which effects, we give Love, Hope, Faith. Love to Love, Faith in Wisdom, Hope in Power. And so we rise above this the order of the visible Universe to the invisible, from that which lasts 'while the earth remaineth' to the Eternal which is before the earth and forever."

THE Theologisch Tijdschrift for September bears upon its front page an "In Memoriam" tribute to the late Professor van Manen of Leiden, and the promise of a fuller memorial article in the November number, by Professor Meyboom, of Groningen. Since 1874 van Manen had been a contributor to the Tijdschrift, and in 1890 he joined the editorial board.

THIS month's Contemporary Review gives a large proportion of space to religious subjects. Principal Lindsay writes on "Revivals," and Emma Marie Caillard on "Centres of Scientific and Religious Thought." There is an article on "The Religion of the American Negro," and Mr. Richard Heath discusses the religious bearing of the coming separation between Church and State in France. That is the subject also of an article by M. Combes, the ex-Premier of France, in the Independent Review, while in the Nineteenth Century and After, Mr. Mallock writes on "Christianity as a Natural Religion."

DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI.

I.

THAT sense of Beauty which in most of us, with exception of rare outbursts of brilliancy, flickers but feebly, burned in Rossetti with a constant and steady flame giving rare illumination. It not only dominated every other faculty, but used up every energy that produced their pale ineffectual fire. Beauty not so much attracted him as a devotee, as held him a thrall; she was not so much served by him as he was enslaved by her.

One thing needful.

He had no patience for philosophy; the intellectual problems of theology left him in astonishment that things so remote could ever engage the mind; he hated politics with a lordly hate; science might have its use in the manufacture of pigments, but why, oh why, should men of passion and of imagination waste effort on playthings when there were supreme realities to consider, to be found let us say, in the poems of Keats or the Italian lyrists; why engage in such trivialities while there were "tremendous" and "stunning" pictures to adore and to produce? An anecdote is related how, at a gathering of men of many minds, someone present professed an interest in metaphysics, but was immediately pounced upon by Rossetti, and metaphorically torn limb from limb. The host was constrained to ask Rossetti if he would have all men painters, and if there should be no other occupation for mankind; to which the artist stoutly answered in an emphatic affirmative.

A Master of Men.

This attitude of regarding his life-work as the sole thing worth living for, this exclusive pre-occupation in his art, will largely account for the quickening effect exercised by Rossetti upon the dormant energies of others, for the enthusiasm he evoked, and the loyal discipleship rendered by a group of young men to one fondly called of them "the Master."

A young man, Burne-Jones, is at Oxford preparing for the Church, but under influence of the wizard, he "left all and followed him," becoming a painter instead. A sturdy and self-sufficing nature like William Morris' passes under the same spell, until to him as to his enchanter, the craft of weaving wondrous words and decorative art became the supreme business of life. Another youth intended for the Indian Civil Service, Val Prinsep, no sooner meets this fisher of men, than he may not resist the call to play 'prentice to the merry band who are giving their service in decorating the Oxford Union. That pathetic example of unpractical idealism given by these young giants with vine-leaves in their hair and roses of laughter on their lips, may in its phantom glory outlive many a more permanent work achieved in days of prosperity and eminence.

Personality.

To explain this curious influence which was felt even by much older men like Madox Brown, many factors claim notice. All who knew Rossetti intimately, testify to his possession of personal magnetism, an attractiveness and charm, which exercised an irresistible fascination upon those who came within range of his influence.

Appreciativeness.

Further, inconsiderate as Rossetti appeared in the capricious nature of his domestic habits, whether in his friends' homes or his own, he displayed a genuinely sympathetic interest in the efforts of brother bards and fellow-craftsmen, and felt and expressed an admiration so utterly free from any taint of envy or jealousy as could not fail to win their reciprocal equivalent from his friends. Easily as he made money in the successful years of his career, clever as he proved in making good business over the sale of his pictures, he as easily parted with his wealth under motion of his generous impulses.

Bath-Kol.

Add to this, the possession of a magnificent voice, rich in resonant musicality, through which he communicated his ardent enthusiasm, the fire of an imagination ever prolific of lofty ideas, and laid his deep poetic feeling upon others, until they became inspired by his faith and believed in his belief. To such intensity he aroused the powers of his compeers, that critics claim their more vital, their best work was produced during the period of their close contact with him, as is exemplified by Holman Hunt and Millais.

If it is a greater thing to create poets than to write noble poetry, if it is a greater thing to make artists than to produce pictures, Rossetti must be allowed the title of true master. He at least had the secret of generating the loyalty that builds up great causes. "Why (wrote Philip Marston to another disciple) is he not some great exiled king, that we might give our lives in trying to retore him to his kingdom?" Such is the attachment engendered by enthusiastic leadership in an ideal. To the man who makes us feel how much worth while our pursuit is, who not only shows a path to tread but also the glory and wonder of its treading, we give not our head alone, but our heart; he not only gains our sympathy, he gains us.

Poet-painter not Painter-poet.

Rossetti, however, suffered from the defects of his good qualities. In a sense, he was too ardent to be an expert in technique. He was too much of a poet to become a good painter; conversely, his painter-habit of thinking in terms of painting, his inability to dissever his most purely intellectual ideas from colour and form, marred his work as a poet. The criticism passed by Leigh Hunt in answer to the youthful Rossetti's letter, upon the poems he had enclosed, contains the surmise that the writer was "not so musical as pictorial." The vivid passion which always burned at the core of Rossetti's nature, and for which poetry offered an outlet, does not find attractive means of expression in sculpture to which our subject was never attached, nor in correct drawing based on anatomical science or the mathematics of perspective. Colour does offer such an outlet, over which the painter had an instinctive mastery, enabling him to produce "poems of colour than which (according to Mr. H. Quilter) the world has seen nothing finer since Titian."

Importance of Technique.

But, as Mr. T. Watts-Dunton points out, without knowledge, the artistic camel has to be drawn from the artist's inner consciousness, and the result is rarely a satisfactory quadruped. When we consider how in our day, men with not a tithe of Rossetti's imagination, have conquered the world by sheer cleverness, by a blazing dexterity, we are affected by sublime conjectures of what he might have achieved had his fine frenzy been wed to a more patient industry. The perfection of the plodding craftsman was denied him. He chafed against every yoke. He shirked discipline. Never was a Pegasus more restless in harness. "As soon as a thing is imposed on me as an obligation, my aptitude for doing it is gone," he once said. He therefore remained an amateur of genius to the last. Yet in spite of defects of draughtsmanship, his ignorance of anatomy, nay his repudiation of nature's methods as in the long swan-like necks of his beautiful women, in spite of his lack of equipment furnished by the advanced art schools, he succeeded in communicating to his designs a spirit of poetic romance, an atmosphere of indefinable witchery, making itself so distinctly felt, that Rossetti was enabled to dispense, early in his career, with an appeal to the public, by securing a body of patrons willing to accept everything that came from his hand.

Whatever may be said of a painter who will only work when he is in the exalted mood, when he is possessed by his subject, it can never be made a cavil that he has perpetrated monuments of laborious and ingenious industry; and it is more likely he will be found to have conveyed to his work that peculiar distinction, if only of aloofness from the workshop, which attaches to Rossetti's works.

His soul was like a star, and dwelt apart.

That we have in him a strange and a wilful genius already doth appear. He has been described as an alien in race and an alien in spirit. His family came from Southern Italy, and there was but a dash of Celtic blood, derived from Miss Pierce who became his maternal grandmother, to prevent him from being a thorough Italian. This Southerner by race was born and bred in London; "a great Italian tormented in the Inferno of London" is Ruskin's description. Moreover, he was the son of a proscribed exile, a revolutionary poet who had to flee his country for his sympathy with political reform; something of a mystic too, who published an exhaustive work on Dante of which only one copy is supposed to be extant in this country, the copy in the British Museum. The eldest son received as a precious heritage, the name of the ather's favourite poet, a name which to the bearer became more than a name—a determining influence, even an obsession. His noblest pictures derive their interest from the Vita Nuova, which the author's modern namesake lovingly translated into English.

This banishment from the sunny Italian skies to the city of fogs on the Thames, the sense of alienation from the people among whom they lived, may partly account for the inwardness, the egoistic seclusion, the melancholy, the morbidity which seem to characterise the moods of the painter as they did those of his sister Christina, amply testified by her poetic work. They may partly account, also, for the affectionate family life in which the Rossetti household was drawn closely together, and it is sweet to remember that the poet-painter's attachment to his mother remained steadfast and reverent till his death.

Child, father of the man.

The four children inherited great mental gifts, which were manifested in early years, for at the age of twelve, Dante Gabriel honoured his grandfather by allowing him to print a poem of his in four parts. The eldest boy, Dante, who was born in 1828, displayed almost in infancy, signs of a love of drawing and verse-making. One of his earliest recollections connected itself with his use of paper and pencil in attempting to fix the shapes that rose within him, for his hope, even then, was to be a painter. At a later period he considerably hesitated whether to devote himself to literature or to art. He received training in an art school, on the assumption he was to become an artist. It was Leigh Hunt's advice, that poetry was not a thing for a man to live upon while he is in the flesh, however immortal it may render him in spirit.

LITERATURE.

MR. BALMFORTH'S NEW BOOK.*

In a series of well-planned books Mr. Balmforth has shown that it is quite possible to bring the main results of Biblical research within reach of popular interest and intelligence. Something of the fascination of a journey into unexplored lands must have been experienced by many readers of his book on the Old Testament. He now imparts the same fascination when he tells afresh the tremendous story of Christian origins in his latest work. The same courage, lucidity, and impassioned advocacy of high intellectual and ethical ideals which marked his other books are here again; the same broad appeal to the average reader who is acquainted with the great names at least of literature, and wants to square his religious outlook with a sane recognition of "the modern spirit."

Perhaps the characteristic ideas of the author can best be indicated by referring to his attitude towards the Christian religion and his view of its importance and validity to-day. He holds that there are certain "eternal verities," for "every man has a creed," and "A creed is necessary to every man who would live a wisely-ordered life." This creed and these verities are said to be different, in some way not quite made out, from "purely speculative creeds." It would probably be to mistake the author's meaning if we supposed his eternal verities to mean simply "moral convictions" as distinguished from religious, although he thinks that Jesus placed morality before religion (p. 108). But it is clearly religion that he intends to set forth, and the verities spoken of appear to be God, the soul, morals, and a future life. The attempt to put these things aside from controversy and away from the rest of "speculative creeds" is a somewhat large order; but his instinct is no doubt right when it tells him that religion cannot be stripped of such verities if it is to retain its name. Only, by the inclusion of these beliefs he considerably weakens the force of his protest against "merely speculative beliefs." The age-long and salutary conflict of creeds cannot be settled in this summary way. Is not this kind of protest against speculative creeds, as such, a fight against a man of straw? Are not all beliefs infinitely more than speculative? Our author, however, draws his dividing line at the cardinal beliefs mentioned, and he has no difficulty in finding them (mixed up with a great deal of superstition) in the teachings of Jesus and the early Christians. Mr. Balmforth's historical method is to regard the pure and unadulterated milk of these cardinal truths as the real meaning of Christianity, which became corrupted and soured by a long line of perversions, beginning with Paul, who "helped to forge new fetters for the spirit of man" (p. 146). On this theory there is no such thing as a progressive development of ideas and spiritual motives, in the sense of E. Caird or Loisy, or the early (and, alas! unworked) theory of Martineau. The secular upheavals of thought and faith during nineteen centuries go for nothing, or worse than nothing. The primary truths of the Gospel were buried as soon as enunciated, not to be disinterred again till the arrival of the twentieth century. Have we not here a curious reversion to the sixteenth and seventeenth century manner of referring to the Apostolic age for the pure Gospel? Indeed, the fundamental thought in the author's rationale of the history of religion seems to be that we can go to the ideas of the Founder, and separate out the essential from the accidental; whereas a more fruitful view seems to be that all we can do, in the case of a growing faith, is to decide what is, for us, the true outcome of the development which Christianity has at the present time reached; in other words, the stage of its development which most fully preserves the tradition of a full and growing spiritual life. It might even be argued that this is actually the method which our modern thought follows (although often unconsciously) when at its best. Mr. Balmforth himself follows it when he defends himself against the charge of modernising and adding to the thoughts of Jesus. "Revelation," as he says, "never ceases, and the Spirit is with us also" (p. 106). Surely, then, revelation did not cease all through the long interim between A.D. 30 and A.D. 1905? May not even the speculative creeds of atonement and mediation, of Trinity and the rest, have been channels of that revelation? All this suggests that we shall never be able to further the growth of the tree of Christianity by digging up and scrutinising its roots, but only by a profound appreciation of and insight into the Christian consciousness to-day at its best. Those, however, who are indifferent to the future career of Christianity will not consider this an important result to aim at. Mr. Balmforth, in fact, seems to cut himself off from the Christian tradition at a point where even most advanced thinkers find a vital connection with it. This is in the chapter (XV.) in which he endeavours to state what he thinks to be the relation of New Testament teachings to modern thought. Very fascinating reading it makes, for one hears in it that fateful crumbling away of the old certitudes of faith which seems inevitable when the immense significance for history of Christianity is lost sight of. It is "the Fatherhood of God" that Mr. Balmforth seems to indicate as the cardinal point in the teaching of Jesus which our modern thought must reject. We are to think of God, not as Father, but as "the Spirit, limited somehow by the laws which condition its development"; for "the ways of God, in nature, and the ways of our human fatherhood are at issue. We strive to mete out justice, nay, more than justice, to our children . . . God does not, or cannot" (p. 249). Here, of course, in this unmistakably earnest and solemn passage, is the natural outcome of the particular historical method already hinted at. An atomistic, or individualistic, or ultra-Protestant treatment must always tend in this direction in the hands of an utterly sincere thinker, as in the present case. A Theism which consists of any chance generalisations on the nature of God which may occur to a solitary student must end in abstractions and disappointments; whereas a living religion will take account of, and will grow out of, what has happened through the ages and is now happening in the world of men. Unless we are open to believe in the spiritual solidarity of humanity, particularly as represented in its best heads and hearts; in other words, unless we can find a vital significance (and not merely a dead symbolism) in the great conceptions of atonement, of mediation, of the Catholic body of Christ now spiritually existing in the world; then a chill, devastating and paralysing, must creep up to the very heart of our faith.

It is only fair to say, however, that this is not the prevailing note of the book, which, upon the whole, is filled with a profound and wistful reverence for Jesus Christ. That it leaves Christ and his work still unexplained is perhaps no very strange or discouraging result. No reader can come away from it without having been made to ask all the old questions of the soul afresh, and, sooner or later, that means to ask them in the light of the developed Christian consciousness.

W. WHITAKER.

IN A PARIS FAUBOURG.*

THE Paris of the great railway stations, the great boulevards, of the Louvre, the Bon Marché and the opera is very near to England and quite familiar. But round about the Paris of Baron Haussmann lies a ring of suburbs, almost of separate towns, which are as unfamiliar to most Englishmen as the heights of the Himalayas. This is the Paris of the French working classes, and it is of this Paris we may learn much that is both instructive and attractive from Mr. Steele's slender volume. The author is well advised in assuming that his readers know very little about his subject, and in telling his story quite simply with many slight touches revealing things which to him must have become trivial by their utter familiarity, since he has dwelt for the greater part of his life in France. He draws many comparisons and contrasts with English life, not so much to suggest a judgment of better or worse, but to help us to appreciate the French life he describes. The picture drawn in detail is of life in Grenelle, of the circumstances of the upper grade of the workers, especially of the engineers, his own shop mates and comrades. In such a district we find a local life. The workman when his work is done remains in his own neighbourhood, the last thing he thinks about is to go into the City. On Sunday he may go to the woods of Clamart; he will go in little family groups and together with his neighbours. Indeed, one thing which strikes us is the development of character in the direction of camaraderie. The intercourse is frank and constant.

Side by side with this is a family life marked by much reticence. A French working family, e.g., never takes in lodgers. The life of the home is strong. "One of the facts of French family life is that, in spite of the seemingly sordid nature of the marriage contract, there are so few unhappy marriages." An explanation of this may be found in the extent to which the welfare of the children becomes the pivot on which everything turns. An American sociologist has proposed to substitute for the ideal of the Fatherland that of the children's land. The French mother, we are told, devotes "a great deal more of her time to the real duties of motherhood, viz., playing with her children. . . . The parents also take a keen interest in the education of the children and help them in their school life."

This picture of the family introduces us to one form of the class war, which is so widespread. The man is usually a free-thinker. He hates the Church. But the woman wishes to be correctly married by the priest; he shrugs his shoulders and submits. There may be more disputes about the baptism, the first communion, or the burial. But he usually gives way in the end. After all, he argues, it does not much matter. And while in greater matters of thought he is revolutionary, he is by instinct conservative in unessentials.

The experience of the workshop reveals another form of the division of classes, the workers and the employers are more class conscious than with us, and more irreconcileable. But also, Mr. Steele tells us, in their personal relations they are more courteous. They cannot forget that they belong to a polite race. The hours of a French artizan are longer than in England; the stress of toil is less. A man under the eye of a foreman will leave his bench to speak to a mate. Frequently, smoking at intervals is allowed or connived at. Then the French mechanic takes 1½ hours for déjeuner and enjoys a leisurely and varied repast, together with plenty of conversation. But underneath these amenities deep discontent lurks, a discontent which "does not find expression in constant grumbling," for "it is a peculiarity of the character of the French people to look on the cheerful side of things."

The French have fewer co-operative societies and fewer trade unions than we have, but while with us these associations are commonly conservative in the sense of accepting the industrial system, in France they are revolutionary in their aim and look to a reconstruction of society. But if the impression is to be accepted that France still holds volcanic possibilities of disruption and civic turmoil, yet when we think of the French attitude to internationalism we find a presage of peace. Mr. Steele insists that among the workers there was no anti-English feeling during the Boer war. On one occasion a number of boys followed an English working man with the cry Vive Kruger! Before he could remonstrate some French working men promptly stopped the cry with, "He is a workman like ourselves. He did not make the war," and then, "Allons! camarade, come and have a cup of coffee with us."

International peace is an ideal to which the French worker is said to be ardently devoted. But there is more security of promise than that. The class-conscious proletarian knows that war is against his interest. His rulers may gain by it, He only loses and pays for losing. An illustration of this consciousness is found in one of the université populaire syllabuses where we find a list of social pests,—drunkenness, consumption, war. Then every Frenchman knows what the army means, and when he returns to civil life he remembers his experience.

The hints given on this subject are among the useful and hopeful features of this book. Mr. Steele wishes to assist l'entente cordiale. He does well, accordingly, to emphasise the peaceful attitude of the French worker. The picture he gives us is a pleasant one. Of course there is a darker side, which the writer touches upon but, in the main, he is telling us about his own comrades, and he writes with affection. The value of the book is not less on that account. It would indeed be a good thing if in the coming winter it were adopted as a text book in many a reading circle in this country. If we are freely to trust foreigners we need to know them. And Mr. Steele tells us much which English people will do well to learn of the inner life, the experiences, the thoughts and the ideals of the multitude of the people who toil in the fair land of France.

FEUDAL SOCIETY IN ENGLAND.

SOMEBODY made a calculation of the number of statements of fact to be found in the average upon any single page of Macaulay's history of England, and the result was astonishing. Miss Mary Bateson's volume upon "Mediæval England"* would lend itself with encouraging statistics to an investigation of the same kind; but while Macaulay narrates, it is Miss Bateson's purpose to compile and record. The book is a history of social conditions rather than of politics, social conditions in England from the landing of William the Conqueror to the appearance of Roger Bacon at Oxford in the middle of the reign of Edward III. We have here a storehouse of information; collected and arranged with order and method, and the historian has spared no pains to be precise and accurate. Miss Bateson thrice surveys the social changes of the three centuries, passing in review the life of court and castle and monastery, and town and country household, as high and low shared the development and the decline of feudalism. The changes that transformed the household establishment of William the Conqueror into the court of later times; the barons building their keeps and castles; the progress of the imagination called chivalry among armoured knights and squires and ladies of high degree; the lists, the tournament; the pageantry of the church, with its bishops and abbots, its many orders, military and monastic, its ceremonies and services, its cathedrals and books of piety, and stained glass window-panes; the uprising universities, their masters and clerks and poor travelling scholars; the life of the villain, of the burgess, and of the soldier—these are some of the topics which make Miss Bateson's volume interesting to lovers of the past and of their own country. A word must be spoken also for the illustrations, which are numerous, and afford a lively commentary upon the text.

CIVIC APATHY.*

THE sermon preached by Dr. Hunter a few weeks ago, and now published by request, is an eloquent and timely appeal to regard civic duties as a mode of religious responsibility. Incidentally, it affords a refutation of the rather prevalent notion that politics cannot fitly be discussed from the pulpit. This sermon is throughout dealing with politics, and it is marked throughout, as we should expect from Dr. Hunter, by the note of high moral and religious fervour. It does not go into any great detail as to methods of civic service. Nor was that necessary. The two practical conclusions as to the work of citizenship are profoundly simple. Live a true life. That first; and then, "You must make it part of your religion, as William Penn said, to see that your city and country are well governed."

What Dr. Hunter chiefly and successfully attempts is to touch with religious emotion the whole thought of citizenship. "We have a true city only where we find a community of men and women impressed by the idea of a life in common, to which all contribute and for which all feel responsible." And for this civic doctrine the preacher claims the authority of Jesus, "who taught a religion which is the best charter of the city that now is, as well as the prophecy and promise of the Eternal City of God." Here we touch the central thought of the sermon. The city that now is is to become the city of God. The Jews' heavenly ideal was a new Jerusalem. Why is not ours a new Paris, a new London? Starting from this civic conception, Dr. Hunter turns his appeal to young men—who ought to be enthusiasts. Many influences hold them back. The systematic teaching of selfishness to boys, the cult of wealth, a spurious pietism. His appeal secondly was to women: "The domestic life is not the whole life of a woman. . . . Give the women of London and England the sense that they belong to a people." And this religious conviction of civic duty, of responsibility for right life conditions, is to be worked out in imperial relations, in national politics, in municipal work. It is to be concrete, pertinacious, thoughtful, as continuous as the care we give to home or business, and as fervent as our worship itself.

In one respect only do we suggest a criticism. Dr. Hunter more than once argues that this work to which he calls women and men can be carried out without touching party politics. If party politics have become mere struggles for party ends and for official prestige, this is true. But if, and so far as, "party" represents a real cleavage of thought as to the ends to be secured, so far it would seem that we must make our choice. There certainly is such a cleavage of thought to-day, although the historic parties may not represent it. After all, this is a minor point in a strong challenge to that civic religion which shall be the "germ of the true commonwealth."

* A sermon by the Rev. John Hunter, D.D. Williams & Norgate, 6d.

"FROM Generation to Generation" is the subject of the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong's sermon published in this month's Sermons for the Day. It was preached just a year ago, on September 11, in Hope-street Church, and, taking for parable the beautiful unfolding of a begonia flower, it passed, with a reference to H. G. Wells's essay, "Man in the Making," to speak of what we owe to the mothers of the world, and how the striving for a better future must not blind us to the sacredness and worth of the present and the abiding value of each living soul.

"So we dissent from the sardonic preacher of old who thought all labour defrauded of its wage because one generation sows and another reaps the harvest; and we agree with our English essayist that, contemplating the story of the world as an infinite series of births, our labour has its highest dignity and wage in that it serves not ourselves alone, but shall serve such as shall inhabit the earth when our names are no more spoken by the lips of men. And yet, as I said at the beginning, the truth which he proclaims needs balancing by a supplementary and complementary truth if it is to be true indeed. There could be no good in providing for the men and women of the next generation, unless to be a man or woman were in itself a thing essentially good and sacred. Unless a human soul is a thing of great worth, I know not why I should slave for a group of souls who are to be here in my place and the place of my friends forty or fifty years hence. It is true that we hope they may be on the way to becoming higher and better beings than we are ourselves, that we believe that it is the destiny of our race to rise to higher things than we have yet attained. But that hope and trust are based precisely on the fact that we find a human being here and now to be an entity capable of a great and excellent worth. And no man will do much to improve posterity, unless he daily strives to improve himself."

OBITUARY.

THE LATE REV. JOHN WILLIAMS.

THE late Rev. John Williams, who passed away at Nottingham on August 19th last, was a native of the south of England, and both his father and grandfather were clergymen. He was brought up to business, and eventually settled in the United States, where he became Unitarian and entered the ministry, having charge of congregations in Boston and elsewhere in Massachusetts. He there came much into contact with Dr. Edward Everett Hale, with whom he always enjoyed a warm friendship.

Mr. Williams returned to England in 1873, and occupied the pulpit of Christ Church, Nottingham, where he ministered until 1879. After another visit to the States, Mr. Williams again settled in England, and for a short period was minister at Loughborough. His health, however, gave way, and he afterwards lived in retirement, though occasionally preaching, and used not infrequently to read the lessons at St. Jude's Church, Nottingham, with whose late vicar he was on very friendly terms. Mr. Williams had been a widower for two or three years prior to his death. He was a man of much culture, a thoughtful, effective preacher, and an admirable pastor, forming many warm friendships with those among whom he ministered.

MR. GEORGE BROTHERS.

A LONG life of unassuming, faithful service was brought to a peaceful close on Tuesday, September 5, when Mr. George Brothers, of Canterbury, passed away at Orchard House, Wincheap, in his eighty-seventh year. Though Mr. and Mrs. Brothers celebrated their golden wedding four years ago, it was difficult for friends to realise that he had reached so great an age; but during the present year his strength had gradually ebbed away, and without any acute illness he quietly obeyed the final call. The news will touch the chords of pleasant and grateful memory in many former students of Manchester New College, who during their years in London found at Canterbury, as at Ditchling and elsewhere, an opportunity for their first essays in preaching. The quaint old chapel in Blackfriars was the home of only the faithful remnant of a congregation, but there was always a cordial welcome for the young preachers, and from no one did they receive more constant kindness than from Mr. Brothers and the members of his family.

Born at Sheerness, December 29, 1818, Mr. Brothers came to Canterbury, after a short residence at Maidstone, and from the year 1859 onwards was there in the employ of Messrs. Ash & Co., at the Dane John Brewery, until his retirement some fifteen years ago. He had been early instructed in the principles of Unitarianism, for while he was still in the old home at Sheerness, his father discovered through attending a lecture directed against that heresy, that it represented the convictions to which he had been brought in his own religious life. So both at Maidstone and and throughout his long residence at Canterbury, Mr. Brothers was a staunch supporter of the Unitarian congregation, and for more than twenty-five years at Canterbury he has acted as secretary and treasurer to the congregation. A man of sterling qualities and kindliest disposition, he had many friends and was widely known and respected in the city. By young and old alike his familiar presence will be sorely missed.

The funeral service on Friday afternoon, September 8, was conducted by the Revs. J. H. Smith and V. D. Davis, the beautiful cemetery being bathed in peaceful sunshine at the time.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A SEASIDE HOLIDAY.

VIII.

TEA was laid in the garden at Brookside, and, although some of the party had but recently partaken of whortleberries and cream curds, they found themselves glad to join the home party, who were by this time quite ready for a hearty meal. It is wonderful how good food tastes when the eater is braced up by a "change of air."

It took all the half-hour devoted to tea to recount all their experiences in the village, and on the way to and fro.

"And now, what have you been doing?" Elsie asked her uncle. "Did the two boys get in your way and spoil everything?"

"No, miss, they didn't; so you can just sit down and be quiet, like a good little girl. Little children should be seen and not heard." It was her brother Frank, of course, who said this, and Elsie was about to answer back, when Uncle Ned said: "You had better all come into the Den and see for yourselves whether there has been any spoiling! But, don't forget the slippers and quiet movements. Our beauties are some of them very shy and modest, and will quickly withdraw from the gaze of rough and boisterous folk."

So, when they had changed thick boots for soft slippers, they were all ushered into the Ogre's Den and shown round.

In the bigger aquariums and tanks they found many wonderful forms of sea life so placed that their beautiful structure and peculiar habits could be watched quietly and at leisure. Uncle Ned gave the name and a brief description of each, noting its habits, and the adaptations to its surroundings displayed by each. The creatures were very beautiful to look at, even without any description or explanation; but after hearing all that Uncle Ned had to tell about them, they appeared ten times more marvellous, and, as Mab said, they were "beautiful with a meaning." Mr. Holden was much struck with this remark of Mab's. "That is always a result of loving nature-study," he said, "we find that there is a meaning and reason for the beauties we note, and when our reason discovers reason in nature, the discovery makes us wondrous glad; we feel that somehow we and nature are of one parentage and source, and that a great and Infinite Mind is expressing Itself in all things around us and within."

In one of the aquariums Uncle Ned had placed the fragment of rock which he had chipped off with his chisel, on which was a lovely sea-anemone, which, believing itself at home in the still waters of the rock pool, was now fully expanded in all its beauty of colour, form, and texture.

Into the same vessel he had dropped the scallop shell, on which a small colony of Serpulæ had constructed their tubes. Tube-dwelling worms are very shy, and hard to persuade to display their plumy breathing gills; but, when they do so, there are few more wonderfully magnificent objects to be found in the sea. It was chiefly on account of these lovely creatures that Uncle Ned had laid down the rule about slippers, in order to avoid startling the serpulæ by the vibration of heavy treading. And now they were all rewarded, for the little colony was all ablaze with gorgeous scarlet crowns of branchiæ (or gills), all fully expanded and waving to and fro, like living plumes of feathers.

In another tank there were prawns, transparent as glass and "lively as crickets." So transparent were they that it was possible to see what they had been having for dinner, and it was noticeable that those which had fed on green food chose to rest on bits of green seaweed, whilst those who had pink or purple dinners inside them rested on the pink and purple bits of weed, which Uncle Ned had been careful to provide. Owing to this habit of the prawns, it became necessary to tap the sides of the tank to make them dart off the weed in order to see them at all. Very knowing they looked, with their eyes set on little movable stalks, and with their three pairs of feelers (antennæ) reaching out in front, at the sides, and behind. It is believed that they hear and smell with their antennæ, as well as feel.

Very curious and interesting, also, were some star-fishes and sea-urchins, which were slowly creeping up the side of their tank by means of sucker-"feet." Using the watchmaker's lenses, provided by their uncle, the children could see these minute "feet" writhing and fixing themselves to the glass, and so pulling their owners along.

But of all the graceful and delicate sea-folk there were none to equal the rosy-feather stars. One of these—a special beauty, rosy pink in colour, with vermilion spots down the sides of each pinnule of the ten arms—was placed all by itself in a deep jar of sea-water, so as not to be disturbed or interfered with by any meddlesome companion. As it lay at the bottom, it appeared to be going through exercises in graceful movements. At one time all the ten arms were stretched out at full length, so that the creature appeared, indeed, like a feathery star; then the tips of each of the arms, and the side pinnules, were slowly curved upwards in regular spiral coils, giving the appearance of a Persian tiara or Jewish high priest's mitre. An outward curve of the tips then made the creature take the form of a gracefully shaped flower-vase with spreading rim. Hardly for a minute was the feather-star quite still, and always its changing movements resulted in graceful and beautiful patterns. At length, tiring of slow movement, it began to lash the water with its ten arms, alternately raising one set of five, and then the other set, by which motion it raised itself in the water and swam to the surface; and never at any time were its movements awkward or ungraceful. Mrs. Holden said it reminded her of a beautiful verse of poetry, or of an exquisite piece of music, full of harmonies and beautiful with rhythm.

There were many other marvels large enough to be seen without magnifying glasses, but there is not time to tell you about them, and you must get your Uncle Ned to take you to the seaside and show you the living things. But our Uncle Ned had brought a microscope with him to Brookside, and now he displayed to the delighted young folk sea-creatures so small as hardly to be visible to the naked eye, and yet, when seen through the magic glass, perfectly marvellous, and much too beautiful for me to attempt to describe them, gliding about and disporting themselves, or waving their tentacles, or their "cilia," in mazy calisthenic movements, more graceful than those taught in any "musical" or "Swedish" drill.

So, for nearly two hours, they visited Fairyland in the Ogre's Den, and, being wholly interested and perfectly happy, they forgot the flight of time, and marvelled greatly when told that the exhibition must close as it was now bed-time.

T. ROBINSON.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL announce a new edition of Mr. G. H. Perris's "Russia in Revolution." Among the additions to the new volume are the substance of many conversations with Father Gapon, a remarkable hitherto unpublished portrait of the latter, and a critical account of the decree establishing an Elective Assembly.

NATURE cries aloud for freedom as our proper good, our birthright, and our end, and resents nothing so much as its loss. It is true that we are placed at first in subjection to others' wills, and spend childhood and youth under restraint. But we are governed at first that we may learn to govern ourselves; we begin with leading strings that we may learn to go alone. The discipline of the parent is designed to train up his children to act for themselves, and from a principle of duty in their own breasts. The child is not subjected to his father to be a slave, but to grow up to the energy, responsibility, relations, and authority of a man. Freedom, courage, moral force, efficiency, independence, the large, generous action of the soul, these are the blessings in store for us, the grand ends to which the restraints of education, of family, of school, and college are directed. Nature knows no such thing as a perpetual yoke. Nature bends no head to the dust, to look for ever downward. Nature makes no man a chattel. Nature has implanted in all souls the thirst, the passion for liberty.

Channing.

WHAT does wisdom say, from experience, are the grand ends of human life? Goodness, purity, affection—simply doing God's will, and trying to make others happy. For attaining most completely these ends, a very humble sphere of duty and small allotment of intellectual ability—if faithfully improved—abundantly suffice. And let us remember he who well improves what God has given, hearkens to the voice within, and does right, is the truly wise, is God's accepted child, and is in the sure road to heaven.—J. J. Tayler.

MUTUAL ENCOURAGEMENT.

THE echoes of the International Council meetings in Geneva have by no means died away, and for many a long day we shall have with us the quickened sense of fellowship and of faith confirmed, which we received from that great gathering of friends from many lands.

What we propose in the present article is to furnish to our readers some proof that it is not only on our side that such gladness and encouragement are felt, but that both in the faith in which the meetings were anticipated and in the happiness of their accomplishment, Switzerland, our hospitable entertainer, Germany and France, Holland and, we may be sure, the other countries which sent representatives, were with us and our American brethren, of one mind and heart. Indeed, the whole record of the proceedings, which we published last week, proved that to have been the case. The testimony, which we here produce, simply widens the range of that impression.

And, in the first place, we have to make good an omission in our report of the proceedings. At the farewell banquet on Thursday evening, after the speeches to which we referred, Professor MONTET, the indefatigable President, offered a further toast of all the visitors, and spoke in terms of the warmest gratitude of their presence in such numbers and from so many lands, and of the acknowledgments which they had made of the hospitable welcome accorded to them in Geneva. Professor MONTET spoke first in his native French, but then in English added the following words:—

"Ladies and Gentlemen, Representatives of England and the United States, it is a special pleasure for me to thank you. You were the founders and organisers of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers. To you the Association owes its origin and its life. You are our strength. It is through you we have learned of the extension in every part of the world of our principles and convictions. We are profoundly grateful to you, and cannot too often repeat it.

"I have not yet had the pleasure of visiting the United States, though I hope to have that pleasure shortly. But when I was in England, I saw with joy the vitality and activity of your Unitarian churches, and I know that it is the same in America. If other evidence were needed, your presence amongst us is enough. Thank you for having come, and having come in such large numbers.

"And my thanks are extended beyond England to India, to you, the representatives of the Brahmo-Samaj. You, too, are our spiritual brothers, and we are very grateful to you for having undertaken so long a voyage to be present with us."

From the side of German Switzerland the feeling was no less cordial. We have reported Pastor SCHÖNHOLZER's happy expression of that sense of unity which pervaded the assembly. Here are some words of welcome published on the previous Saturday in the Schweizerisches Protestantenblatt, doubtless from the pen of the Rev. A. ALTHERR, of Basle. The days of intolerance, stained in Geneva by the crime of the burning of SERVETUS, were past. Liberals and strict Calvinists, he said, had united in erecting the expiatory monument, and that welcome to the champions of religious freedom and free religion, they might offer, in the name of the whole community of the educated and the tolerant of heart:—

"Let us recount to one another how it stands with religious freedom among the different nations of the earth. Whoever in his home still sighs under unchristian compulsion and godless intolerance, let us take that man's hand and strengthen his heart for a good fight. And whoever in this conflict can tell of victory, let him do so, to the glory of GOD, who has called us to this freedom. Above all, let our personal intercourse, friend looking into the face of friend, strengthen us all in the confidence that our work is not in vain in the LORD. Let no place where there is freedom be strange to another! And let him who has a difficult and solitary battle to fight at home feel his heart strengthened by the certainty that GOD is with him, and that he has friends and comrades the wide world over. 'The LORD is the Spirit, and where the spirit of the LORD is, there is liberty.' Therefore, friends and brothers from many lands, Welcome!"

On the same day, in the Protestantenblatt, published at Bremen and Berlin, a cordial greeting to the Council from Germany appeared. Having told of the previous meetings, and wished every success to that at Geneva, in the interest of religious tolerance and freedom, the article continued:—

"We liberals in Germany, especially those of us who are united in the German Protestantenverein, feel our kinship with the Unitarians, and, if we were in England or America, should doubtless belong to them. Often have we drawn strength from the history of the Unitarians. They are a people whom no persecution or oppression has been able to suppress. From their youth up they were sorely pressed, but not overcome. So they strengthen us to believe in the victory of our good cause, for which in Germany also many have already fought and suffered. And we thank that brave company for the powerful testimony of the great preachers and prophets, born of their fellowship, whose light has gone forth far beyond the borders of the English-speaking nations.

"To unite the scattered forces of Liberalism in all lands, to exchange common ideas, to unfurl everywhere the banner of progress, to further our cause both by thought and deed, that is the end to which all who are taking part in this Congress promise their help; and to this we also would give our support. If now the intolerant in Germany, both in public meetings and secret gatherings, are pledging themselves to fight to the death against our cause, we promise the free men of all nations gathered in this Geneva Council that we will defend the old flag with German faithfulness and courage. A true German greeting to the free Council in Geneva! May it be proclaimed in all tongues that GOD is a GOD of truth, and that we will no longer suffer ourselves to be caught in any yoke of servitude. 'Where the spirit of the LORD is, there is liberty!'"

And, finally, in last Saturday's papers—in Le Protestant, published at Paris, and in De Hervorming, published at Amsterdam, we have the testimony of members, who were present at Geneva, to the happy sense of unity in the one Spirit, and of strong encouragement, which were the fruit of those meetings; and we are certain that our Unitarian brethren from Hungary would be at one with us in this feeling.

We have to be very thankful that our English contingent was able to make so substantial a contribution to the success of the Geneva meetings, both in the numbers present and in the papers and the personal influence of our leaders. It is no matter for boasting; it should be a stimulus to more strenuous and humble service in the time to come, since there is laid upon us not only the duty of bearing a faithful witness to the truth and the true life with God in the midst of the churches and the work-a-day affairs of this nation, but the duty also, and the happy privilege, of helping and encouraging our brethren in other lands on whom is laid, perhaps, a harder task than ours.

THE STATE AND PROSPECT OF LIBERAL RELIGION IN THE UNITED STATES.*

BY THE REV. F. C. SOUTHWORTH, PRESIDENT OF THE MEADVILLE THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL.

IN the covenant drawn up by the Pilgrims on the Mayflower nearly three hundred years ago, whereby they agreed to walk together in the ways which God had made known or should in the future make known to them, are contained the germs both of the political and also of the religious liberty to which the American nation seems from the beginning to have been implicitly dedicated. To the greater portion of the Christian world the idea that there is a field for the free exercise of the human reason in the objects of religious faith, is still a new and startling one. In the providence of God it was given to a little company of churches in Eastern Massachusetts early in the nineteenth century to commit themselves to that proposition; and the result was American Unitarianism. It was not an accident that the Plymouth church of the Pilgrims, organised at Scrooby, should have been found upon the Unitarian side at the time of the Congregational schism in New England, and that it is found on that side to-day. It was a part of the inevitableness of history. And it was equally inevitable that a land of free schools and a free press and an unrestricted ballot should refuse permanently to tolerate the restriction of such freedom in religious thought. It was entirely fitting therefore that the city of the New World which was the first to express its resentment against the principle of taxation without representation, should have given birth to a religious movement, which, more consistently than any similar movement in history, has contested the right of any prelate or synod or hierarchy to define authoritatively the faiths of the human heart; and it seems almost to have been a part of the same inevitableness of which I have spoken that "the shot heard round the world" which was fired at Lexington, should have been followed by Channing's trumpet-blast at the ordination of Jared Sparks, demanding in the name of pure religion the same liberty which the yeomen of 1776 had demanded in the name of a just government.

The most cheering word which I can bring to this meeting, in behalf of those of us in America who, in a certain way, look to Channing as our prophet, is that we are trying to be true to the splendid traditions which are ours by inheritance.

To refer briefly to the work of our organisations which are national in character:—Since the last meeting of this Council the National Unitarian Conference has held a successful session in Atlantic City, where reports from the meeting at Amsterdam were listened to with warm interest. Meanwhile, the American Unitarian Association, our most important missionary society, under the vigorous leadership of Samuel A. Eliot and Charles E. St. John, has been conducting its business with its usual efficiency. It has been actively engaged in the planting of new churches, in helping to bring to self support societies already formed, in the publication and distribution of books and tracts, and in maintaining missionaries in the field. In some of these activities the Association has received able assistance from a kindred society, the National Alliance of Unitarian Women. This unique and admirable organisation increases from year to year in vigour and efficiency. Choosing its officers as it does with unusual care and discrimination, retaining them in office long enough to secure in them that wisdom which comes from experience, and adhering steadily to those lines of work which it can do effectively, it seems to combine the energy of the prophets with the consecration of the apostles and the perseverance of the saints. None of our denominational gatherings are so loyally attended, and nowhere is the flame of missionary zeal more constant than in this splendid society of women.

During the opening years of the century God has blessed the garners of the American people with liberal store, and the constituency for which I have the privilege of speaking has shared in the general prosperity. But what is more important, the hearts of some of the possessors of large wealth have been opened, to the end that they have given largely of their substance for religious purposes. By this means the burden of debt by which the usefulness of many churches had been hampered has been removed, a goodly number of noble church edifices, among them one of the most beautiful in America, have been erected, and the endowments or existing denominational institutions have been largely increased. One of the most important achievements of recent years has been the founding, under Unitarian auspices, of two splendidly equipped schools for boys at Concord and Tarrytown, the latter bearing a name which has become a symbol of unstinted generosity in the promotion of liberal Christianity. The Tarrytown school is located in a spot which is unsurpassed for natural beauty, and is already filled to overflowing with active and promising boys.

But I would not convey the impression that our little company of five hundred Unitarian churches are alone in upholding in America the banner of liberal religion. They are not even the largest among the liberal bodies. The Universalists, with a somewhat larger number of churches, are actively in the field. Reformed Judaism is discovering a growing constituency in our larger cities, and is coming into a position of moral and intelligent leadership there. The Hicksite friends continue true to their traditions of spiritual freedom, and though their funeral sermon as an organisation has been preached many times, they are continuing quietly, but none the less effectively, their interesting work of emancipation. A group of German churches in the Central West, less than a hundred in number, but of considerable influence in some of our larger cities, have broken away from their respective synods, and are proclaiming Unitarian doctrines. Several of their ablest preachers, indeed, received their training in the Meadville Theological School.

But to deal in these terms with the state of liberal religion in the United States is to create a painfully wrong impression. For what are these few churches and missionary organisations in the face of a a population of eighty millions with an enormous annual increase from immigration and all the social and political and ecclesiastical problems which such an increase involves? A stranger in America might properly ask the question why, with our unsurpassed resources, church extension had not been far more rapid, and why, at the present time, having attained the prerogative of free speech in a free pulpit, the best youths of our land are not turning in large numbers to the ministry of liberal religion.

These questions bring us face to face with the peculiar service which American Unitarianism has rendered to American life, and also with the peculiar obstacles which have retarded its growth as an organisation. It is a commonplace among those who are familiar with the situation, that the growth of organised Unitarianism has been retarded by the fact that it has done its work so well. Doctrines which were at one time regarded as its peculiar property are now accepted without question by progressive minds everywhere, and are proclaimed from a thousand professedly orthodox pulpits. They are published daily to the world by the American press. They find weekly and monthly expression in our leading periodicals. They are even taught, more or less covertly, but with increasing frequency and boldness, in theological schools which were dedicated to the doctrines of Calvin. The Faculty of the Theological School of the University of Chicago, for example, is publishing them broadcast in their Journal of Theology, and the Biblical World, where they have ceased even to provoke polemic criticism. Something akin to Ritschlian thought is expounded daily in the class-rooms of such institutions as Andover, Union, Oberlin and Yale. Courses of study on the Bible from the standpoint of the higher criticism have grown more and more popular in colleges which until recently were regarded as strongholds of orthodoxy. Increasing apathy toward the old dogmatic system throughout the country is attended by growing interest in psychological and biological studies of religion under the leadership of such men as William James and Stanley Hall. And the most inviting opportunity for a heresy trial in the Presbyterian church, since that of Professor Briggs, was sacrificed only last year by the motion of a member of a New York presbytery, who, in referring to a minister that had recently proclaimed boldly his entire dissent from Presbyterian standards, exclaimed: "I move that Brother Carter be burned at four o'clock." The motion was jocular, but the jocularity was deadly for the spirit of persecuting orthodoxy.

The dissolution in America of the theological system known as Calvinism is inevitable. The only question is how rapid is to be the process, and how serious the injury to existing ecclesiastical institutions by which it is to be attended.

But along with this altogether auspicious tendency there has gone another equally necessary to reckon with, though less hopeful in certain of its aspects. I refer to the increasing absorption in materia pursuits, the apparent lowering of business standards, and the diminished interest in the ideal side of human life. We have been inclined to view with apprehension the general decline in church attendance throughout the country, and especially the absence of men from the church services. But let us investigate the amount of interest taken by these same men in other things of the spirit. Poetry? It is rarely read outside a few centres of culture and literary clubs and organisations of women. Music? Years of hard experience have conclusively demonstrated that symphony orchestras are impossible even in our largest American cities without a generous subsidy from millionaires. Art in America has not yet outgrown its swaddling clothes, and it has recently been deemed necessary to import a gentleman from England as the head of the chief art institution of the United States. And with this absence of ideal interests there has gone an intensity of devotion to the things which make for the material development of the country, the like of which the world has never seen. The beau-ideal for American youth at the present time is not the great poet or the great painter or the great preacher, or even, with rare exceptions, the great statesman. He is the great captain of industry or the successful manipulator of combinations, or the man who is able to carve a vast fortune out of the products of the earth. Such is the person who now occupies the centre of the stage in America. The man, in short, who is able to do things is everywhere in demand. Those high in political life seek his advice. University presidents have been known to sit at his feet. Men, alas! who prophesy in our pulpits in the name of the eternal verities sometimes cater to his opinions. Meantime, the ideal interests suffer, and with their decay the standards of business morality deteriorate, and the power of religion to stimulate men to their best and highest seems somehow to be on the wane.

I spoke a few minutes ago of a certain inevitableness which seemed from the beginning to have shaped the attitude of our Unitarian churches. They were, in other words, the only fitting response to the environment from which they sprang. It is because I seem to see a certain lack of correspondence between conditions in America as they are and the Christian Church as it is that I venture to suggest certain modifications which the church must undergo in order that it may regain its ancient prestige, and enlist once more the loyal devotion of strenuous, practical men.

It has been the glory of the liberal church to do an important work in bridging the chasm between religion and modern culture, to insist that there is no necessary breach between thought and worship. It remains for it now to take the lead in demonstrating to the world that there is as necessary a place within the church for the man of action as for the man of prayer. It is a utilitarian age, dealing with realities. Instead of contenting itself with telling about the past or prophesying concerning the future, the church, I believe, is about to turn its attention to the things which are of supremest moment at this present time. As a nation we have as yet little reverence for the past. It was only a month ago that the body of the founder of the American navy was rescued from an unknown grave across the sea, where it had lain forgotten for a century. But we have large respect as a people for the man or the institution that has the power to achieve. The liberal church is fortunate in having no theological scheme to vindicate. It has time, therefore, to throw itself with all its energy into the moral and spiritual struggles of the age in which we live.

Hoary and venerable tradition denies a place in the Christian Church not only to the heretic but also to the thoroughgoing reformer. It seems the part of worldly wisdom to refrain from questioning accepted doctrines and attacking long-standing abuses. But in the age-long struggle between the priest who would preserve things as they are and the prophet who would overturn and overturn and overturn until the church of God is renovated from the foundation, the liberal church finds itself committed irretrievably to the prophetic side.

If I interpret correctly the genius of the American people and the spirit of their institutions, such an attitude as this is the only attitude which will receive permanent favour on American soil. The typical American church must provide a home for the doer as well as for the thinker. It must not only tolerate him but make him welcome and learn from him something of its opportunity for service; for only thus can it regain that note of reality which it at present, in a measure, lacks.

So, when I am asked to forecast in this paper the prospect for liberal religion in America, I assume, without hesitation, the rôle of the prophet, and affirm with entire confidence that there is no permanent prospect for any other kind of religion. It is the inevitable response of the American people to the conditions which prevail.

In order that the church may confront successfully the present crisis in American life, it is looking for leadership once more, as it looked a century ago, to the descendants of the Pilgrims, and to the churches which have played so large a part in winning for the entire Protestant world freedom from dogmatic servitude. God grant that in their efforts to prove themselves equal to the responsibility which is laid upon them they may be sustained and encouraged by the co-operation of their brethren from the Old World, and that during the coming years you may join hands with us across the sea in our efforts to bring into being a renovated Christianity, and to create a church of which it will no longer be an empty boast, but God's own truth, to affirm that Christ himself is Lord and King.

RELIGION is not a new sphere of life. There is only one life; and religion is the highest law and the truest spirit, by which and in which that life can be lived. —C. J. Perry.

THE PROBLEM OF RELIGION IN MODERN INDIA.*

BY PROF. BENOYENDRA NATH SEN., M.A., OF CALCUTTA.

To a representative from India an International Conference of liberal religious thinkers and workers has a unique significance. It is a gathering together of those who have felt and welcomed the first impulse of the awakening of the new age, to whom the freedom of the spirit which has been its inheritance has meant not simply the death of the old, but the dawn of a new life. Let it be said no more that liberal religion is only another name for dry, destructive rationalism, empty and barren in itself, which is scarcely to be preferred to the old traditionalism and dogmatism which it claims to have superseded; but it is the actual finding of God under the new conditions of the age we have to live in. The revelation of modern thought is indeed a glorious apocalypse leading one into the unsearchable, inexhaustible depths of the spiritual consciousness of humanity where man is felt more than ever to be a child of the Eternal. Shall we not say that the faith arising out of this consciousness, wherever the pure, genuine one is attained, is stronger, more enduring, more fruitful than any faith in mere book, or tradition, or church dogma, because deeper-rooted in the eternal truth of things? Neither science nor the evolution of history shall be a stumbling-block in the path of this faith, for it has insight to look deeper than the surface and patience to wait till each has delivered its true message and revelation. This faith shall lead on to duty, to love, to reverence—reverence with a clear-sifting insight added, for the past as well as for all times, for men and for systems—love that shall break down all barriers of caste and creed, of race and colour—and duty that shall seek the realisation of this love at all costs, in life, and, if need be, through death.

It is wonderful to contemplate how this faith has dawned and slowly brightened upon us till it has brought us to where we are at present. Shall we say that here also the light dawned first upon the East, and thence travelled to the West; or that it was carried from the West to the East; or that its rays broke forth simultaneously in the Eastern and the Western horizon till they met and mingled into each other? The names of Channing, Emerson, and Theodore Parker; of Carlyle, Max Müller, and Martineau; of Raja Rammohun Roy, Maharshi Devendra Nath Tagore, and Keshub Chunder Sen, occur to one, with other minor names, as the peaks that caught up this light and left it as an inheritance to their generation. But here in the kindling of all these souls we recognise a direct touch of the Divine, a throbbing and upheaving of the World-Spirit for this age of ours. How was all this brought about? Was it simply the outcome of the strain and tension that modern science and modern civilisation laid upon the native, never-dying instincts of reverence and love ingrained in the heart of humanity; or was it the concentrated breathing forth of the highest aspirations which all the tendencies of the age in education, politics, commerce, and social development had called forth? It is useless to speculate. The workings of the Spirit are mysterious, and we in India simply recognise therein the hand of Providence, and call it the New Light, the Dispensation of God for this age of ours.

It is not necessary, I believe, nor would it be quite profitable, perhaps, to enter upon a detailed analysis of this faith. It is better described as a living inspiration within the soul than as something capable of a precise, logical definition. Still, I believe, in a rough sort of way, three points stand out clearly as its marked characteristics:

In the first place, it realises that the whole universe—the whole world of matter as well as the whole world of mind—rests ultimately upon a foundation of the Spirit—and that Spirit is the infinite God.

In the second place, man is a spirit; and the test of his life, of his achievements, as well as his joys and sorrows, must, in the last resort, be a spiritual test; and he has a spiritual destiny, which, not simply from the extensive point of view in respect of time, but still more from the intensive point of view, is best described as eternal.

In the third place, all mankind are bound up in a common life in the Spirit, whereof also the ultimate test is a spiritual one, and which also has an eternal spiritual destiny.

It is the working out of this faith in its manifold application to all the details of individual, national, and cosmopolitan life that is the religious problem of the present age. The conditions of the problem in the East and in the West, or in each separate country and nationality, must be different in detail, while being in the essence similar. I can but here attempt to set forth in a rough sort of way some of the conditions under which the problem has to be worked out in India.

Here the very first thing that confronts us is what might be called the extreme tendency towards secularism that meets us everywhere. Modern civilisation has, in general, been charged with materialism, and I believe it must be admitted that the charge is so far true as materialism is taken to mean setting too much store upon what a man or a nation has rather than upon what a man or a nation is. What, however, I mean by the tendency towards secularism in India has a special aspect of its own. It is due to the fact that the Government in India, being a foreign Government, is bound, and rightly bound, to adopt what is known as a policy of religious neutrality. From a purely Western point of view this might seem to be an unmixed advantage, since the principle of the separation between the Church and the State is being more and more appreciated, and more and more widely acted upon in the West. But in a country like India, where no institution can thrive without Government support or patronage, direct or indirect, the adoption of this principle, while admitted to be a political and even moral necessity, has consequences that are enormously far-reaching. One effect, for instance, is the complete secularisation of the whole educational system of the country, from the highest to the lowest. Just consider what must be the condition of a people and society in which, from the lowest primary school to the highest university, there is no regular provision for imparting any distinct, definite religious instruction. There is certainly a great deal of superstition in India, as there is, perhaps, in every country in the world, and, thanks to English education, all this is being dispersed; but what we have in its place is not a knowledge of the deeper truths of life, not a real insight into human nature, and an acquaintance with the feelings of reverence, admiration, and true humility, but only what is calculated to enable a man to fill a little place in the great wheel of the State if he is wanted, with, perhaps, in the case of the select few, a little of science and literature added, without any proper guidance as to what use to make of them. It is against this sheer blank in respect of religious ideas and sentiments, deliberately fostered, entertained, and developed from childhood upwards, that the faith of liberal religion in India has to assert and establish itself. The temperament of the Indian mind is essentially religious, and the cultivation of some of the traditional forms of religious worship and culture has not altogether gone out; but, with every successive generation, these things are more and more receding into the past, and at the present day we have to face the fact that the fight of liberal faith is not with superstition, but with indifferentism, callousness of heart, and secularism.

In the next place, we cannot forget that liberal religion cannot realise itself as a living faith in the national consciousness if it does not find the basis both for its speculative theology and practical spiritual culture in the faith and culture that have moulded the life and spirit of the people for generations past. And in this respect India occupies a unique position. India claims the Upanishads, the Vedanta Philosophy, and the Ethics of the Bhagavadgita as her own. The Rigveda hymns were composed and sung on her soil. Out of her people arose Buddha and Sankaracharya. Vaishnavism and Sikhism belong to her, while Muhammadanism, though coming from a distant soil, has had a long and striking history within India. The spirit and influence of all these faiths and cults, personalities and systems, have mingled indissolubly with the life and institutions of the people, with whatever is noblest and best in them, and to lose sight of them, or ignore them, or be indifferent to them, would mean a most reckless and deplorable impoverishment of the national life and spirit which could possibly have no rational or moral justification. Here the function of liberal religion in India is practically the same as it has been in the West with reference to the whole domain of the Christian literature and culture of the past. The only question is, What is the method to be applied in dealing with the past, in each case? Here I might be allowed just to make one observation. One of the objects of the method, undoubtedly, is a thoroughly critical study of the past—so as to secure accuracy in things historical as far as possible—and a perfectly rational estimate of all beliefs, notions, laws, disciplines, institutions, practices, or whatever else it might be, that had at one time or another the sanction of religion. Be it the account of the life of Buddha or that of Jesus, be it the institution of monasticism in Europe or the caste system of India—everything shall have to pass through this test. But I believe there is another and a higher object still. It is to grasp, appreciate, assimilate, preserve, and perpetuate, in all its realistic depth and intensity, all that wealth of genuine spiritual life and experience which, under the necessary drawbacks of human speech and expression, lies stored up in these records of the past. Woe unto us if we forget or miss the latter, and trouble ourselves too much about the former alone!

Liberal religion in India, however, has not only to study, appreciate, and assimilate a past that is unusually rich and variegated, but it has to deal with a present that is extremely complicated. In respect of simplicity and integrity in the development of social life and institutions, there can, perhaps, be no comparison between India and Western countries. If we consider only the number of languages through which it will have to express and establish itself, before it can be considered to have become the national faith of India, we shall have some idea of the vastness of the work lying before it. The last "Census Report" for India, published by the Government in 1903, gives a list of 180 languages as spoken in different parts of India, and with regard to this most interesting aspect of the question I shall simply quote the following passage from the same "Report":—

"Light comes from the East, but many years must yet be passed in unremitting quest of knowledge before we can inevitably distinguish it from that false dawn which is but a promise and not the reality. Hitherto scholars have busied themselves with the tongues and thoughts of ancient India, and have too often presented them as illustrating the India of the present day. But the true India will never be known till the light of the West has been thrown on the hopes, the fears, the beliefs, of the two hundred and ninety-four millions who have been counted at the present census. For this, an accurate knowledge of the vernaculars is necessary, a knowledge not only of the colloquial languages, but also, where they exist, of the literatures too commonly decried as worthless, but which one who has studied them and loved them can confidently affirm to be no mean possession of no mean land" (p. 342).

If the position of India in respect of the religious problem is unique from so many different points of view, shall I not be justified in saying that it is still more unique in this, that it is on the soil of India, as nowhere else in the world, that the East and the West have shaken hands with each other? It is a real contact of life with life, spirit with spirit, literature with literature, religion with religion; though it is far from being a mingling together of social life or manners and ideals. To what permanent benefit, in the deeper spiritual sense of the term, this contact can lead, so far as the West is concerned, it is not for us to say. There are many in the West, I suppose, to whom it is a pleasure to respond to Rudyard Kipling's sentiment :

> The East is East, and the West is West,
> And never the twain can meet,

just as there are many, I know, in our part of the world who believe that it would be a curse, and not a blessing, if the influence of the spirit of the West were to reach deeper than our industry and commerce and politics, and affect the inner life of the people. I am not at liberty at this place to enter upon a discussion of the momentous issues involved in these questions. As regards the West, I shall simply ask, Is there nothing in the high contemplative ideal, the God-absorption and communion of ancient Hinduism, the dignified self-mastery and perfect self-abandonment to a world-embracing love of Buddha Sakyamuni, the selfless, love-inspired heroism of the Bhagabadgita, and the passionate intoxication of divine love of modern Vaishnavism, which, if properly appreciated and assimilated, might give to the spirit of the West a fulness, a sweetness, a beauty, and a grace which it would otherwise lack? And, as regards the East, I shall only express our most earnest conviction that for the perfection of its own inner spiritual development, it cannot do without the spirit of the West, so far as that spirit has been shaped and developed under the leading of the cross. Sorrow has been looked upon as a pure evil from the point of view of the Vedanta as well as Buddhism, to be shunned, and to be shaken off even at the cost of extinction of individual consciousness. Sorrow as a gift of God, chastening, strengthening, sweetening human life, not certainly to be sought after, but to be accepted and borne and carried through life in the form in which it comes from the hand of Providence, is symbolised in the cross which comes as a gift from Heaven to the East through the West. Further, the law of Karma has found acceptance in the East too much in a cosmic, impersonal sense ; it must find a new meaning in the light of the West in the sense of a stern personal responsibility and obligation, if the East is to be saved from fatalism, caste, stagnation, and death. Liberal religion in India, therefore, looks up with the most earnest yearning to Christ—not the Christ of dogma, but the living Christ as he is in the Christian consciousness of the West. It is this living contact with the living Christ that is necessary for our salvation. Most earnestly do we seek after a true knowledge of the life and religion of Jesus, the history and literature of Christendom, but above all do we want a living touch with the Spirit of Jesus as he is in the depths of one's own spiritual consciousness, and as he still walks about in the world, loving, teaching, blessing, and saving fallen humanity.

This, then, is where we stand, confronted with an ever-growing secularism which is fostered by the very system of education deliberately adopted for the whole country from one end to the other ; with the obligation resting upon us of carefully sifting out and preserving the inestimable spiritual treasure which is our inheritance from the past, while changing, reforming, or getting rid of the beliefs, customs, and institutions that cannot stand the light of a searching rational criticism ; giving perfectly free scope to each section of the two hundred and ninety-four millions of our population to develop along the lines that are most natural to itself while creating for all the common consciousness of a national religious life ; learning from the West its spirit of sturdy manhood and its stern sense of individual responsibility, and accepting from Jesus his sweet, life-giving gospel of the cross. With this most heavy and serious work lying before us, we are just now passing through a most trying period. We have just lost two of our leaders : Maharshi Devendra Nath Tagore, who passed away at the venerable old age of ninety—the man who had taken up the torch from the hands of Raja Rammohun Roy and passed it on to Keshub Chunder Sen, and whose very presence was a source of inspiration and of unspeakable strength to our movement ; and Rev. Protap Chunder Mozoomdar, whose labours in Europe and America had done so much to draw us closer to our fellow-believers in the West. Our organisation is not particularly strong, our workers and labourers are not many, and, considering that the main work before us is a work of education —that of educating two hundred and ninety-four millions of people into the gospel of the New Faith—our institutions are miserably poor and insignificant. But the spirit of the times, yea, the Spirit of God is with us ; and the subtle powers of this faith must have already penetrated into many a soul all over the country from Calcutta to Bombay, from Madras to Lahore, whose name yet does not appear on the list of the members of our Church ; and there must be many a silent force, known or unknown to us, in all quarters, working in the direction of the same end that we are striving to realise. And over and above all this, as a blessing from on High, there comes the fellowship of the faithful, the learned, the devout in the many lands of the West, whom we, unworthy as we are, have the privilege of calling our brothers in faith, and by whose generous courtesy and kindness it is that I have the privilege of being here and speaking as the representative of my beloved Fatherland. May, under the direction and blessing of Providence, the East and the West, Asia and Europe and America, help one another in the fulfilment of that mission which He has appointed and set apart for each !

THE writer of the "News of the Churches" in the Daily News has prepared a list of the first twelve British preachers alive at the present time. There are two Anglicans—Bishop Gore and Canon Scott Holland ; three Baptists—Dr. Clifford, Dr. McLaren, and Rev. S. A. Tipple ; five Congregationalists—Rev. R. J. Campbell, Principal Fairbairn, Dr. Horton, Dr. Hunter, and Rev. J. H. Jowett ; one Wesleyan—Rev. W. L. Watkinson ; one Unitarian—Rev. Stopford Brooke. Nonconformity has always had a much larger proportion of able and attractive preachers than the Established Church. In preparing his list the writer has omitted Ireland, and Wales, and Dr. John Hunter is hardly a typical Scotch preacher. Several people are now busying themselves preparing "amended" lists of the twelve best preachers in Great Britain and Ireland.

THE OMISSIONS OF RATIONALISM.

III.—IMAGINATION.

WHEN we speak of the improvement in the mental, moral, and social condition of mankind we must remember that it is not a new thing, not a thing of the last century or two as the modern Rationalist often seems to imply. This improvement has been going on for thousands of years, fr a longer period than history can reckon ; and in order to try to realise what this improvement amounts to we must imagine what "primitive man" was like if we can, but as we cannot we can only guess. He might have been a gentle savage, or he might have been a savage savage, not only ignorant and unenlightened, but cruel, and we must compare such a being with the highest type of civilised man, enlightened, gentle, pure, sympathetic, benevolent, with his intellectual faculties highly developed, his imagination cultivated, musical, poetic, artistic, religious ; not only a maker of laws, a builder of cities and palaces, an inventor of machines, a merchant and a manufacturer, a farmer and a shopkeeper, but a being with marvellous faculties of mind and heart and soul.

What has made the difference ? How has the savage become a saint ? What has transformed the barbarian into a sage ? It is not the knowledge and subjugation of the material world alone which has done this, not the mere development of mechanical power, not alone the knowledge of geology, biology, chemistry, and a hundred other branches of science which has made the difference, for long before the advances in knowledge of which the Rationalist makes so much man was made ; there were heroes, saints, lawgivers, philanthropists, poets, artists, men who are certainly not surpassed in our own day who knew nothing of all our wonderful discoveries and inventions ; judged by some modern standards they were dreadfully ignorant. Even to go a very little way back, Shakespeare knew nothing about electricity, Milton does not appear to have been quite sure whether the earth revolved round the sun, Oliver Cromwell never heard about evolution, and yet man was quite up to his present level in intellectual power, in morality, and in social aims before all the things of which we boast had been found out or done. Some of this development no doubt was due to the exercise of reason, but not all. It was due, as I have already shown, to the activity of other attributes or faculties of human nature, largely to sympathy and the moral sentiments, and next to these and related to these the greatest improving force is probably imagination ; much has been due to the sense of beauty, to the exercise of the imaginative faculties in poetry, music, the drama, painting and architecture. These can scarcely be said to be due to reason, they were born of emotion, of love, pity, sorrow, fear, hope, admiration ; evidence, logic, proof had nothing to do with them.

Some people ask, what does poetry prove ? Well, it proves nothing in the way of facts which would satisfy the Rationalist ; except one great fact which the Rationalist overlooks, that man has heart, soul, imagination, and ideals. That he loves and hates, hopes and fears, and suffers and rejoices, and that these emotions are the principal factors in his life.

That imagination plays a very important part in the improvement of moral and social conditions Herbert Spencer himself admits. We have seen how much has been effected by the sentiment of justice—i.e., altruistic justice, the desire to see justice done to others. But Mr. Spencer says, "to be capable of this sentiment in a developed form, the faculty of mental representation must be relatively great." The "faculty of mental representation" is only another name for the imagination. We do not all see the actual sufferings of the poor, of slaves, of prisoners, or the misery caused by war, but we represent it mentally to ourselves, that is, we imagine it, and the imagination of these sufferings arouses our pity and we are impelled to action by a desire to relieve them. And we not only mentally picture the sufferings, but we mentally picture the improvement which will ensue from the relief of these sufferings or the removal of their causes. This mental representation of improved conditions we call an ideal. We mentally see the effects of social improvements and the way to them long before they are realised. We indulge in anticipations, we forecast, we prophesy. Ideals have a power over us individually. The Christ is often such a moral ideal, the mental representation of man's best idea of what man ought to be; perfectly pure, perfectly loving, perfectly beneficent, what no man perhaps has ever yet been—but an ideal to which a good man aspires, and in the effort to realise this ideal in themselves men become morally better, if they do not altogether succeed in realising it.

The imagination is a creative power. The poet sees the tragedy before he shapes it into verse; the picture is formed in the artist's mind before he fixes it upon the canvas; the musician hears the strain before he brings it out of the orchestra; the cathedral exists in imagination before it is realised in stone. The work actually done is the effort to fix the creation in words, or music, form or colour, and the work seldom, if ever, realises what we call the artist's dream, that is, the creation of his imagination.

Imagination contributes largely to the improvement of social conditions; it acts in advance of knowledge and reason, and shows what is desirable and what ought to be. In early times this mental representation was of a retrospective character, and in a measure ineffective; it painted a lost golden age which men looked back upon with regret; but when imagination began to forecast instead of casting back its creative work produced results. Then men began to dream, not of what the world had been, but of what it might, could, and should be, and their dreams have at least been partially realised. The poet became a seer or prophet. In this mood Isaiah prophesied, Plato philosophised, Virgil sang, Jesus taught, St. John saw visions. The social ideal, the perfect monarchy, the model republic, the Utopia took different shapes and names; the Augustine age, the glory of Israel, the kingdom of God, the new Jerusalem—they were all creations of the imagination, unrealised but not unrealisable social ideals.

Even the agnostic looks forward to an ideal state when man shall be "completely adapted in Society completely developed," which is one way of putting the old poetic and prophetic visions in modern philosophic terms and telling us that the time will come when they will be fulfilled; but the man of imagination was hundreds of years ahead of the man of reason.

But prophecies tend to realise themselves. Imagination pictures a happier state and men labour to realise it, and are not content without some measure of success. And yet prophecies are always in a sense irrational; they do not rest upon calculation, they are born of desire, hope, and imagination.

The geologists, chemists, zoologists, and biologists of the nineteenth century have done wonderful things, have given us a marvellously increased knowledge of the world and power over nature, but social improvements have come in another direction, from poets, artists, idealists.

One of the coming things, it is hoped, will be the garden city: a city of limited extent and population surrounded by a large expanse of fields, gardens and parks. If these garden cities ever come into existence they will have been the creations of imagination and sympathy; they were built in some mind before others took up the idea to give it practical shape, that is to realise the ideal. I do not know who claims credit for the "garden city" idea, but the real creators were the dreamers, John Ruskin and William Morris. The future social improvement of the conditions of life—peace, refinement of manners, beautiful cities, a higher kind of life altogether, the realisation of which is slowly in progress, will be largely due to sympathy and imagination; love desires, imagination creates, and men work to make the desire and the dream come true. It is not in vain that Isaiah in glowing language pictured a regenerated earth, or Jesus preached the kingdom of God, or St. Paul and St. John proclaimed the coming supremacy of love, or Morris and Ruskin saw the land transformed when the love of beauty with its magic wand shall destroy the moral and material ugliness of our time.

These thoughts springing from the heart and the imagination, and not from the reason, have mastered the spirits of the best and greatest men, who have endeavoured, and are still endeavouring, to put them into practice on a larger or smaller scale.

Rationalism is concerned with dealing with certain classes of propositions and in assisting us in determining whether they are true or otherwise, an exercise of reason that is indispensable in all departments of knowledge or pretended knowledge.

But it is not knowledge which moves the world, nor by which man lives,

"We live by admiration, hope and love."

The Rationalist leaves these out of his reckoning, and by some strange temporary blindness overlooks the commanding part which love, sympathy, hope and imagination play in the regeneration of man and of the world.

AGAINST THE WAR SPIRIT.

SIR,—It appears to me to account for the decline of our influence and our churches that so many exhibitions of the lack of patriotism amongst certain members of the Unitarian body have lately taken place, and this new crusade against the advice of Lord Roberts needs the emphatic protest which Mr. Dennis Squire, Mr. Howse, and others have so ably made.

Mr. Scott Russell's amiable thesis has been torn to ribbons by the Tsar, who, whilst setting up the Peace Tribunal of the Hague, was pushing forward night and day those aggressive preparations in the Far East which led to the late lamentable war. Is it not abundantly clear that, had the Japanese relied solely upon the justice of their cause and the Hague Conference, they as a nation would have been swept away and enslaved by Russia? In the events of that great war we have an object lesson which no amiable aspirations can wipe out, and if we refuse to pay heed to the warning of experience, shall we not deserve the downfall and contempt which will await the British Empire?

Besides, no one proposes to abolish the Fleet; yet surely it is as wicked to fight on water as on land. The fact is, that again and again wise preparation has averted war, as recently as the Fashoda incident, and on the other hand the fear of war and the want of due preparation have led not to peace, but to the outbreak of hostilities. Have we not lately suffered enough from our lack of preparation, due to the very fear of that which it brought on? Shall we, dare we, shirk the tremendous responsibilities of our Empire, and may we not hope that the patriotic spirit of our forefathers will again shine out in their sons?

ARMYTAGE BAKEWELL.

Hampstead.

SIR,—It is distressing to find Mr. Edward S. Howse obsessed by such groundless and gratuitous fears as his letter discloses! Why should he choose to go through life (or ask Mr. Hopps to do so) under the alarming expectation that "suddenly" he is going to encounter "a big bully," who, "seeing our friend defenceless, proceeds forthwith to pound him into a jelly, and leaves him in a ditch, crumpled up and disorganised, and minus his watch and purse"? This is very sad! It reminds me, irresistibly, of Coleridge's famous verse:

> Like one, that on a lonesome road
> Doth walk in fear and dread,
> And having once turned round walks on
> And turns no more his head;
> Because he knows, a frightful fiend
> Doth close behind him tread.

In this case, however, we know quite well what the cause of the panic was—a soul oppressed by memory of guilt and racked by remorse and fear of retribution! Can there be some deposit of this at the bottom of the consciousness of our latter-day special pleaders for militarism, empire resting upon physical force, "civilisation" pushed by bayonets, and Christianity preaching from the powder-barrel? "If you want peace, prepare for war" is the gospel of cynicism, barbarism, faithless distrust, and hopeless fear. It is not what Mr. Howse acts on in his daily intercourse with his fellow-beings—or any other sensible man. And, as applied to international relations, it is a doctrine confuted by history, opposed to Christian ethics, and condemned by its own futility. Peace, like all other good things, does not come by whistling for it; but by effort, in the direction desired. "Blessed are the peace makers," said Jesus—not the peace marrers (in the name of peace). If Mr. Howse desires peace (and others like-minded with him), then, in the name of sound sense, experience, and religion, let him prepare for peace, maks smooth its paths, and not take its name in vain!

LIVERPOOL '96 CLUB.

As a kind of aftermath of the Geneva Conference, the Rev. F. C. Southworth, President of the Meadville Theological School, U.S.A., was intercepted on his return journey, and after filling the pulpit in Hope-street Church on Sunday was welcomed as an honoured guest by the '96 Club on Tuesday evening.

To meet him the members of the '88 Club and other guests were also invited, and a hope had lingered on that Professor Sen, of Calcutta, might also have been caught on the wing. This hope was, however, disappointed.*

A goodly company assembled, many well-known laymen and ten ministers being present. The Rev. T. LLOYD-JONES presided, and after dinner, in one of his humorous speeches, called upon Mr. A. W. Hall to welcome Mr. Southworth. In this he was seconded by the Rev. J. C. Odgers, who indulged in many interesting reminiscences of noted Americans whom he had met in the United States.

In reply, Mr. SOUTHWORTH, after some jocular and general remarks, made allusion to the great Geneva gathering and the significance of the welcome accorded in the City and Cathedral of Calvin to the advanced guard of Christian thought. He told of a Baptist preacher who, on ascending the mountains and surveying the mighty glaciers, flung off his cap and burst out with a cry, "Great God! what can the Almighty care about baptismal immersion!" So also in the light of the higher religion the differences of human speculation fade into insignificance, and the underlying unity of souls shines out. Speaking next of Meadville, Mr. Southworth said we face the same problem on both sides of the Atlantic. In the increasing rush for wealth and luxury, we need more and more to lay hold of the noblest and best of the young men in our churches, and to train and fit them to go out and proclaim with growing power the demands of the Spirit. Modest as the outcome may seem to be, he had realised in his missionary work over an area of a thousand miles diameter, that wherever a Unitarian Church existed, even though small, there were gathered some of the best forces making for social uplifting. It was our task to multiply and strengthen those forces. In conclusion he noted that the invitation to the International Council to meet two or three years hence in the United States had been accepted, and he was sure that every effort would be used to make that occasion an eminent success. Thanking the members of the '96 Club for their kind hospitality, he extended to them a cordial invitation to come over. He thought a wealthy layman could make no better investment than to charter an ocean liner to convey a huge party of Unitarians to that gathering.

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, responding to the further welcome offered to the members of the '88 Club, gave expression to the admiration and gratitude felt by all civilised peoples towards President Roosevelt.

The meeting was altogether most uplifting, and was greatly enjoyed.

* Professor Sen was to sail yesterday, we believe, by the White Star boat for New York.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

A SALE of work was held last Saturday afternoon in the Recreative Rooms at Willert-street, Collyhurst, Manchester, and was formally opened by the Lord Mayor, Sir T. T. Shann. The object was to raise as nearly £100 as possible to augment the fund which is being raised for the purpose of carrying out a scheme of extension at the Willert-street premises. Both Renshaw-street and Willert-street Missions have so developed their work and influence in recent years that it has become an absolute necessity to enlarge the premises. At the former place an extension has been completed, though it is but part of a larger scheme which it is hoped will one day be possible. Moreover, the work there was rendered possible earlier, owing to the exceptional generosity of the late Mrs. James Worthington. For the entire scheme as it affected the two Missions, including the strengthening of finances for current upkeep, a sum of £3,500 was required. Appeal has been made to subscribers and friends, and some most generous responses have come in; but a further sum of about £800 is still wanted. In the present condition of the Mission's finances it has not been considered wise to proceed with the building at Willert-street until the whole of the money asked for had been received or promised. The straits to which the Missionary and his devoted workers are put at Willert-street in providing accommodation for their scholars and for the Sunday congregations are a source of discomfort and discouragement. More scholars want constantly to join; but the six hundred who are at present enrolled have to be unhealthily crowded together under conditions most unfavourable to their teachers as well as to themselves. So the people connected with the Mission, though extremely poor, made up their minds to contribute what they could in material and work in order to raise money by means of a sale. They also put their pennies by weekly so that they might buy some of the goods provided. The Rev. J. W. Bishop organised the effort, and, through his personal influence, secured help both in money and in goods from a number of friends outside the Mission, with the result that at the close of Saturday's sale nearly £90 was in hand. Here is a local proof of downright earnestness and no little self-sacrifice, which should stimulate others who value the uplifting influences of Mission work to at once subscribe the deficiency, so that the lamentably needed extension may be proceeded with without further delay.

Councillor ANTHONY BURGON, who occupied the chair on Saturday, said: "The loyalty and devotion which the Missionary has displayed is evidenced by the success he has achieved since he came here nine years ago. The chapel, which holds 120, was then practically empty; now, even in summer, it is well filled, while in winter many are unable to gain admission for want of room. The Sunday collections in the same period have increased from £4 to £35 per annum. The scholars on the register now number about 600, with an average attendance of about 430; and, when we consider that there is only proper room for about 300, you will agree with me that this is another overcrowded area in the city of Manchester which ought to be cleared at the earliest moment, and be replaced by more suitable and adequate buildings. . . . Although the work of these Missions is supported by the Unitarian body, there is no 'ism' or dogmatic teaching introduced, and no test of membership. The earnest desire is to uplift the ethical and social and spiritual lives of the people by sympathetic and watchful oversight and counsel. . . . Our very hard-worked Lord Mayor has come to-day to mark his appreciation of the good work which is being done here, and to show his sympathy with it as the Chief Magistrate of the City of Manchester, and I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without expressing the appreciation in which he is held by at least the thoughtful section of the citizens for the splendid effort he successfully carried through last winter, to alleviate the widespread distress through lack of employment amongst the workers, and for the signal service he rendered to Lancashire generally by inviting the representatives of the employers and employees in the cotton trade to meet together, and firmly insisting upon their settling the dispute in a reasonable manner before they left the Town Hall (only forty-eight hours before a general strike seemed inevitable), thus averting a calamitous conflict which would have had far-reaching and pernicious results."

The LORD MAYOR expressed great pleasure at being present in order to show his appreciation of the work which the Rev. J. W. Bishop was doing there. Mr. Bishop had acted as secretary to his Unemployed Fund during last winter, and they had distributed that fund and organised their work generally with less friction than ever before. He thought it was a great pity that the officers of a Mission such as theirs should be bothered about finances, and he felt sure that if only people really knew the character of the work they would consider it a great privilege to find all the necessary money. He had declined other—and what some might have thought more important—public invitations that day, in order to show his sympathy with work that was engaged in for the uplifting of the poor. He knew a good deal about their struggles, their hardships, and their mutual kindnesses to one another, and he much admired the efforts made by such oragnisations as the Domestic Mission to make the poor more reliant, more self-respecting, and happier.

A hearty vote of thanks to the Lord Mayor was moved by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal and seconded by Rev. J. W. Bishop; and the Lord Mayor himself moved a similar vote of thanks to Councillor Burgon, which Mr. Albert Nicholson seconded.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

London: Hackney.—The Rev. Henry Rawlings entered on his ministry at the New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, on Sunday week, Sept. 3. His (temporary) address is 71, Ickburgh-road; after the end of the present month it will be 30, Knightland-road, Upper Clapton, N.E.

London: Peckham.—The winter session of the Avondale-road Church Guild, under the presidency of the Rev. A. F. G. Fletcher, was opened on Sept. 5 with a social evening. There were present 55 members and eight visitors. On the following evening the juvenile section, comprising the Sunday-school and Band of Hope Guild, opened their session with an attendance of 52 members, making a very happy party. Friends in the district are invited to the meetings, which are held every Tuesday at 8 p.m., and the hon. sec., Mr. G. W. Gibberd, 73A, Peckham Rye, will be pleased to forward a copy of syllabus.

Poole.—The services on Sunday last were conducted in the morning by the Rev. W. T. Bushrod, of Chorley, and in the evening by Mr. H. S. Carter. It is an interesting fact that Mr. Carter's grandfather, the late Mr. Alfred Balston, regularly for some years led the congregation in public worship, and his mother, Mrs. W. Carter, of Parkstone, has often rendered a like service.

Walmsley.—At the Harvest Festival on Sunday last, Sept. 10, sermons were preached morning and afternoon by the Rev. E. E. Jenkins. The collection in aid of the choir fund amounted to over £11, an increase on last year.

Walthamstow.— On Thursday evening, Sept. 7, a concert was held in the Truro-road Church, in aid of the Sunday-school and choir funds. The arrangements were well carried out under the direction of Miss Mary Read, the Sunday-school secretary, and an excellent programme was provided. A large number of members and friends of the congregation were present, and a very enjoyable evening was spent.

BE it ours, in all things human and divine, to keep the good heart of faith; and as we accept the clearness of a brother's face and the simplicity of his word, and the freedom of his affection, so to throw ourselves open to the expression of God's life and love, in the beauty of the world, in the law of conscience, in the ample range of thought and aspiration, and in the promises, already pressing to fulfilment, of saints and prophets. It is never a good sign, be it remembered, when doubts beset us founded on no better reason than the thing in question is "too good to be true." The suggestion, we may then be sure, is not from our best and noblest mind, and should be dealt with less as an honest plea than as a low temptation, and swept away as an ungenial mist by a breath of fresh affection, clearing the stars again.—James Martineau.

WELFORD — MORGAN. — At the Oldbury Unitarian Chapel, on September 14th, 1880, by the Revs. Henry McKean, of Oldbury, and Thomas Timmins, of Portsmouth, uncles of the bride, Jean Agnes, eldest daughter of Mr. John Morgan, to Walter Deverell, eldest son of Mr. Richard Welford, M.A., J.P., of Newcastle-on-Tyne.

"Never writer wrote with deeper conviction than George Gissing; every sentence has come straight from the heart, and this fact alone, apart from its artistic merit, gives a poignancy and strength to his work which separates it at once from the common ruck of novel-writing. These books are terrible arraignments of life—their peculiar characteristic is this poignancy, this painting of life at its moments of unbearable crisis. Between misery and despair lies a whole world of difference; misery is what can be endured—despair is the unbearable, and George Gissing is the spokesman of Despair." —Jane H. Findlater, in the National Review.

"Fate set him for his life-task the study of the swarming miseries of our human ant-heaps and the pettinesses of our mortal nature. 'The Nether World,' 'New Grub Street,' 'Demos,' 'The Odd Women,' 'The Whirlpool,'—these are all monumental titles, mighty themes. None of his contemporaries in England—only Zola and Tolstoi anywhere else—even attempted to wrestle with such big canvases, and if Gissing did not always rise to the height of his great argument, the conception was at least Herculean."—I. Zangwill, in To-Day.

ADVERTISEMENTS 611

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

PROFESSOR MONTET, as President of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at Geneva, received in due course replies to the three telegrams of congratulation sent on August 30 to the Mikado, the Tsar, and President Roosevelt, on receipt of the news of peace between Russia and Japan. From Tokio came a telegram, dated September 3, from the Secretary of the Imperial Household, with thanks by his Majesty's command "pour votre aimable félicitation." The Russian acknowledgment came by letter through the Embassy at Berne, under the date September 12: "Je suis chargé de vous transmettre les augustes remerciements de Sa Majesté l'Empereur pour les félicitations que vous avez adressées à Sa Majesté, au nom du congrès international des Chrétiens libres, à l'occasion des heureux résultats de la Conférence de Paix de Portsmouth." President Roosevelt wrote his own message of thanks in a note from "The White House," dated "Oyster Bay, 6 Sept.": "The President thanks you heartily for your congratulations."

DR. SAVAGE'S Geneva sermon on "Religion: Its Changing Forms and its Eternal Essence" we published on September 9 from a special verbatim report by Mrs. Isabel C. Barrows, who has been for many years the reporter of Dr. Savage's sermons, both in Boston and latterly also in New York. The sermons are never written beforehand, but are so preserved and published from week to week. We were not able to send the report of the Geneva sermon to Dr. Savage before publication, and it is astonishing how few corrections he has since had to make. A revised copy of the sermon will be published immediately, in pamphlet form, by Messrs. G. H. Ellis, of Boston and New York, in the new series of the Messiah Pulpit, and will shortly be procurable at Essex Hall. The price, we understand, will be 2d., or by post 2½d. Orders should be sent in without delay, that a sufficient number of copies to meet the demand may be secured. For thirty years without a break, save for the summer vacations, the weekly publication of Dr. Savage's sermons has been continued, first in Boston and since 1896 in New York. The sermons find their way all over the world.

DR. SAVAGE has been in London this week, and on Sunday, with Mrs. Savage and Mrs. Hackley, attended morning service at Wandsworth, where the Rev. W. G. Tarrant gave a delightful account of the Geneva meetings, dwelling upon the significance of that international opportunity of giving and receiving "the right hand of fellowship." Dr. Savage has declined all public engagements while in England, as he felt the need of quietness and rest. He and his party are to sail from London to-day (Saturday) by the s.s. Minnehaha, for New York.

WE quoted last week from the cordial article which appeared in the German Protestantenblatt of August 26 with reference to the International Council at Geneva. A fortnight later the same paper published the following appeal with reference to orthodox polemics and the work of the Protestantenverein in Germany :—

"Protestant orthodoxy is using every effort to obtain exclusive control of the Church. Its forces are organised, the aim of the conflict clearly determined. It is not now a question of theological debate whether the orthodox confession is true, but whether orthodoxy alone has the right to be in the Church and every other school of thought shall be expelled. If that is accomplished, all spiritual activity in the Church will be choked and all development hindered. Our culture and the whole life of the community will thereby suffer fatal injury. For in its resistance to every free, scientific, liberal tendency, Protestant orthodoxy is the close ally of Catholic Ultramontanism. All Church forces will then be united in a retrograde movement.

"There is need for the most determined and strongest resistance. The German Protestantenverein will undertake to organise it. Both by its constitution and previous activity it is called thereto. The first stage in the conflict, in the case of Dr. Fischer, it has successfully carried through.

"To this end its membership must be increased, and appeal is made to all those who desire to maintain a free and living Church as against the exclusive claims of orthodoxy to join the Union. Notice of adhesion should be sent to the office of the German Protestantenverein, Berlin, W. 35, Steglitzerstr. 68."

This appeal has already resulted in a considerable accession of members.

A LETTER from Canon Barnett, Warden of Toynbee Hall, appeared in Tuesday's Daily News in the correspondence on "What is wrong?" which has been going on for some weeks. "The eclipse of faith" is the Canon's answer. People no longer believe in the eternal right. But, as in the age before Christ, this darkness, he believes, comes before a more glorious dawn :—

"The present is a transition moment. There are many idols which have to be broken down and fetishes in both religion and politics which have to be cleared out of men's minds. There are authorities whose claims are unjustified. There are accretions on faith—'traditions of men' which make Divine commands 'of none effect.' The time of destruction must be an anxious time. Many on one side will go to excesses, and many on the other side, to prevent excesses, will lay on burdens too heavy to be borne, while the mass of mankind will live in the cold atmosphere of indifference. The destruction, however, is necessary. But when the hour is darkest Christ is born in some Nazareth—in some despised social movement—in some Pagan yellow nation—'whence cometh no good thing.' Christ is never far off; when he appears faith easily removes the mountains of wrong seen by your correspondents.'"

As the surest way to make an end of the eclipse of faith, Canon Barnett makes the same appeal as Frederick Robertson, in his well-known lecture to working-men :—

"If this be a true diagnosis of this strange disease of modern life, the question is, 'What are we to do?' The obvious answer is 'Cling closely to the things learnt under the light of this old faith, which all recognise to be good.' Purity is better than impurity, unselfishness better than selfishness, love better than hate, temperance better than drunkenness. Here is a group of subjects, as to the value of which no one doubts. John the Baptist is for the time the best example for reformers and missionaries. The people who care for their country or for their children will,

I believe, do most good by teaching a righteousness which is everywhere and at all times and by everybody approved. They will, in my opinion, do it most effectively who, themselves having a vision (a glimpse of the present Christ) restrain themselves while their faith moves them to reason of righteousness, temperance, judgment. The Holy Spirit bloweth where He listeth, and not according to men's directions. An enthusiasm—if possible, a religious enthusiasm—for ordinary accepted morality, seems to me to be a great need of the moment."

AT the end of the present year Mr. Thomas Holmes, who has been for twenty years a police-court missionary in London, is to succeed Mr. Edward Grubb, editor of the British Friend, as secretary of the Howard Association. Mr. Grubb succeeded Mr. William Tallack in the secretaryship at the beginning of 1902, and is now obliged by the pressure of other claims to relinquish the work. He has been appointed a member of the committee of the Association.

AT the International Prisons Congress, recently held at Buda-Pest, much attention was given to the American system of special Courts for children, and the appointment of probation officers, the subject being introduced by an able paper written by Miss Lucy C. Bartlett, of Rome (a member of the Committee of the Howard Association), who has, during a recent journey, made exhaustive inquiries into the working of the probation system in the United States.

IN the forthcoming number of the Hibbert Journal, Professor Anesaki, of Tokyo, Japan, will contribute an article on "How Christianity appeals to a Japanese Buddhist," in which he pleads for a closer union of the two religions for the purpose of raising the ethical standard of the world. In the same number an article, by the editor, entitled "Is the Moral Supremacy of Christendom in Danger," will deal with the rising in Japan in its bearing on the ethical and religious problems of the West.

THE British Friend for September contains a very illuminating article, written by Mr. Percy Alden, M.A., giving an account of present social conditions in Denmark, and of the extraordinary progress made by that country in the last twenty years. A party of "Friends" and others recently visited Denmark, under Mr. Alden's leadership, and this article records some results of their observations. The party were much struck with the homes for the aged, maintained by the State in conjunction with the local authorities, and with the communal Labour Bureau. The remarkable revival of agriculture in Denmark was carefully studied, and is regarded as being in the main the resultant effect of three causes: "first, the present method of holding land in small lots which are cultivated by the owners; second, the principle of co-operation, which is almost universal throughout Denmark; and, third, the system of education through the high schools and agricultural colleges, which has placed the peasant farmer on a level with the keenest intellects of the town."

GENERAL BOOTH'S schemes are usually large and ambitious. They have this to their credit. He is resolved to tax to the utmost the resources of the social wing of the Salvation Army in the attempt to deal on broad lines with the crying problems of social distress. The latest of his plans to be announced in the press is among the biggest of all. Emigrate. Emigrate a million people. Empty the workhouses. Abolish the poor rate by getting rid of pauperism. As a small beginning the General proposes to send 10,000 or 20,000 families to Australia. Not, however, the inmates of the workhouses, but capable men with their families. Pauperism he would reduce indirectly by lessening the pressure of the home labour market. General Booth relies on the co-operation of municipal and other authorities on the ground that it is cheaper to emigrate men before they are paupers than to maintain them afterwards. He has interviewed many mayors and others during his recent tour, and when in Australia, discussed the scheme with Mr. Deakin, the Commonwealth Premier. And the Australasian states seem willing to assist the work. Now, for the men who may be emigrated this is very good news.

THE emigration scheme has aroused great interest in Australia, and has been the subject of animated discussion in the Parliament. But at the present time it is difficult even for an Australian to gain access to the land, so foolishly have the people allowed private interests to come between them and it. And it is recognised that the land laws will need to be reformed if such a policy as this is to be carried out on any large scale. Mr. Watson, the Labour leader, sees in these proposals a way to bursting up the big estates and to progressive land taxation. Thus strangely do the aims of the great apostle of the poor at home link themselves to the political struggles at the Antipodes. Again is demonstrated how closely the world is being welded into one world-state. And two winters of frightful distress in this country are reflected in the distant world of our farthest colonies.

IT is difficult without fuller information to forecast the success of this policy. For the families who depart it will be well. General Booth's previous emigration work has shown how very large a proportion of the men do excellently once they are given a chance. But the reflection will not be denied that, given the chance, they might do as well at home. There is waste land here crying for the waste labour. And, after all, our great problem is not to be solved by removing honest, industrious men—and it is only these the General wishes to send or the colonies to welcome. Our sphinx's question is: How to provide human life conditions for those who remain. We are not helped to this even though Australia should socialise its land. One other reflection lies on the surface. If a few emigrate, it will not affect the home population one way or the other. But if a multitude of the vigorous men and women go, it may leave a bad heritage behind. The countryside already suffers by the loss of its strong blood to the towns. Ireland—e.g., where vast emigration has continued long—is in a most miserable plight. Experts even connect its excessive insanity with the stagnation that follows emigration. In a word, we want our healthy men and women at home. We want conditions of healthy industry, and we must provide in humane fashion for those already impaired by unhealthy surroundings.

DR. BARNARDO, the founder of the National Waifs and Strays Association, died suddenly of heart disease on Tuesday evening. He had suffered much of recent years from angina pectoris, and was known to be in a critical condition. The great work he did for homeless children grew from very small beginnings. Born in Ireland in 1845, the son of a man of Spanish descent, who was born in Germany, Thomas John Barnardo entered as a student at the London Hospital, meaning to go out to China as a medical missionary. He belonged to the Exeter Hall school of evangelicals. One day, at a mission service in the Agricultural Hall, Islington, he told the story of a homeless lad he had found in the East-end, and a report of this in the papers led the late Lord Shaftesbury to invite Barnardo to come and see him. Further investigations followed, and in 1866 the work of his Homes for Waifs and Strays began at Stepney. It was work similar to that which Mgr. Nugent so admirably conducted in Liverpool, and it grew rapidly and received very widespread support; so that it is reported that from 1,200 to 1,300 boys and girls are now annually emigrated to Canada. The work of the various Homes involves an annual expenditure of £200,000. Though the inspirer of this great work is called away, it is well organised to be permanently carried on. In 1899 the property and control were vested in "The National Incorporated Association for the Reclamation of Destitute Waif Children, otherwise known as Dr. Barnardo's Homes."

THE Times on Thursday devoted a leading article to Dr. Barnardo and his work, which concluded as follows:—

"It is impossible to take a general view of Dr. Barnardo's life-work without being astonished alike by its magnitude and by its diversity, and by the enormous amount of otherwise hopeless misery against which he has contended single-handed with success. He may be justly ranked among the greatest public benefactors whom England has in recent times numbered among her citizens. With no adventitious aid from fortune or from connections, with no aim but to relieve misery and to prevent sin and suffering, he has raised up a noble monument of philanthropy and of public usefulness. Notwithstanding the inroads of disease, he remained bravely at his post; and his premature death was no doubt largely due to his devotion. We trust that the children whom he loved so well will still be cared for by those upon whom his responsibilities have descended, and that the nation will not suffer either his example to be lost or the continuance of his work to be imperilled."

THE PURITAN.

A SERMON PREACHED AT CAMBRIDGE BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP.

"Beloved, we are children of God . . . It is not yet made manifest what we shall be . . . but we shall be like Him. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as He is pure."—1 John iii. 2, 3.

St. Paul speaks of "the earnest expectation of the creation waiting for the manifestation of the children of God." The universe, according to him, was looking for the coming forth of a noble race of people. The object of creation was to produce a God-like type of man and woman. For this end the world had toiled and suffered. The sufferings of its long history of effort and pain and bitter discipline were the upgrowing of sons and daughters of God—lives and women so far raised above the animal and animal selfishness as to realise their divine origin and parentage.

There is the same thought in St. John. The Christian Church, he says, is a band of people who are conscious of their heavenly Father, and who, through the new life that is in them, to the promise and corruption of Roman and Greek society. And he goes on to say that when a man is a Christian, when that is, he is convinced that he is born of God and has God-like faculties and powers entrusted to him to train and use, he looks forward to what he may be, he is inspired by the idea and ideal he has preached. Out of what he may grow unto. He is filled with the thought of improvement, of progress and growth, both for himself and others. "What we shall be" he declares "does not yet appear." Nobody knows what he may become, what he may become, in what heights he may rise under this inspiration. But all true growth and attainment will make us more like God: and let us this great hope in God in the Eternal, and drawn nearer thither, we shall purify ourselves even as God is pure.

It matters infinitely what we think and feel about our human nature. Judge it to be common and unclean, and we shall not do much or be much or care much what we are. Reverence for one's nature, a high sense of the worth of it and of what can be done with it, the least consciousness of the God in it, effects a change in our whole moral life, in our estimate of our fellow-men, in our behaviour towards them, in the control and government of our own impulses. The secret of purification—of devotion and direction and development in man's life—lies just here, in the conviction we have that there is a God and that we belong by right to Him and not to lust and sport and unholiness.

And, my friends, I think the decay of religion and how there is—it more clearly than in the widespread abandonment in our time of this thought of purifying. People of all ranks of life are accustomed to what they like when they have a mind to, when they happen to hunger for themselves; and the goodness of law and truth and justice is demanded. Men think what they like, not asking themselves whether it is true. They follow opinions that are convenient and comfortable, without question whether they are in accordance with fact and honesty. They fall into easy-going habits and indulge their children in the same, not troubling themselves about the kind of people they and their family will become. And what is the result? Why, a general flabbiness in the land, a feeble softness of brain and sinew, a want of grit, an absence of principle and trust in principle, a lazy good-nature that does not concern itself with deep and holy things and produces sleek, dull, and vacant features, a spirit of acquiescence and compromise that leaves evil alone and wrong unrectified. In a word, there is an absence of purifying, a lack of wholesome self-discipline and self-cleansing, and world-purging. In Church and State, in politics, culture and religion, the influence of what has been called Philosophic Doubt, which is only another name for a polite apology for things as they are, has been, and is still, simply pernicious.

In the sixteenth century, as you know, there arose a body of men who, because of their desire to purify themselves and the world, were nicknamed Puritans. Cambridge was a stronghold of such men. Spenser and Milton walked through these streets and quads and gardens. Cromwell was here as a young man, and Colonel Hutchinson, and other leaders in the great struggle for civil and religious liberty. They, and men of their mind, were pointed at for being peculiar—for being different, that is, from most of their neighbours, for declining to do things that most men did, for having scruples about such things, and thereby, unintentionally perhaps, seeming to throw blame on those who did not share these scruples. No doubt some of them behaved as rather superior persons, as if they did not belong to the Scribes and Pharisees, and doubtless there were many needlessly strict and stern. But on the other hand the Pharisaism of the Puritans and their want of grace and charm have been greatly exaggerated by their enemies. Oliver Cromwell was commonly charged with being a hypocrite, but now we may read in his letters how far he was from thinking well of himself. On the contrary, he was full of self-reproaches, and he constantly bewailed his unfitness and unworthiness in the sight of God. Of seven letters remaining of those written by him after the dangers and victory at Dunbar, on September 3, 1650, one was to his wife in London. I know none more touching in its love and piety. He wrote:—

"My Dearest,—I have not leisure to "write much. But I would chide thee "that in many of thy letters thou writest "to me that I should not be unmindful "of thee and thy little ones. Truly, if "I love you not too well I think I err "not on the other hand much. Thou art "dearer to me than any creature; let "that suffice. The Lord hath showed "us an exceeding mercy: who can tell "how great it is! My weak faith hath "been upheld. I have been in my inward "man marvellously supported; though "I assure thee, I grow an old man, and "feel infirmities of age marvellously steal-"ing upon me. Would my corruptions "did as fast decrease! Pray on my "behalf in the latter respect. The par-"culars of our late success Harry Vane or "Colonel Pickering will impart to thee. "My love to all dear friends. I rest thine "Oliver Cromwell."

Again, a Puritan like Colonel Hutchinson the brave governor of Nottingham Castle, one utterly fearless in his devotion to principle, had the genial courtesy and cultivated tastes of the most accomplished Cavalier. His wife, writing of him after his death for the benefit of his children, says of him, in loving memory:—

"He was of middle stature, of a slender "well-proportioned shape, his complexion "fair, his hair of light brown, very "thick set in his youth, softer than the "finest silk and curling into loose great "rings at the ends, his eyes of a lively "grey . . . full of life and vigour; ". . . withal he had a most amiable "countenance, which carried in it some-"thing of magnanimity and majesty, "mingled with sweetness; . . . . was "active and graceful, apt for any bodily "exercise, could dance admirably, had "skill in fencing, had a great love of "music and often diverted himself with "a viol on which he played masterly, "had great judgment in paintings, "left off very early the wearing of any-"thing that was costly, yet in his plainest "negligent habit appeared very much "the 'gentleman.'" This was the man who, though courted by all the landed magnates of Nottinghamshire and offered by the king's party every kind of promotion if he would take their side, preferred the cause of purification, and for its sake spent his fortune and died at the age of forty-seven in a dungeon.

Let me speak of one more of these reformers, one known as an "Old Puritan" or Puritan of the earlier type, as described in the words of a Churchman and a Royalist. "Master John Dod," says Fuller, "was a Cambridge scholar, and with so "much that was solid in his character, "together with such sweet fruits grafted "on a stock of grace that Oxford men would "gladly have taken him home with them." When coarsely treated by the Cavaliers he remembered his favourite maxim—"Sanctified afflictions are good promotions." Once, on being asked to visit a masterpiece of English architecture, he desired to be excused and to sit still looking on a flower which he had in his hand. "In this "flower," he said, "I can see more of God "than in all the beautiful buildings in the "world"—a sentiment in which surely every true artist would warmly concur. "With him," writes Fuller, "the old "Puritan may seem to expire, and in his "grave to be interred, humble, meek, "patient, hospitable, charitable in his cen-"sures of as in his alms to others. Would "I could truly say but half so much of "the next generation."

But though all Puritans were not as John Dod, there was something noble about most of them. They had a strong backbone of conviction. They believed in truth and righteousness and God. They could stand firmly without yielding to inclination, fashion or money. The sacrifices they were called upon to make they did make, without flinching or hesitation—enduring as seeing Him who is invisible. They may have had their unattractive side, they may have been, many of them, ungainly in manner, narrow in some of their opinions, insensible to some of the sweeter, gayer aspects of life, but they had in themselves the spirit of purification, leading them to do all they could to rid their own lives, and the community in which they lived, of evil.

Now, my friends, we are descended from such men. We belong to a religious communion founded more than two hundred years ago by Puritans, by men and women who left the State Church because they wanted purity of doctrine, purity in worship and ecclesiastical government, purity in political life. And we still stand, if we stand for anything definitely, for purification in these things. We are not content to fall in with religion as we find it, to accommodate our consciences to what does not commend itself to them. Venerable buildings, though the history of England and of English Christianity for a thousand years be written upon them, beautiful music and words sacred with hallowed associations, the warmth of a multitude of worshippers, the social and commerical advantages of belonging to the great majority, will not conceal from us the crying need of purity in the Church and State. We are unwilling Nonconformists, but Nonconformists we are if we are worth our salt. I cannot express in language the longing I sometimes feel to be in orders, to be a member of that Mother Church which has included a multitude I honour and love, and to feel united to them in the bonds of the same living and visible communion; but a Nonconformist I am and must be if I am to be an honest man. We have, I am sure no sympathy with the spirit of dissent, with an eagerness, that is, to find something to disagree with, to quarrel with names and words we ourselves have not chosen; but we do dissent from dogmas that we consider false, from ceremonies we think to be superstitious, from ideas and ideals that seem to us contrary to the teaching of Christ. From such error and bondage, however blended with the good and the beautiful, we must, if we can, purify ourselves even as God is pure—even as Jesus Christ purified himself from the corruption of the Jewish religion. His words have a special and commanding significance for us: "Unless your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees ye cannot enter the kingdom of Heaven."

My friends, the Act of Uniformity is as unjust and odious now as it was two hundred years since. Our forefathers would do now what they did then. They would refuse to conform, and they would pay willingly the price of their refusal. The Book of Common Prayer, noble as it is and priceless as an English religious classic, needs to be purified as it did in those days, only with a deeper purification. If it offended then by its narrowness and falsehood, far more it offends the modern intelligence and conscience. More than ever there is a need of separating the wheat from the chaff, what is essential and permanent from what is unessential and temporary. If our ancestors felt the creeds a stumbling-block, still more have we reason to regard them as objectionable. The progress of knowledge has made them impossible. And far more than they thought we think the Bible in need of purgation, to demand a thorough discrimination of the spiritual from the unspiritual, of the Christian from the un-Christian, of the Catholic and universal from the sacerdotal. If we are not Puritans we are nothing. If we think it does not matter what men believe or what they worship or what is said in the pulpit or accepted in the pew, then let us close our doors. Our day is done and the spirit of our founders is dead.

And if it does not matter what our religion is, does anything matter—our country, our city, our individual conduct? If we cease to care about God and Christ and the life to come, before long we shall find ourselves ceasing to care about our fellow-men, about progress or knowledge, about our studies and profession, about our homes at last, and, strange result of egoism, even about ourselves. "Whether I live or die does not greatly trouble me" is the last confession of the man or nation that no longer cares to purify himself as God the Father is pure.

My friends, I do want you to be Puritans—not in any raw, bigoted, Philistine sense, but in the meaning of the word attached to it by the best—lovers of culture and beauty, large minded enough to appreciate the qualities and opinions of men different from yourselves, cheerful, yes, playful in your intercourse with your neighbours, yet Puritans all the same—firm for principle, unshaken for liberty, secure against gilded flatteries and gaudy iniquities, unseduced by the temptations of property and all its plausible delusions, refusing to follow this modern fashion in high places of politely refining away the meaning of words—yes, in this sense Puritans to the backbone. And above all, let us be true to the old and lofty tradition—let us keep watch upon ourselves, bridling our thoughts and tongues, masters of our appetites and passions, giving ourselves conscientiously and uncomplainingly to our tasks and duties in the spirit of those splendid words in Lycidas, written by a Cambridge man, and inspired by his love of a fellow student, "Scorn delights and live laborious days."

DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI.

II.

ONE of the contributions toward decision upon an artistic career came from witnessing Ford Madox Brown's cartoons which had been accepted for the decoration of the Houses of Parliament. These strongly stirred Rossetti's ardour and seemed to him to mark the advent of a new spirit in art. He made himself known to the artist, with the result that the lad was generously adopted by Brown as a free pupil. Inaptitude for performing set tasks found demonstration at this, as at subsequent periods; for while the pupil was supposed to be copying objects like tobacco-jars or pickle-pots, he was actually sketching some image of his own fecund fancy. His vast imagination left no room for the desire to become a good copyist. What he aimed at was to obtain sufficient technical knowledge of brushwork to start upon original designs.

Two Academy students became acquainted with Rossetti about this time—Holman Hunt, who was a year older, and Millais, who was a year younger. Millais was a youthful prodigy who had already exhibited several pictures. Holman Hunt and Rossetti were also sanguine enough to take a studio, which is described by Benson as a "dismal and squalid place, looking out upon a timber-yard." Rossetti had wearied of 'prentice play and was already at work on "The Girlhood of Mary Virgin."

Origin of the Pre-Raphaelite Movement.

A meeting of these three youths led to an important development of, or rather revolution in, English art traditions. They were once looking over a book of engravings of the frescoes in the Campo Santo at Pisa. In the art of their day they had seen mere iterated obedience to the conventional standard in vogue, a feeble and insincere use of sentimental anecdote, or melodramatic subject. But in the designs of the earlier Italian painters who preceded Raphael they believed they found a strength, a sincerity, a simplicity that was fresh and independent. To his great delight, Rossetti discovered that Keats had registered his conclusion that these early men surpassed even Raphael himself, so that there is cause for regarding Keats as the forerunner of the Pre-Raphaelite movement.

"If Newton (wrote Hunt) could say of his theory of gravitation that his conviction of its truth increased ten fold from the moment in which he got one other person to believe in it, was it wonderful that when we three saw, as it were in a flash of lightning, this truth of art, it appealed to us almost with the force of a revolution?"

An Artistic Heresy.

Thus in a spirit of revolt against customary methods, in acceptance of the principle of originality, of taking their inspiration from nature, these youthful enthusiasts formed their League of Sincerity, and adopted the title hurled at their methods as a term of contempt (Pre-Raphaelite). With the mystic symbol P.R.B. that adorned two pictures in the Academy and a third in a Free Exhibition, in the spring of the year 1849, the world did not seem concerned, but when the meaning of the initials leaked out, and it was realised there was a protest and a challenge in the title of this brotherhood, the artistic and literary world, loving a fight and loving to confound the prophet, at once rose up in arms.

With the battle royal that ensued, in which much contempt and foolish misrepresentations mingled with hard knocks, it is futile at this date to agitate ourselves. Of the reforming movement Rossetti became the presiding genius and inspiring leader. Other members were received into the fraternity, each one interpreting the principles of the brotherhood after his own fashion and remaining lastingly more united in aim than in method.

Art and Morals

The writer of the excellent book on Rossetti in the "English Men of Letters" series, in dealing with this movement, emphasises one important point. "It was strongly held in the Brotherhood that purity of mind and heart was a necessary condition for good work, and all that was gross or sensual was strictly tabooed. It is clear that this band of enthusiasts were men of untainted lives, and though they probably had little respect for purely conventional morality, they had a deep-seated desire for nobility of life and aim."

Upon the vexed question of the relationship of art to morals, this instance how a stress on artistic righteousness at once took a deeper ethical significance, has an important bearing.

That this contest, by placing the upholders of an artistic reform upon their mettle, had a vitalising influence upon their creative powers, is proved by their output of work. It touched Rossetti chiefly upon his poetic side. A short-lived magazine (the Germ) issued through Rossetti's initiative in support of the principles of the new order of artists, contained several of his poems and romances. The fact that his picture of the "Annunciation" (1850) would not sell, may offer a reason for his fresh literary activity. The "Blessed Damozel," which had been written in his 19th year, appeared in the Germ, and at this period he wrote "Sister Helen," "A Last Confession," "Jenny," "Dante of Verona," and others, of which, some critics believe the most likely to win permanent esteem is "Jenny" by reason of its more direct appeal to universal sympathy. A picture on the same subject, called "Found," was begun at this period, in which a peasant bringing a calf in the early morning to London is depicted meeting an old love who has for years been leading a life of shame in the city. It was retouched several times but never finished.

His Home, a City of the Ideal.

It is characteristic that Rossetti's only attempt upon a modern subject, and a realistic one, was never completed. It was begun as a contribution to the kind of topic treated by Hunt at this date. F. G. Stephens ("Encyc. Brit.") attributes this failure to the fact that it was a piece of pictorial moralising, being "far remote from Rossetti's inner self, which was rather scornful of didactic art, and thoroughly indisposed toward attempts to ameliorate anybody's condition by means of pictures." It is eloquent of the strangeness of this genius that he seemed more at home in the subjects of his fancy, or in the landscape of ancient Italy, whose images were stored up as a race-memory in his hereditary constitution, than in any modern source of inspiration. He went to the past for his subjects. He was of those who lived and thought in terms of Florentine Art or Arthurian Romance. He was born out of due time, an alien to that modern spirit which would see the romance of things common, the divinity of things familiar, and know the halo that surmounts homespun heroism.

From their infancy the Rossetti children fed on dreams, and walked the land of fancy, feeding on ambrosia and nectar. This aloofness from practical affairs was voiced by their sensible mother in a very humorous way. "My wish always was that my children should be distinguished for intellect. I have had my wish; and now I wish that there was a little less intellect in the family, so as to allow room for a little more common-sense."

It was, however, born in their blood. The father's esoteric interpretation of Dante sprang from his interest in mysticism. He had departed from Catholicism in his antagonism to the Papacy, and just as his son Dante inherited his parent's religious free thinking, so he also inherited his father's mysticism in the shape of an emotional susceptibility upon matters generally held to fall within the field of "superstition."

The Religion of Beauty.

To say that Rossetti in problems of theology was agnostic is to say he was indifferent to their existence. "I can find" (writes Quilter in his Preferences in Art) "neither in the records of the man's life, all given by friends and partisans, in his letters, of which I have many, and have read more, nor in any of his writings or pictures, any really religious feeling. A spiritual aspect there is to his art, but of a most indefinite and dreamy character; more a protest against the empire of the body, than a forgetfulness of its influence."

Most readers of THE INQUIRER will not look at the question from the standpoint indicated in the quotation just given. If it is true that "a thrill of beauty is a sense of God" (A. J. Balfour); if "beauty is God's handwriting, to be welcomed in every fair face, every fair sky, every fair flower," as Charles Kingsley held it to be, then the claim may be made that Rossetti was religious. He was steeped in a love of the beautiful. He lived and moved and had his being among things that are full of grace and of loveliness. But to use names and titles, he was a pure pagan, with a priest's devotion to all that made paganism beautiful of old.

Occult Tendencies.

In his pictures he uses fifteenth century Christian symbols of haloes and doves and winged angels, because they were symbolic and because they were beautiful. If he discarded theologic dogmas and religious ritual, he kept a belief in what is often called "supernaturalism." "By inevitable instinct he turned to that mysterious side of nature and man's life which to other painters of his time had been a mere fancy-land, to be visited, if at all, on the wings of sport."

Theodore Watts Dunton, from whose article on Rossetti I have culled the paragraph just quoted, of special interest as written by a friend, proclaims Rossetti's pictures and poetry to be steeped in the spirit of what he calls the Renascence of Wonder in modern Europe, which recognises that the sanctions that have made and moulded society are subject to the higher sanctions of unseen powers that work behind the shows of things, that temper of wonder and mystery which has followed the temper of materialism.

In the Sonnet Rossetti wrote in memory of his father, he wonders whether his sire in bestowing upon his child the name of Dante foreknew him to be > "of those that haunt

> The vale of magical dark mysteries."

An illustration of the employment of these dark mysteries may be taken from his poem "Sister Helen," of which an analysis is given by J. Knight in his book on Rossetti (Walter Scott's "Great Writers"). The use of magic in bringing retribution on a false lover is part of the machinery of this poem of tragic horror.

Among his pictures a less horrible but no less weird and uncanny impression is conveyed in his canvas depicting "How they met themselves." Two lovers walking in a wood are met by their own wraiths or doppelgangers. From these instances it is plain how eminently applicable to Rossetti's art is the phrase employed to express the ideal of another painter, viz., the delineation of "beauty touched with strangeness."

WHICH SACRIFICE SHALL BE MADE?

"WE may well be animated with the highest hope and the surest confidence that the worst is past, and that better days are before us." These cheery words are taken from a "Handbook for the Clergy" by Bishop Pereira, of Croydon. The title of the book, which the laity may profitably read, is "Intemperance,"* and it cannot be said that in the above-quoted remark the author is guilty of that tendency to intemperate language which is sometimes charged upon writers on the subject. If "the worst is past," how bad it must have been! If "better days are before us," how soon they had better come! Let us see what the Bishop of Croydon tells us about the present. The appalling sum of loss, misery, and degradation revealed in his pages ought to stagger the most thoughtless into thoughtfulness. "We have heard it all before"—yes, to our shame, we have. But in order to appreciate its significance, and then to shape our own course, let us suppose we have not "heard it all before." Let us imagine we are dealing with some suddenly inflicted pest, and see what it does for our nation.

Here is a trade that, out of equal numbers, kills three men engaged in it for every man who dies, being an abstainer, out of it. Here is a vice that, according to Chief Justice Coleridge, fills nine-tenths of our prisons. Mr. Ritchie, as Home Secretary, attributed to it "nine tenths of the greatest of all the crimes." Here is a daily contributor, of frightful efficacy, to the causes of national physical decay, a decay that fills our wisest statesmen with alarm. One week's list of crimes in Great Britain "committed entirely under the influence of drink" shows "14 murders, 16 suicides, 9 attempted suicides, 15 cases of stabbing, 111 premature, sudden, or violent deaths, 53 violent assaults, 54 assaults on policemen, 9 cruelty to children, 65 assaults on women, &c." Let him who understands supply significance to this "&c."—the dreary and extensive private supplement to this public list of shame. "The Commissioners of Lunacy estimate the direct insanity caused by intemperance at 13 per cent., but leave the indirect amount uncalculated, though," says the Bishop, "it must be certainly considerable." Let those who know something of the secrets of family life supply their own evidence as to cases stopping short of declared insanity, but of none the less real and deplorable alienation.

"The worst is past"—and yet in the last thirty years the registered death-rate from intemperance has increased more than 100 per cent., and amongst women 150 per cent. Children die by thousands through the drunkenness of their mothers—"three times more" infants are "over-laid in bed" on Saturday nights than any other time in the week. Dr. Barnardo estimates that 85 per cent. of those children who come into his hands are there "directly or indirectly through drink."[1] Two-thirds of the cases of cruelty to children in a specimen district (Cardiff) were "directly due to drink; 8,386 children suffered, more or less acutely, thereby."[2] Out of 500 children sent by the late Manchester School Board to the industrial schools, 44 per cent. had drunken parents. The Manchester Guardians in 1884 found, after strict inquiry, that 51·24 per cent. of the cases of pauperism in their district were due directly to drink. We have 850,000 paupers in the country. If the proportion is anything like this throughout, is it not time the "better days" should hurry up? As to the evidence of medical experts, we are almost daily told of some fresh declaration against alcohol, like that of Sir Frederick Treves the other day. The Bishop reminds us of a petition signed, up to the time of his writing, by no less than 15,000 medical practitioners in this country, asking "that instruction as to the nature and effect of alcohol may be made compulsory in primary schools."[3]

As to expenditure, let us remember that every year a sum far in excess of the annual cost of that most costly Boer War is paid directly out of the pockets of our working population in the purchase of this deadly substance. But the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, like the Bishop, is able to tell us that in respect of outlay on drink "the worst is past."[4]

What is to be done? Are we to read the comforting words of the optimists—who, to use the definition of an American wit, are the people who don't care what happens so long as it doesn't happen to them? Are we to let the cranks and professional philanthropists go on as they may with their often derided and sometimes ridiculous efforts to check this pestilence? We cry out when a case or two of plague gets into a British port. A small-pox epidemic sends us by hundreds in alarm to the doctor to be vaccinated, and to the chemist for disinfectants. We cry out against the processes that result in a few cases of lead-poisoning; while, if some arsenic gets into the beer, our anxiety knows no bounds. Why, there is already that in the beer that kills its tens of thousands to any hundred slain in these ways! What a sacrifice! And for what?—

(a) So that appetite may be gratified;

(b) So that profit may be made.

I cannot discover a (c). The good Bishop, after reciting "really striking evidences of effort for reform," appeals to his brethren in the church to rally to the war against this foe in our midst, to work by all possible ways—social, legislative, and administrative—to stay its progress. May he be abundantly successful in persuading them! As for ourselves and ordinary citizens, the question arises, Which sacrifice do we prefer—this national woe and disgrace, this poisoning of home life and destruction of all that is best in individuals, this wicked waste of means and men, or, on the other hand, a little sacrifice of personal gratification, of idle ease, and a little time spent in service with brethren in the cause?

If there are men and women caring nothing or doing nothing really in earnest to abate this evil, how can they claim the name of patriots, or even of humankind?

"HAPPINESS."*

II.

DR. HILTY'S religious position is perhaps most clearly set forth in his essay on "The Prolegomena of Christianity." His purpose is not, he explains, to discuss the dogmas of Christian doctrine,—these he willingly leaves to those whose vocation it is to investigate them—but to inquire what presuppositions, what dispositions of the human mind, and especially of the will, are requisite in order to be able to receive and understand the teachings of Christianity. In this sense they are "prolegomena," and they may be summarised as follows:—(1) To hold God to be a reality, not a mere philosophical notion, to fear and serve Him alone, to have no false gods beside Him, neither men, nor possessions, nor honour. (2) To love our fellow-men among whom we are placed as ourselves; not in appearance more, in reality generally less. (3) To devote life not to enjoyment, even of the noblest kind, nor on the other hand to suffering and asceticism, but to action in harmony with the Divine will. (4) To believe that it is possible to fulfil these requirements, everything depending on the human will.

These, says Dr. Hilty, are the prolegomena of Christianity, which must be taken into consideration before its dogmas. "And if," he adds, significantly, "any of my readers should say that in these requirements lies already the essence of Christianity itself, we for our part have no wish to dissuade him from this view; it will, in any case, be less harmful to him than those other opinions which pronounce these requirements to be either too difficult or not necessary for entrance into the Church of Christ."

All the essays contain paragraphs that one would like to quote. Here are a few passages that can, with comparatively little loss, be detached from their context.

"Really magnificent generosity is rarely to be found except among the poor, who come to one another's assistance with all that they possess, and do so as a matter of course. Among them there is no glory in giving and no shame in accepting; while the upper classes, with all their display of charity, often seek to compound with Christianity on the cheapest terms."

"Of all the people whom I have known, the best have been peasants, artisans, and servants—the only ones who attempted to fulfil all the precepts of Christianity."

"In life we need courage and humility combined. This is the meaning of that strange saying of the Apostle Paul: 'When I am weak, then am I strong.' Either alone is harmful."

"A certain inclination to solitude is absolutely essential, both to steady mental development and to real happiness."

"There are but four ways of traversing this mysterious existence of ours; by means of Fatalism, Stoicism, Egoism, and Faith. Deliberately or unconsciously, each of us goes one of these ways, but with very different results. The first makes men blunt, the second hard, the third bad, only the fourth good and happy, as far as this is possible on earth."

"Faith is the courage to live an ideal life, the life of obedience to God."

"There is a sort of spiritual selfishness which is always seeking to be personally edified, strengthened, and comforted, and takes no interest in anything but this personal salvation."

"Piety must always make us more friendly; otherwise it is not genuine."

"For those who wish to lead a life as little troubled by sickness as possible, all good rules may be summed up in these three: moderation in all things; tranquillity of mind, based on religious or philosophical convictions; and a concern for greater interests than one's daily life, or even than life itself."

"If education succeeds in implanting in a youth aspirations after the ideal, and in giving him an abhorrence for all that is base or vulgar, and also a few good habits—especially the love of work, uprightness, generosity, and faithfulness—then it has accomplished its principal task. In our time education promises, it is true, more than this, but in reality it performs far less. . . . Education in general is not, in my opinion, so important as is usually represented, and much of the common talk about it is exaggerated and worthless. With the best education in the world a man will be worth little unless it is followed by self-education, while with this the worst education may be amended."

"Even the vainest persons are not in reality satisfied with themselves; on the contrary, vanity generally implies an uncertainty of judgment as to one's own worth, thus requiring continual confirmation by others."

"Genuine pessimists are always vain."

"The true qualification for a ruler among men lies exclusively in the absence of selfishness."

"An efficacious Christianity without a mystical element is inconceivable."

"The prophetic gift is nothing but a more acute and correct insight into human circumstances, their causes and effects, an insight which belongs to every human being who has become, in a high degree, free from self. Selfishness is like a veil of mist that prevents the insight which we should otherwise have."

"The great maxim of antiquity, 'Know thyself,' is really—for all who have got beyond the crudest vanity—a great burden, and even foolishness. Know thy duty, rather, and do it bravely; thyself forget in doing it. That is a better plan, and one of the greatest aids to human happiness."

"Old Testament holiness is on the whole more natural than the later Christian holiness."

"The so-called children of the world are nowhere treated so severely in the words of Christ as the professional ecclesiastics. What the Gospel most dreads is not lack of faith, but merely formal religion."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A SEASIDE HOLIDAY.—IX.

ON the morning following the exhibition of their rock-pool captures the young folk were eager to repeat, as far as possible, the experiences of the previous day. The boys, with Mr. Holden and Uncle Ned, sallied forth for their bathe earlier than on the previous day, accompanied, as before, by Scot and Nip. On their way back to Brookside they met Mrs. Holden and the two girls, who were also eager for a morning dip.

After breakfast the whole party went to the rock-pools—the young ones being now keenly interested—and all of them determined to find and capture still more of the wonderful and beautiful creatures and start aquariums of their own in big glass jam-jars, which they borrowed from Uncle Ned or begged of Mrs. Banks or Maggie. In the midst of their search, which promised to be as successful as that of the day before, they were startled by a peal of thunder, followed almost immediately by some large drops, and then by a deluge of rain.

It was a magnificent storm! The dark leaden clouds rolled up from the south-east, against the wind. The sea turned dark indigo in colour, flecked with snow-white "sea-horses" of foam. The vivid flashes of forked lightning succeeded each other at intervals of barely a minute, followed by a crackling clatter and explosion of thunder, short and sharp; at others by a rolling roar, which echoed along the cliffs, and lasted often until the succeeding peal. It was terrific, but it was also magnificent, and the children were awed by this display of irresistible force in nature. For two days past they had been charmed and captivated by Nature's beauty and loveliness, and now, after their half-fright at the terrible intensity of the lightning had abated, they felt a thrill of strange joy in this new aspect of nature.

For more than an hour the lightning flashed and the thunder rolled and pealed; then, passing inland, the dark storm-cloud was succeeded by a grey, flat, drizzling rain-cloud, which seemed to promise to continue all day and make further pool-hunting undesirable.

On the way back Uncle Ned claimed the help of the young folk during the afternoon in the Ogre's Den, where, he said, he wanted to prepare the tackle for Monday's sailing and tow-netting expedition.

"Are we girls to come, too?" asked Elsie.

"Certainly," replied Uncle Ned, "for it so happens that you girls are likely to be more useful than the boys, as there will be work for your needles in sewing muslin and making the tow-net."

The two girls were delighted to be admitted to so important a sphere in the preparations, and when the time came they presented themselves, along with the three boys, at the door of the Ogre's Den, and demanded admission "on business," pointing at the same time to the card on the door.

There is not time for me to describe all the preparations made, but as some of you young folk who read this may want to go tow-netting along with your Uncle Ned next time you spend a holiday at the seaside, I will describe the making of the net.

First, Uncle Ned produced a ring (or hoop) of thick iron wire, almost as strong as the hoops which boys play with, and about twenty inches across. To this hoop he tied three pieces of stout cord at equal distances from each other, and then he tied the loose ends into a firm knot. Holding the knot up in his raised hand, he showed the boys that the iron hoop was hanging quite level, which is important. Then he set Elsie to work to sew a strip of twilled calico, about nine inches wide, to the hoop, in such a way that the iron was covered, and the calico hung down from the hoop all round, like a short curtain. While Elsie was doing her part, Mab was making a long muslin net, as wide round at the open end as the circular curtain of calico fixed to the ring, and narrowing down to a point at the other end. The point was then cut off, and the edge of the small opening was hemmed very tightly over a ring of thick cord. This opening at the small end of the net was intended to be fitted over the rimmed mouth of a small 1 lb. honey jar, and tied so tightly into the groove that there would be no risk of the jar slipping out. The open end of the muslin net was then sewn firmly to the strip of calico, and the end of a stout line of about twenty yards length was tied to the knotted ends of the three cords holding the ring.

"Now," said Uncle Ned in triumph, when all was complete, "with this tow-net dragging astern of our sailing boat we shall be able to surprise and capture dozens, and hundreds, and perhaps thousands of wonderful wee sea-folk, and that almost without their knowing it, for the honey jar will hold them safely in sea water all the time if we are careful in lifting the net out of the water."

Other preparations occupied the whole afternoon, and, as the rain still continued to fall, it was decided to spend the evening at the microscope, looking at some of the wee creatures they had captured on the morning before they were interrupted by the thunderstorm. In this delightful occupation the time passed very quickly, and when, about an hour after the setting of the sun, the clouds rose and drifted off, they all went for an evening stroll in the twilight and gloaming, and rejoiced greatly to see the pale thin crescent of the new moon gleaming out of the evening glow in the west.

So with walks, and bathing, and games on the shore, or rambles in the woodlands and on the heath in fine weather, and with happy hours in the Ogre's Den when it was wet, three days slipped quickly by, and Sunday soon came. In the morning Mr. Holden conducted a short "nature service" in the garden at Brookside, and it was sweet to hear the children's voices as they sang their favourite hymns.

In the forenoon, after the service, Uncle Ned walked over to see his old friend Mrs. Kelly, and to try her whortleberries and cream, and the young folk went with him "to show him the way," as they put it; but whether they meant the way to the village, or the way to sample whortleberries and cream, they did not specify, so we are justified in supposing that they meant both; at any rate they did both right well!

Before they left the village Uncle Ned and Joe Kelly made final arrangements for the sailing trip next day, and then Joe took them down to the "quay" to see their boat, the "Heather Bell," which he had thoroughly cleaned and repainted during the week. The young folk were all delighted, and they returned to Brookside full of happy anticipations for the morrow.

* * * *

On Monday they were up at sunrise and had made several journeys down to the shore before breakfast, laden with things prepared for their day's tow-netting. Then, at half-past eight, they all stood on the sands waiting for the "Heather Bell" to appear round the headland. When she did appear, with her bonny brown sails glowing in the sunlight, they all raised a great shout of exultation and pride, for was she not their "Heather Bell," for that one day at least? At the stern was a small rowing boat, and with the help of this Joe transferred them and all their belongings aboard, and, leaving a boy in charge of the small boat with orders to expect them back at five o'clock, they sailed out of the little bay into the open water.

I cannot describe the delight of that day. The sea was calm, and the breeze very light, so that the boat glided through the water evenly, and with little danger of their suffering from seasickness, and, although some of them did, once or twice, feel qualmy, they were kept in good heart by Uncle Ned, who occupied their attention with the details of tow-netting. As soon as they were well out into the open water, he made fast the end of the tow-net line to the boat's stern, and, dropping the net quietly into the water, let it out gently, and as the "Heather Bell" glided on the net skimmed along just below the surface, ready to pick up all the small waifs and strays of surface life that came in its way. Every half-hour he drew in the net and emptied the contents of the honey jar into a bottle of sea water, and marvellous were the forms of minute life to be seen dancing and skipping, gliding and waltzing in the water. The watch-maker's magnifying glasses were a great help in these inspections of their captures.

Once Uncle Ned had to draw in the tow-net because the boat was passing through a shoal of big medusæ (jelly-fish), which filled and clogged the net, and at another time a lot of floating bladder-wrack became entangled in it. But, on the whole, they had good luck, and marvelled greatly at the abundant life of the sea.

So the happy hours sped and the time to return to the little bay and Brookside came, and as they neared the shore, they saw Mrs. Banks and Maggie and Scot and Nip waiting to welcome them and help them with their baggage.

* * * *

And now the time has come, also, for me to furl my sails. I have told you of the doings of our seaside holiday-makers during one week out of their four. How they spent the rest of that happy time you must imagine for yourselves, for I must bid you all good-bye!

THE STRENGTH OF LIBERAL RELIGION.

THE valuable paper on "The Separation of the Churches and the State in France," by Professor JEAN REVILLE, read at the International Council at Geneva, we are glad to be able to publish this week in an English translation. One sees from its closing statement how grave is the crisis which the coming revolution in Church affairs must inevitably bring to our brethren of the Liberal Faith in France. At Geneva the outlook was happier. There, M. DELÉTRA, an orthodox minister and vice-president of the consistory, delivering the greetings of his friends to the International Council at the final banquet, spoke in the friendliest way of the liberals as "the demolishers of ruins," and said that they and the orthodox or evangelicals exercised a happy mutual influence, and indeed were necessary one to another. "If the separation of Church and State should come," he concluded, "we shall not separate from you liberals." On which last Saturday's Paris Protestant, remarks, "If only that word had come from the Synod of Rheims!"

But whether the two wings of Reformed Protestantism in France hold together to form one strong, united Church, or not, there will be an urgent call, as M. REVILLE says, for every exertion on the part of "men of faith," to secure the effectiveness of the Protestant churches, as a very small minority in the midst of an enormous population of devout Catholics on the one hand, and unbelievers on the other. And whether in brotherly union with more orthodox Protestants, or in isolation at many a difficult post of duty, the call comes to the liberals to demonstrate the power of their faith, both to prompt that ready self-sacrifice which will be required to furnish the needful ways and means for the support of worship, and to minister to all spiritual needs, so that the people will respond, and recognise that religion in the light of modern knowledge and in harmony with all earnest democratic aspirations and endeavours, is essential to their truest life.

A call similar to this comes also to our brethren in Germany. We reproduce in another column the appeal of the Protestantenverein for united action on the part of liberals against the efforts of the orthodox to oust them from the Church. There is certainly need for organised resistance, and the questions of church polity cannot be ignored. But here also what is most essential is that liberalism should demonstrate its vital religious power, that the bigotry of reaction should be put to shame by the witness of the Spirit in the hearts of the people, who find that in freedom, with all the wealth of modern knowledge and culture, the old message of love and deliverance from evil, and joyful progress in the true life, gains new force, and every human need is met in true and helpful ministry.

And it is the same, if we look at home. The position of our Free Churches is indeed different. We have no urgent question of church polity. We are decisively shut out from the fellowship of the Church of England, and of the growing union of Evangelical churches. We have, for the present at least, to be content to stand alone, to do own own work, up to the full measure of the strength and grace that God may give us, and in all humility to bear a faithful witness to His truth. But the essential call is the same. Miss CATHERINE GITTINS points to it in her letter this week. We are to get a firmer hold on life, the true life with God. We are to be convinced that faith can live, only as we are grappling with the actual needs of present day life, the needs not of any private interest, but of our whole people. It is Christ's ideal of the kingdom that must once more fire our hearts, not as a far off dream, but as a thing most real, here in our very midst—life lived on this common earth, amid all the glory that is there revealed, but also amid all the ugly, evil things man's selfishness and cruelty have made, and his cowardice or greed or slothfulness suffer to remain—amid these things, but with persistent effort to conquer and destroy the evil, to render life on every side true to the law of righteousness and love, and with the faith that righteousness and love must conquer in the end. So are we to find God, with a new and joyful recognition of the divine significance of life, and with new power to make our brethren feel its strength and joy; or rather we are to be found of God, in the ways of daily duty and in all true human sympathies, that He may use our strength for the service of His Kingdom, and give us, in the fellowship of Christ and all faithful souls, the perfect heart of love and trust.

GEORGE MACDONALD.

"GREAT-HEART" was the character that GEORGE MACDONALD delighted to represent in years gone by, when he and his children gave the second part of "Pilgrim's Progress" in the dramatic form arranged by his wife, and no character could be in better keeping with the true nature of the man himself. Great-heart he was, as teacher and helper of his people, Great-heart with the poet's vision and more than a tinge of Highland mysticism. He was the liberator and comforter of many burdened souls, beloved for his fairy-tales by a host of children, honoured and revered for the generous humanity both of his direct teaching and of his novels.

Country-born, the son of a miller and farmer at Huntly, in Aberdeenshire, at home among the great hills, he was a poet always, even when he went through the training for the ministry at Highbury Independent College, and for three years was minister of a Congregational Church at Arundel. He had revolted from the teachings and the temper of the Scottish Presbyterianism in which he was reared, but proved too much of a heretic also for that Congregational Church. Alexander John Scott and Frederick Denison Maurice were the teachers who had the deepest influence upon his thought. Of the former he spoke as "the man who stands highest in the oratory of my memory." They were teachers to stimulate the independence and deepen the spiritual earnestness of his nature. The minister became a man of letters and a lecturer, and in his poems first, and then his novels, became a more effectual preacher and reached an immeasurably larger congregation than ever in the pulpit. "David Elginbrod" and "Robert Falconer" are witnesses of his passionate revolt from the narrowness and inhumanity of the old creed, and of the richness of that gospel of love which he lived to declare in so many beautiful forms.

Among his poems there is no more exquisite example of the beautiful play of his fancy, combined with simplicity of faith and depth of feeling, than in these well-known lines:—

Where did you come from, baby dear?
Out of the everywhere into here.

Where did you get those eyes so blue?
Out of the sky as I came through.

What makes the light in them sparkle and spin?
Some of the starry spikes left in;

Where did you get that little tear?
I found it waiting when I got here.

What makes your forehead so smooth and high?
A soft hand stroked it as I went by;

What makes your cheek like a warm white rose?
I saw something better than anyone knows;

Whence that three-cornered smile of bliss ?
Three angels gave me at once a kiss.

Where did you get this pearly ear ?
God spoke, and it came out to hear.

Where did you get those arms and hands?
Love made itself into bonds and bands.

Feet, whence did you come, you darling things ?
From the same box as the cherubs' wings.

How did they all just come to be you ?
God thought about me, and so I grew.

But how did you come to us, you dear ?
God thought about you, and so I am here.

For young and old alike he had the tenderest sympathy. His was the friendship of an earnest man who believed in the noblest possibilities for human life, and quickened what was best in those who came within the reach of his influence. His faith was that of a child trusting ever in the Father's love, not unacquainted with the secret of the Cross. This morning hymn is a fine expression of the habitual spirit of his life :—

O Lord of life, Thy quickening voice
Awakes my morning song ;
In gladsome words I would rejoice
That I to Thee belong.

I see Thy light, I feel Thy wind !
Earth is Thy uttered word ;
Whatever wakes my heart and mind,
Thy presence is, my Lord.

Therefore I choose my highest part,
And turn my face to Thee ;
Therefore I stir my inmost heart
To worship fervently.

Lord, let me live and act this day,
Still rising from the dead ;
Lord, make my spirit good and gay—
Give me my daily bread.

Within my heart, speak, Lord, speak on,
My heart alive to keep,
Till the night comes, and, labour done,
In Thee I fall asleep.

In these last years his work was done, and he was simply waiting in the quiet evening, when the summons came to him last Monday, in his eighty-first year. He had seen the last of his beautiful home of many years at Bordighera, and had been staying for some time down in Surrey. Thus a correspondent of the Westminster Gazette wrote of his end :—

"His son, Dr. Greville MacDonald, who in the last few years has himself developed the family genius for writing, watched very tenderly over his father's comfort ; and there were other relatives and friends who felt it a privilege to do what little could be done to cheer the fine old man in his last days. He himself took small care, as was his wont, about the things of daily life—indeed, latterly he had shown hardly any interest in them. His 'company had gone on before,' and he was weary and ready to join them. He enjoyed very much the heather-clad hills, and would to the last drink in the beauty of the lovely Surrey landscapes without saying a word, but with obvious keen delight. It has been a lovely end to a lovely life, and all the world of readers who have been inspired by the writings of GEORGE MACDONALD may be glad that there was nothing of the pain of farewell as he 'crossed the Bar.'"

In his "Diary of an Old Soul," GEORGE MACDONALD made much confession of the secrets of his own inward life.

O Father, Thou art my eternity.
Not on the clasp of consciousness—on Thee
My life depends ; and I can well afford
All to forget, so Thou remember, Lord.
In Thee I rest ; in sleep Thou dost me fold ;
In Thee I labour ; still in Thee, grow old ;
And dying, shall I not in Thee, my Life, be bold ?

The book ends with this other verse. So "Great-heart" speaks to his children, and many others, who have learnt of him, will now with renewed thankfulness cherish his words.

Go, my beloved children, live your life.
Wounded, faint, bleeding, never yield the strife.
Stunned, fallen—awake, arise, and fight again.
Before you victory stands, with shining train
Of hopes not credible until they are.
Beyond morass and mountain swells the star
Of perfect love—the home of longing heart and brain.

NEXT week, from Monday to Thursday, our American brethren are to hold their National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches at Atlantic City, New Jersey. The sermon on Monday evening is to be preached by the Rev. W. H. Pulsford, of Chicago. On Tuesday morning the address of the President, the Hon. Carroll D. Wright, is to be followed by a number of others, by the Rev. George Batchelor, Chairman of the Council, and the following Presidents of Societies :—Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, D.D., of the A.U.A. ; Rev. E. A. Horton, of the S.S.S. ; Miss Emma C. Low, of the Women's National Alliance ; Rev. E. S. Wiers, of the Young People's Religious Union ; Rev. C. F. Dole, of the Temperance Society. Among the greetings to follow is one by Mr. P. Ramanáthan, Solicitor-General of Ceylon ; and then the Rev. C. W. Wendte is to report on the International Council meetings at Geneva. The programme for Wednesday morning includes an address by the Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, D.D., on "Immortality and Ethical Idealism." On Thursday morning, in a series of addresses on "Ideals of Life," one is to be by a negro—Professor Du Bois, of Atalanta University, Georgia. On Thursday evening Dr. Eliot is to give a lecture on "Five Years of our National Work."

THE SEPARATION OF THE CHURCHES AND THE STATE IN FRANCE.*

By PROFESSOR JEAN RÉVILLE.

THE separation of the churches and the State, which was carried on July 3 in the Chamber of Deputies in France, by a majority of more than a hundred, and which is to be submitted this autumn to the deliberations of the Senate, is the logical conclusion to the struggle which the French Democracy has maintained for thirty years against clericalism. In every department of the State the Government found itself in unceasing conflict with the Roman Catholic Church, not only in strictly political matters, but in everything that concerned public education, public grants, the relations with certain foreign states, the existence of the monastic congregations, &c.

The realisation of this Reform, so long an item in the programmes of the Radical party at present in power, was undoubtedly precipitated by the attitude of the Court of Rome in the matter of the Episcopal nominations, and on the occasion of M. Loubet's visit to Rome ; but sooner or later it was destined to be effected by reason of the ever-increasing state of tension which had long existed between the Republican Democracy and the Roman Church. In the long run, in fact, this permanent conflict could only end in one of these two solutions—either, on the one hand, in the constitution of a National Catholic Church, resolved on dispensing with the papal sanction for its dignitaries and for its discipline—a far from likely solution, inasmuch as the adversaries of Rome have no longer faith enough to constitute a Church, whilst the mass of Catholic believers is still completely subject to the spiritual authority of the Pope—or, on the other hand, in the separation of the Churches and the State, in the definite rupture of every bond, not only with Rome, but with the Church in general.

In accordance with the somewhat easy-going logic of the universal suffrage in France, the national representatives pronounced for the most decisive and the most radical solution, hurried on by an irresistible current of popular feeling. But thoughtful people do not disguise from themselves that it is a very big undertaking, and one full of perils, to establish and to accustom people to the Separation of the Churches and the State in a country where the tradition of union between religious authority and civil authority is as old as civilisation itself, and in a nation almost entirely Catholic by birth and disposition. The situation there is totally different from that in new countries like the United States in their early days, or in Protestant countries where the mass of the citizens is divided up into diverse Churches, or, at any rate, into diverse religious tendencies which reciprocally counterbalance each other. Assuredly the Catholic faith has disappeared in the case of a great number of Frenchmen, but the habits of religious observance—that is to say, the habit of having recourse to the ceremonies of the Catholic Chuch for baptisms, first Communion, marriage, funerals, in other words, for all the great occasions of life—is still general, even among those who vote regularly for anti-clerical Deputies. Many very worthy people are feeling not a little uneasy about the consequences of a Reform, which, while it receives their approval in principle, they cannot but judge to be premature.

* A paper read at the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, Geneva, August 31. Translated by the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, B.A.

However, it is no use expatiating on this theme. The Law has been carried by the Chamber, and it will certainly pass the Senate. In the course of a long and thorough-going debate, which redounds to its honour, the Chamber strove to construct a liberal Law, and one in harmony with the principles of the Republic, whilst attempting to avoid the grave dangers which confront the State in the independent existence of a Church as formidably organised, centralised, and hierarchically equipped as the Roman Church. It was anxiety in this direction that constantly influenced men's votes; it inspired the restrictions on the liberty of the Churches, which will be painfully felt by the Protestant Communities, but which were, for the most part, inevitable, if men did not wish to furnish the Roman Church with the means of reconstituting itself a financial and political power, infinitely dangerous to the liberty of all the others. Some there are who even think that the Republicans have done only too well by the Clericals, and that they will possess henceforth advantages even superior to those which they could command under the régime of the Concordat.

A brief analysis of the principal stipulations of the Law of Separation, as it has left the hands of the Deputies, and before it has undergone any possible modifications in the Senate, will enable the members of the Congress to form some judgment of it.

For the future the French Republic will not recognise, pay salaries to, nor subsidise any form of worship. The exercise of any form of worship must be maintained exclusively by the efforts of private associations. These may, in any locality, constitute themselves freely, in conformity with the general prescriptions of the Law of 1901 regarding associations, and with certain conditions specially decreed by the present Law. They may form amongst themselves local or even national unions. On condition that they conform to the regulations of the general organisation of the Form of Worship, the exercise of which they propose to secure, these associations, called associations for worship may receive the personal or landed properties which belong at present to the Churches which they intend to succeed, but these properties must be solely such as are actually employed in the exercise of that particular Form of Worship; all other property of the Churches shall lapse to the public service, or to institutions of recognised public utility in accordance with their particular object. The activity of the Associations for Worship is, in fact, strictly limited to worship; they are prohibited from engaging in education, in making grants, and especially from engaging in political and social questions It is evident that an entirely Catholic conception of worship prevailed; the Protestant Churches, for which charity and education have always formed an integral part of ecclesiastical activity, are seriously affected in their traditional efforts, whilst in the case of the Catholics the works of charity or of education are in general entrusted to the monastic congregations or to societies distinct from the parish Church.

These restrictions were pressed on the legislator by the dread lest the Catholic Church should reconstitute the properties of Mortmain and organise a veritable ecclesiastical State within the State. For the same reason it is that the free use of the temples (Protestant churches) and churches is granted to the Associations for Worship, provided they are kept in proper repair, but that the buildings which are in present use as bishops' palaces will only be conceded to them for two years and the rectories for five years. Associations for Worship may receive subscriptions, make collections, annual or otherwise, but they may not receive donations nor legacies, and they may not possess in capital a sum exceeding (according to the importance of the localities) three or six times the annual average of the sums which defray the expenses incurred in worship. They may also create for themselves, under certain conditions, a reserve fund for buildings and repairs. Finally, they may receive endowments from masses. Here, again, the Protestant Churches find themselves injured, since they have no endowments of this nature. As to the priests or pastors in office, those who are sixty years of age and have given thirty years of service, shall receive a life annuity equivalent to three-fourths of their salary; those who are forty-five years of age and have given twenty years of service, shall receive a pension equal to the half of their salary; but these pensions shall not exceed 1,500 francs (£90). The others shall receive for four or eight years, according to the localities, a salary gradually reduced and at length nil.

Finally the Law decrees manifold penalties against ministers of any particular form of worship, or any administrators who exercise a political or social pressure over their fellow-citizens or against Associations who shall depart from their ostensible professions.

In the short time at our disposal here, it is impossible to undertake a systematic appreciation of this supremely important Law. We will confine ourselves to saying that its value will depend especially upon the manner in which it is administered and applied. In the hands of a liberal and tolerant Government it will certainly secure liberty of conscience, but under a clerical Government, or an anti-religious Government, it may become a formidable instrument of oppression.

The Catholic faithful repel the Separation as an injustice and a scandal. They consider the grants for religious purposes as a debt contracted by the State to the Church, to compensate for the nationalisation of the property of the clergy by the Revolution in 1790—a poor return due to the clergy in exchange for the confiscated capital. The Separation is in their eyes a forfeiture inflicted on the Church: under the régime of the Concordat she treats with the State as one power with another; for the future there will be nothing more than an assemblage of Associations for Worship, without any official character, and subjected like any other Association to the supervision of the Administration. It is the renunciation by France of her dignity as the eldest daughter of the Church.

Certain symptoms, however, indicate that in high quarters, in spite of protestations against this Separation, which is contrary to the formal doctrine of the Roman Church, the consequences are not so much dreaded for the Church as free-thinkers for the most part are apt to imagine. Assuredly there is some little anxiety about financial results, and notably in the matter of Peter's pence, and above all is regretted the loss of the support of the administrative authority for the Episcopal government based on the Concordat. But it would seem that there is an impression at Rome that the diminution of official prestige and the suppression of the contributary grants will be largely compensated for by a greater independence of the Roman government, which will no longer be restricted by the Concordat. It is really hoped to centralise at Rome the control of the general budget of the Churches of France, and thus to hold the French clergy in a firmer bond of dependence than ever before in relation to the Roman power. These dispositions are encouraged particularly by the heads of the monastic congregations suppressed in France. It is their revenge on the secular clergy who allowed them to be dissolved without making, as they are pleased to think, sufficient resistance. It may be their turn to-day; but to-morrow, when the priests will have difficulties in finding salaries, these good brethren of theirs will be quite ready to step into their places.

In some Catholic quarters of liberal tendencies, it is thought on the contrary, that the new Law will allow priests of an independent turn of mind to create for themselves parishes really independent of the Roman Episcopal authority, with the support of the parishioners united in Associations for Worship. It is not improbable that such a thing will happen in a certain number of localities. But I imagine that the Roman authority has no cause to be unduly anxious about it. It is not probable that these Catholic Churches, in rupture with Rome, would have a durable vitality, unless indeed they separated altogether from the Catholic organisation; for wherever there is still a catholic faith amongst the laity, it is always Roman. And how could one raise a church likely to live without members?

Amongst the Protestants, on the contrary, the Law of Separation has been generally welcomed. For, to begin with they are for the most part all favourable to the principle; their differences arise only on the opportuneness of its application. Then again, they judge that with a few reservations the Law as it has left the Chamber of Deputies is much better than the Bill as it was first introduced in debate. They hope to obtain from the Senate the revision of certain clauses which press particularly hardly upon themselves, but in general they are more concerned about their future internal organisation than with recriminations against the Law.

In the little group of the Lutherans these anxieties do not exist, because they have an excellent synodal organisation, which, under shelter of the Augsburg Confession, interpreted in the spirit of the faith and liberty of the Reformers, permits every tendency to exist in fraternal relationships. But with the members of the Reformed Churches who form the great majority of the French Protestants it is quite different. Since the Official Synod of 1872 voted a confession of dogmatic faith, which it has striven to render compulsory, they have divided into two distinct groups: the orthodox, who can account for two-thirds of the consistories; and the liberals, who claim the other third. The struggle has for long been very keen between them; the orthodox have constituted a non-official synodal organisation, from which they have carefully excluded the liberals; the latter whilst declining to create a schism, have been constrained in their turn to federate round an ecclesiastical representation.

For some ten years now, however, the struggle has lost something of its vehemence. A new group sprang up amongst the orthodox—the right centre. It has adopted the liberal method, but intends to remain in the orthodox synodal organisation. In theology there reigns a great confusion; the divergences have become less marked. It would not be difficult to find in the liberal group men whose doctrines are more consonant with tradition than those of given members of the right centre or even of the extreme right. Finally there are valiant representatives of diverse tendencies who labour to-day conjointly in the furtherance of certain efforts of popular evangelisation and enter on a common campaign against Atheism and moral disorder.

The question which is being at present asked is this: Will the French Reformed Protestants succeed in concentrating themselves in one single ecclesiastical organisation uniting the diverse tendencies, or will they split up into rival churches and exhaust each other by their intestine dissensions? There is, I think I may say, in the Protestant people for the most part, a very keen consciousness of the need to remain united. If the 550,000 Reformed Protestants desire to exert an appreciable influence in this country of 38,000,000 inhabitants, they must cease to sub-divide themselves into hostile groups. But this general consciousness, insufficiently organised, comes into collision with the opposition from the orthodox ecclesiastical leaders, and from the big fortunes of reactionaries whose contributions will have a preponderating influence in the new state of things. They have no inclination to listen to any suggestions of a union with the liberals. What they wish is that the diverse tendencies should organise themselves separately, ecclesiastically, financially, and administratively, and that they should confine themselves to forming a federation for the defence of the general interests of Protestantism, as they are affected by public powers. And in the orthodox Synod at Rheims, which met in the month of May, a strong majority rejected the proposition to create a National Synod in which all the national Reformed Churches should be represented, with the object of deliberating upon the nature of the future organisation; but it was resolved by a majority of one, that an assembly of the representatives of all the Reformed Churches should be held after the Separation, in order to take counsel as to the means of constituting a union of the Reformed Churches. It is plain that this solution only creates a factitious and impotent unity, since it consecrates the principle of distinct ecclesiastical organisations: in the smallest locality where there will be a hundred or so Protestants, will be seen springing up two or even three rival chapels which will mutually annihilate each other, and which will absorb in pure loss two or three times as much in resources as one single Association for Worship would do.

In the face of these dispositions the liberals have been obliged to take measures to safeguard themselves. A general assembly of the delegates of the liberal churches will shortly meet at Montpellier to lay the foundations of a Synodal Presbyterian organisation, with the object of organising a financial régime and to make a declaration of principles, with nothing of the character of an obligatory confession, but simply to make clearly evident the religious and Christian spirit of liberal Protestantism. These measures of precaution are inevitable if liberalism is not to suffer extinction.

But the liberal Protestants of France are at one in hoping that this distinct organisation will not need to come into operation before the supreme moment when the Separation will come into force, and that the old spirit of Huguenot solidarity will carry the day against the party spirit of the uncompromising and the reactionaries, and that the great mass of the Protestants will force on the ecclesiastical leaders the constitution of one single National Reformed Church, uniting, as in the past, Christians of diverse tendencies, but equally resolved to maintain the principles of Protestantism and fidelity to the Gospel. They are prepared to make, to this end, every sacrifice compatible with their conscience. But if, in spite of all their conciliation, the uncompromising right wing rejects the fraternal hand held out to it, well then, the liberal Protestants are resolved to advance under their own banner. And if they run the risk of losing, alas! many of the smaller churches which they will be unable to support, they cherish the conviction that in the towns and in the cultured centres they will be enabled to create new communities and gain recruits amongst the large number of the old Catholics who are detached from Catholicism, but desirous of finding for themselves and for their children a really modern religious home

Protestantism in general, and liberal Protestantism in particular, will pass through a grave crisis when the moment of Separation comes. There will certainly be churches which must be abandoned for want of resources; there will be individual cases of an extremely painful nature in the pastoral world, and worthy of all the sympathy of our fellow worshippers. But we cherish the strong assurance that Protestantism will come out of this crisis stronger and with more abundant life and that in our democratic society there will be a fair future for liberal Christianity, provided that its representatives be not party men but men of faith.

THE OMISSIONS OF RATIONALISM.

IV.—RELIGION.

THE kind of Rationalist with whom I have been dealing does not ignore religion; on the contrary, it occupies a great deal of his attention; he cannot be said to study religion, but is almost wholly concerned in attacking it.* Or to be more exact, he generally neglects religion and the principles of religion, and attacks some things which have accidentally accompanied it at one time or another; some of them may do so still. He attacks the Bible, he attacks the doctrines of some Christian Churches, he attacks practices which are sometimes, but not always, found in connection with one religion or another. But he especially attacks the Bible and Christianity. As far as the Rationalist chooses to attack the corruptions of Christianity, whether intellectual or moral, I have no quarrel with him; his greatest leader at the present time, Professor Haeckel, admits that these are no part of original and pure Christianity, but few of the writers for the Rationalist press make the distinction, and though the Rationalist spends a great deal of labour in attacking the Bible, it is remarkable that he appears to be so little acquainted with its contents or its history.

All the Rationalists repeat the same objections and parrot-like echo one another. They pick out the early cosmogony of the Bible, the story of Adam and Eve, and the deluge, a few legends connected with the wars of Israel; they pounce upon a few old customs, cruel acts and primitive laws, and then they say this is what the Bible teaches. The Bible teaches nothing of the kind in the sense the Rationalists mean; the writers simply relate what they believe occurred; to relate the story of a crime is not to teach that crime is lawful; to give an account of a bad custom is not to say it is a good custom; it is not rational, it is decidedly irrational to treat history in that way. No one says that because a history of England contains accounts of wars and crimes and improper acts and customs that it teaches these things, and that therefore a history of England is a bad book and ought not to be read; or if bad laws, now obsolete, are to be found in our statute books, shall we therefore denounce the British Constitution and the laws of the realm?

The Rationalists know very well that the Old Testament contains writings and laws of different ages as varied as the statutes and literature of England, and they ought in reason to recognise the progressive improvement in the Hebrews as evidenced by their laws and literature, and not to fasten upon them practices and ideas which they themselves in their progress rejected and which were superseded, are superseded, in the Old Testament itself by higher ones. Ingersoll says the Old Testament, if it were inspired, "should be filled with intelligence, justice, purity, honesty, mercy, and the spirit of liberty." Well, is it not true that we find more of these in the Old Testament than in any other literature in the world? They are taught, insisted upon by the prophets, the psalmists, the collectors of proverbs, and in the most recent parts of the Pentateuch; whether the Old Testament was "inspired" or not, certainly these are the things it teaches and ordains. These are the things which have preserved the Hebrew writings, and justify the importance attached to them at the present day. The cosmogony, legends, chronicles of the Israelites, are very much like those of other people, and are full of interest, but they have not the ethical and religious value of the direct teaching of the preachers and moralists.

The New Testament is treated in the same way. The Rationalists begin by questioning the historical value of the Gospels, by ridiculing miracles and other things of secondary importance, but they refuse to see any good thing in the ethical teaching of Jesus; they never try to find out the meaning of sayings which apparently they do not understand; they scoff at things with which they are, for some reason, incapable of sympathising.

I am speaking of the modern professional Rationalists. Rationalists like Mill, Arnold, and Huxley took a very different view. Colonel Ingersoll says the Bible is the enemy of freedom and the support of slavery. But Huxley said, "The Bible has been the Magna Charta of the oppressed—so far as such equality, liberty, and fraternity are included under the democratic principles which assume the same names, the Bible is the most democratic book in the world."

A true Rationalist would distinguish between the history which is contained in the Old Testament, the customs of the early Israelites, particular opinions on various subjects and the positive teaching of justice, mercy, purity, liberty, and devotion which is to be found in the Old Testament. And it is the same in the New. The stories of miracles, expectations of a second Advent, the speculations of St. Paul and the visions of St. John, ought to be, and can easily be, separated from the religious and moral teaching. The duty of kindness, love, peace-making, purity, trust, which he and his disciples commended are still incumbent upon us even if the Evangelists and Apostles and Jesus himself made many mistakes.

If there are some religious people who fall into the error of making religion depend upon some irrelevant things, then the Rationalist should show these people that they are wrong in doing so, instead of condemning the Bible and Christianity altogether.

But after all, this is only of secondary importance, though the Rationalist treats it as of first. He asserts that it is reason and knowledge alone which have improved the mental, moral, and social condition of mankind. He gives religion no credit, but rather implies, when he does not actually assert it, that religion has done nothing but harm. Again I say that distinguished Agnostics are of a different opinion. Herbert Spencer says: "Originally, ethics has no existence apart from religion which holds it in solution." That is to say, that in the early stages of society and civilisation the only rules for right conduct were given by religion, they were proclaimed on religious grounds; they were obeyed on religious grounds. It was not knowledge or reason which was the guide of man in early times, it was religion. It was religion which decided what a man must do and what he must not do. And out of the observance of these early rules, often very imperfect no doubt, man rose to higher stages of morality and social order.

Herbert Spencer gives an illustration of the passage of a race from a lower to a higher stage, and it is the Hebrew race he selects: "After the chronic antagonisms of nomadic life had been brought to an end by their captivity, and after their subsequent wars had ended in a comparatively peaceful state, the expression of altruistic sentiments became marked, until, in Leviticus, we see emerging the principle, often regarded as exclusively Christian, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself"—a principle, however, which appears to have been limited to "the congregation of the children of Israel," and then, in later days, by the Essenes as well as by Christ himself, the ethics of amity extended so as to include enemies, and was carried even to the extreme of turning the cheek to the smiter."

And this is based upon the much-abused Bible! First the wild and warlike life of the early Israelites, then their peaceful settlement with the recognition of the duty of neighbourly love, and then the broad Christian extension of the principle to the love of all mankind. Here we can trace plainly the course of the moral and social improvement of a small but influential race, and the course was determined by religion at every step. Huxley says the essence of our religion is derived from the Semites, and referring to the prophetic religious ideal: "And what doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly and love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" he adds, "But what extent of knowledge, what acuteness of scientific criticism can touch this, if any one possessed of knowledge or acuteness could be absurd enough to make the attempt?" And yet the Rationalists say that religion has done no good, and is altogether exploded.

What, then, has religion done for the moral and social improvement of mankind? For the present we may leave the question of social improvement, as it is a necessary consequence of moral improvement. Religion has made men just, merciful, temperate, chaste, peaceable and loving, and in so doing has improved social conditions; for bad social conditions arise from injustice, oppression, cruelty, intemperance, and other crimes and vices, therefore as the moral condition of men improves their social condition improves also.

Religion first tends to improve men's moral condition by its commandments. All commandments, i.e., laws, have at first a religious sanction. The Israelites, like most ancient people, believed that their laws were given by God; this was not so in a literal sense, but they were given by their religion, which to them meant the same thing.

Colonel Ingersoll makes light of the ten commandments, first because they were not original, and secondly because they do not contain more than they do. He ridiculed the Sabbath law, not seeing that it was a humane one, and that it secured to every member of a household, from the master to the bond-servant, and alien, and even to the beasts of burden, one day's rest and freedom out of every seven. Ingersoll scoffed at the prohibition of idolatry which was prohibited because it was associated with immorality as well as for other reasons. With the distinctively moral commandments no Rationalist can find fault; they trained the Israelites in morality and in right social behaviour. The precepts of the prophets were based upon the moral law, written or unwritten, and Huxley says that nothing can be taken from them or added to them without spoiling them. The precepts of the Gospel are an extension of the moral law, they do not contradict it, and they only abolish aw in the sense intended by St. Paul when he said the law was a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ—that is, that prolonged obedience to an external law in time fits men to be left to the control of conscience or inward law. The ten commandments, the teaching of the prophets and of the Gospels have thus largely contributed to the improvement of the moral and therefore social condition of the world, first through Judaism and then through Christianity.

But the influence of Christianity is deeper than the influence of law. It introduces into the heart principles and emotions which elevate the life. Truly religious people are not always thinking of history and miracles and doctrines; let us say they believe these things, they generally forget all about them when they are in a religious frame of mind or when questions of conduct arise.

When religious people offer praise or prayer, or ask forgiveness of sin, or seek for help to lead a good life, when the divine ideal of love and holiness takes possession of their hearts, they trouble themselves little about doctrines; and intercessory prayer, which to some people seems so absurd, at least widens their sympathies and is a devout expression of altruism. Mr. Moncure Conway says that Emerson's famous divinity address was a kind of idealised Methodism: "His transcendentalism corresponded with Methodist transcendentalism at various points. The personal character of spiritual life, soul finding the divine in the solitude of the individual life, the mission ordained for every human being—these are interpretations of the Methodist doctrine of miraculous conversion, the inward witness of the spirit, progressive sanctification, and the divine 'call' to the ministry. I believe that my study of Emerson's Essays raised Methodism in my eyes, for this religious organisation was in Virginia alive, earnest, and not much interested in dogmas. I cannot remember ever hearing a Methodist sermon about the Trinity." *

Religion, then, in a real sense, the Rationalists leave alone. Religious people, no doubt, are imperfect, and do not come up to the Rationalist's ideal, but do they ever say they come up to their own? If Rationalists were to speak of art, poetry, and music as they do about religion, and treat them in the same irrational way, they would run a great risk of being thought uncultured and ignorant.

* Moncure D. Conway, Autobiography, i. 81.

Religious thought certainly differs from scientific and rationalist thought, because it is permeated by sympathy, morality, emotion, and imagination, while science and reason only engage a part of our nature. In the ultimate analyis, according to St. Paul, religion consists of faith, hope, and love. Religion which springs from the heart is tender, loving, trusting, believing, hopeful; it is music without words, until the voice gives expression to the longings and aspirations of the soul; if it is sometimes sad, it is because of sorrow and sin, and if it longs for heaven it is because heaven means rest from sorrow and freedom from sin.

Religion lifts a man above himself and makes him strive to bring his life and conduct into harmony with his aspirations, and thus he becomes gradually a better man. As he becomes better he becomes more sensitive and more loving, more sympathetic and thoughtful for others; so he comes to hate injustice, cruelty, oppression, and to pity and help the poor and suffering; so he improves his own moral condition and the moral and social condition of mankind. No, it is not knowledge and reason that have done everything, the greater part has been done by sympathy, love, imagination, and, above all, by religion.

GENUINE RELIGION.

SIR,—I am very glad to hear that you have inserted in full the admirable paper read by Mr. Tarrant on the last day of the Conference at Geneva. It was one of the latest utterances, but all that had gone before seemed to lead up to it, for the eloquent sermons of M. Roberty, Pasteur Furrer, and Dr. Savage, no less than the fiery oratory of the Rabbi Léon Lévy and of Père Hyacinthe, were insistent on the one point of the infinite value of the human soul. If we believe this, is it not incumbent upon us, as members of a Christian church, to strive for the social conditions without which there is no chance of its development? How else can we respond to the fervent appeal of Dr. Furrer to be to the world "living witnesses of the everlasting love of God"?

In America the same problem of how to make religion a real and vivifying influence on the masses of the population is before all the churches, and Mr. St. John, the secretary of the American Unitarian Association, told us that they were looking to the followers of Channing to point the way to a solution. We were the pioneers of the Domestic Mission movement in the last century, but Dr. Tuckerman himself, were he living now, would probably be the first to admit that, invaluable as that work has proved and is proving, it cannot be the final word for this generation. Last Sunday I had the privilege of hearing the author of "La Vie Simple" preach in the Cathedral to such a crowded audience as Calvin himself might have addressed, and his sermon was again a powerful plea for action—a trumpet call to the liberal churches to be up and doing, in the name of God and Christ, for the moral and spiritual redemption of the world.

All the churches are beginning to recognise the need of united action for this end, and ours, as bound by no creed, but representing the central truth of all religions—the love of God and man—should surely be, not last, but foremost in the good work.

A NEW DEFINITION OF "UNITARIAN CHURCHES."

SIR,—The definition thus referred to is to be found in a paper on "The Number, Organisation, and Condition of Unitarian Churches of Great Britain and Ireland," read by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, at the meeting of "The International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers," at Geneva, on Tuesday, August 29, and published in THE INQUIRER of Saturday, September 2. The definition itself is that the churches in question are "churches free in their constitution and open to the laws of natural change." The author of this new definition assures us that the question thus suggested has become "academic, usually barren, and to one unacquainted with traditional Unitarianism, not a little perplexing"; but, as he himself makes the definition into the basis, or the starting point, of a long and able paper, neither he nor anyone else can complain if I, for one, venture to discuss this new definition of churches which, if they were what they are so constantly miscalled, would have passed the stage of mere definition at least a century and a quarter since. Mere controversy, however, is at least as far from being my aim in criticising this new definition as it was from the aim of its originator; but holding, as I have long done, clear and strong convictions on the whole question thus dealt with, I am compelled to say what I have to say upon it.

(1) No one can carefully read the definition without noticing that, while it professes to define "Unitarian Churches," as they actually are, it leaves Unitarianism itself entirely out of the question. If the definition takes the Unitarianism of the defined churches for granted, it none the less leaves their Unitarianism in the background or in a shunted position, whether behind or before, on the right hand or on the left. It is quite true, as the author of the definition reminds his hearers or his readers, that "the etymology of words carries us only a short way in reaching their real implication"; but when, as in this case, not only is their etymology dropped out altogether, but their original contents are completely changed, the process to which they are thus subjected is not that of definition, but of evisceration followed by mere stuffing. While the derivation of words may not take us far in the direction of their ultimate meaning, yet, when you knock their derivation on the head and destroy all that has grown out of it, in order to stuff the hollowed-out carcasses of the words themselves with quite foreign matter, so far from putting a large and nobler meaning into them, you do but turn them into very poor scarecrows. Personally, therefore, it seems to me as clear as noonday that, when it is claimed, as in this new definition, that "Unitarian Churches" that have cast out, or set aside, all their Unitarianism are "Unitarian Churches," still the claim cannot be allowed.

(2) It is an equally fatal objection to this new definition of "Unitarian Churches" that it would do equally well, or equally ill, for Trinitarian Churches or Arian Churches, or any theological kind of churches, provided they were but "free in their constitution and open to the laws of natural change." It might, in reply to this alternation, be said that Trinitarian Churches, or Arian Churches, or the like, could not be "free in their constitution and open to the laws of natural change," which would be true enough so long as they maintained their distinctive theologies or Christologies, or both; but, then, the same fatal objection applies equally well to distinctively Unitarian Churches. All churches that use doctrinal names to set forth their distinctive features are bound to be actually loyal to the doctrines they thus nominally set up as their standards, and when, in defiance of the distinctive names they have thus fastened upon themselves or had fastened upon them, they claim to be free even to trample on all that their names properly signify, they simply thus claim the cowardly right to commit suicide or the equally cowardly right to betray their own trusts. Just, in fact, as a Trinitarian Church, or any kindred doctrinally distinguished church, can only be "free in its constitution and open to the laws of natural change" within the bounds of its own doctrinal limitations, precisely so it is with a "Unitarian Church." A definition, therefore, of "Unitarian Churches" which would do equally well, or equally ill, as would the one in question, for churches of a totally opposite doctrinal character must be condemned at once as fatally bad in itself, and worthless for the purpose assigned to it.

(3) The more one looks at it the more one sees that this new definition neither is nor can be any approach to a true or admissible definition of "Unitarian Churches," but is simply part of what might become a definition of "free churches." If the definer means, once again, thus to suggest that "Unitarian Churches" and "free churches" are one and the same thing, then, once again, I, for one, must decline to allow the suggestion, as all I have now written has gone to show. It is logically impossible thus to take things that radically differ from each other either as being the same thing or as being equivalents of each other. If a man, either under the power of some foregone conclusion or swayed by some external consideration, were to contend that Trinitarian Churches and free churches were one and the same, we should refuse his contention at once as a sheer contradiction in terms; but do not let us forget that we are equally bound in logic to reject, on the same grounds, the corresponding contention that "Unitarian Churches" and "free churches" are one and the same thing. If the churches, which the author of the new definition thus discussed and gave an account of, really are "free in their constitution and open to the laws of natural change," why not give them both a definition and a name corresponding with the facts? Let these futile and contradictory attempts to more and more fasten upon them names that never did rightly belong to more than a seventh part of them come to an absolute and perpetual end. When, on the open confession of its advocates, Unitarianism, like Trinitarianism, has lost all its distinctive meaning, the only wise and honourable course is to let it drop away and get buried; and when "Unitarian Churches" can only be defined by a phrase which is but an incomplete definition of free churches, it is time to begin openly to call them just what they are—free churches, with or without the completed definition. Till that be done, doomsday itself will not terminate these futile attempts to reconcile the absolutely irreconcilable, and to enlighten a public which we have ourselves bewildered by our self-contradictions.

AGAINST THE WAR SPIRIT.

SIR,—Many thanks to Mr. Perris for his spirited and quite sufficient reply to Mr. Howse. It has set me thinking, however, about a letter which, to tell the truth, I did not seriously read. Mr. Howse gravely missed the point. In answer to my plea against the doctrine that the way to get peace is to prepare for war, he ought to have suggested my going armed or in company with a bully for protection when I take a walk on the Thames side. My answer to that would be: first, that this would spoil the walk; second, that it would draw undue attention to me; third, that it would excite alarm and induce others to arm themselves and bring out bullies; and fourth, that it would infallibly lead to a row or to playing the fool. As the matter stands, we are all very happy on the Thames, and we find that the way to keep the peace is to avoid every appearance of war.

Mr. Squire says that the Republics in South Africa began the war. In a technical sense they did, but not in reality. Long before they moved a man we had taken every step that demonstrated our intention to carry through another and an official raid. But let that rest. Mr. Millin well exposed the fallacious reference to the Boer war by showing that our excuse for our assault was that the Transvaal had prepared for war. If that was so, it is another proof that to be prepared for war is the way to get it.

We ought to thank Mr. Bakewell also for his help. He tells us that the Tsar's "aggressive preparations in the Far East led to the late lamentable war." Precisely: that is what I said at first. If the Tsar had been peaceable and merely commercial there would probably have been no war.

Mr. Bakewell, also missing the point, says that "it is as wicked to fight on water as on land." The question is not whether it is wicked to fight; the question is whether the way to get peace is to prepare for war. He says that "no one proposes to abolish the fleet." I am not so sure of that. It would be a violent and perhaps risky thing to do; but there are many of us who think that the late flourishing of fleets was also a violent and risky thing to do. We would keep the hangman quiet and as much out of sight as possible, and gradually abolish him.

England, at any rate, has had one man who looked forward to the abolishing of fleets. Did Tennyson write mere "unpatriotic" nonsense when he wrote this:—

O ye, the wise who think, the wise who reign,
From growing commerce loose her latest chain,
And let the fair white-winged peacemaker fly
To happy havens under all the sky,
And mix the seasons and the golden hours,
Till each man finds his own in all men's good,
And all men work in noble brotherhood,
Breaking their mailed fleets and armed towers,
And ruling by obeying Nature's powers,
And gathering all the fruits of peace, and crowned with all her flowers.

Mr. Bakewell reproves some of us for "lack of patriotism," and attributes our "decline of influence" to that. I don't believe it. I believe the reverse. At any rate, the truest patriotism is shown in the desire to see one's country lead the way in checking the war spirit and preparations for war, and in fostering the spirit of amity and peace. And, as for "influence," well, we can afford to do without that if necessary; but plenty of even that would come if we would prove ourselves worthy of it in the right way.

J. PAGE HOPPS.

Shepperton-on-Thames.

P.S.—Since writing this letter the dispute between Sweden and Norway has reached a crisis concerning which only one thing is clear—that every movement in the direction of preparation for war, so far from making for peace, makes instantly for war. It was only the suggestion of settlement on the basis of disarming the fortress or fortresses and the entering into a treaty of peace and arbitration that made for peace.—J. P. H.

SIR,—I wish to thank you for having opened your columns to letters on this subject. The only difference between your correspondents is as to how peace should be *ob*tained or *main*tained. I adhere to the views put forward by myself and those who think with me, and my faith in the British nation leads me to believe that in a matter of such importance as national defence they will judge justly and act accordingly.

DENNIS B. SQUIRE.

Lymebourne, Sidmouth, Sept. 17.

THE Autumn Provincial Conference of the United Kingdom Band of Hope Union is being held at Oxford, from September 22 to 28 inclusive. At five o'clock to-day (Saturday) there is to be a mass meeting of children in the Sheldonian Theatre. On Sunday there will be special services in various city churches and chapels, and the official sermon will be preached in the cathedral at three p.m. by the Rev. Canon Barker. The National Unitarian Temperance Association will be represented at the Conference by its treasurer, Mr. F. A. Edwards, and Miss Ada Sale, of Northampton.

PREACHER AND ACTOR.

AN admirable subject for controversy is started in last week's Methodist Times. A prominent place is given to an article, a full column in length, comparing a Methodist preacher with some actor in one of Shakespeare's plays. The preacher is described as using a harsh voice, without modulation, pausing at the wrong places, and utterly failing to give life and reality to his words. On the contrary, it is said of the actor, "one was scarcely conscious of his voice as a thing apart from the meaning, so perfectly did each fit the other." One of the first reflections of the average Evangelical reader will surely be what a wicked sin it has been in preachers and religious editors to maintain a constant prejudice against the theatre, if it has so much in the way of lesson, both to local and regular preachers, as this article suggests. A further thought may tend to throw some doubt on the soundness of this writer's judgment. Quoting an unpleasantly realistic sentence from a well-known narrative in 1 Kings, the writer says: "How the actor would have played with the words 'wound' and 'blood.'" Exactly. So would some few preachers. But most of them, perhaps one may thankfully say, know that it is not their business to be actors. To a minister who simulates shudders as he reads some horrid detail; who "makes mows" at things, and plays antics before his congregation, the right word is Hamlet's: "Leave thy damnable faces and begin." Begin to preach, that is, not to mouth like a second, third, or fourth rate actor; not to try to emulate a first rate one; but to be so taken up by thy message that there is no need nor opportunity for the smaller tricks or the more clever art that may be well in place elsewhere.

For the rest, to deny that a preacher should be an actor is not to deny that he should use his voice well, and be trained to use it. A man who is not a soldier should learn to walk, and a man who is no actor may well learn to speak. But let the minister not confuse his business with that of an actor, or forget the difference between the pulpit and the stage. More hateful than George Eliot's bitterest criticism of the taste and style of a great London preacher was the merit allowed him by Mr. Lewis that he had some good actor's tones. From such praise heaven save our ministers.

Is there not a new thirst for an individual and social life more in harmony with Jesus Christ than has yet existed? Can great truths, after having been once developed, die? Is not the human soul opening itself more and more to the divine perfection and beauty of Christ's character? And who can foretell what this mighty agency is to accomplish in the world? The present day is, indeed, a day of distrust, complaint, and anxious forebodings. On every side voices of fear and despondency reach us. Let us respond to them with a voice of faith and hope. Let us not shut our eyes ungratefully on the good already wrought in our times, and, seeing in this the pledge of higher blessings, let us arm ourselves with manly resolution to do or suffer, each in his own sphere, whatever may serve to prepare the way for a holier and happier age.—Channing.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department hould be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Bury District Sunday School Union.—The second summer ramble of this Union took place on Saturday last to Ainsworth, where tea was served to 160 persons, followed by a social. Mr. R. A. Yates conducted the ramblers and Mr. Wm. Yates Greenhalgh (president) acted as M.C. With good weather the afternoon was thoroughly enjoyed.

Bury (Sunday-school Centenary)—The Bank-street Sunday-school celebrates its centenary to-day (Saturday) by a reunion of old teachers and scholars, and to-morrow by special services in which the Revs. Douglas Walmsley and J. Collins Odgers, former ministers of the chapel, will take part with the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, the present minister.

Clifton (Appointment).—The Rev. E. I. Fripp, B.A., of Mansfield, and formerly of All Souls' Church, Belfast, has accepted the pulpit of Oakfield-road Church, and will enter on his duties on the first Sunday in December.

Harvest Festivals.—This is the season of Harvest Thanksgiving services, which are so habitual and uniform in general character as to be hardly matter for separate and special report. We hear of successful services at Chatham (Rev. Tyssul Davis), Cirencester (Rev. Rudolf Davis, of Bridgwater), Great Yarmouth (Rev. J. Birks), where members of the Filby congregation were also present; Halstead (Rev. T. E. M. Edwards), Mottram (Rev. J. E. Stead of Mossley), and Stockton-on-Tees.

London: Essex Church (Appointment).—The Rev. Arthur Goland, M.A., who has recently completed his course at Manchester College, has been appointed Assistant Minister to the Rev. Frank K. Freeston at Essex Church, and will commence his duties on Sunday next, preaching at the evening service.

Manchester: Moss Side (Resignation).—At a meeting of the members, held on Wednesday, Sept. 13, a letter was read from the Rev. Charles Roper, B.A., resigning his position as minister of the church which he has held for the past seventeen years, he having accepted an invitation to Kilburn. There being no alternative, the members were forced to accept it, which they did, with very deep regret, as Mr. Roper's ministrations and genial and kindly disposition have endeared him to the hearts of all.

Mansfield (Resignation).—The Rev. E. I. Fripp, B.A., has resigned the charge of the Old Meeting congregation, which he has held for the last five years, having accepted an invitation to Oakfield-road Church, Clifton.

"Never writer wrote with deeper conviction than George Gissing; every sentence has come straight from the heart, and this fact alone, apart from its artistic merit, gives a poignancy and strength to his work which separates it at once from the common ruck of novel-writing. These books are terrible arraignments of life—their peculiar characteristic is this poignancy, this painting of life at its moments of unbearable crisis. Between misery and despair lies a whole world of difference; misery is what can be endured—despair is the unbearable, and George Gissing is the spokesman of Despair." —Jane H. Findlater, in the National Review.

"Fate set him for his life-task the study of the swarming miseries of our human ant-heaps and the pettinesses of our mortal nature. 'The Nether World,' 'New Grub Street,' 'Demos,' 'The Odd Women,' 'The Whirlpool,'—these are all monumental titles, mighty themes. None of his contemporaries in England—only Zola and Tolstoi anywhere else—even attempted to wrestle with such big canvases, and if Gissing did not always rise to the height of his great argument, the conception was at least Herculean."—I. NOTES OF THE WEEK.

PROFESSOR JEAN REVILLE'S paper on "The Separation of the Churches and the State in France," which we published last week, may lead some of our readers to wish to turn back to previous contributions from him on this subject, and generally on religious conditions in France. These will be found in THE INQUIRER of April 25, 1903, June 25, 1904, and Jan. 14 and 21 of the present year.

THE furnishing and general equipment of the new premises secured by the Unitarian Home Missionary College have now been practically completed. The committee have found an excellent matron in Miss Panton Ham, daughter of the late Rev. J. Panton Ham, formerly minister of Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, and Essex-street Chapel, London. The matron and staff are already in residence, and the Principal and students will enter during the present week. The new Hall will open with fourteen students in residence. Of these eleven are students of the College, two are ex-students, and one is a young medical student, a member of the Brahmo Samaj of Bombay.

THE details of the opening arrangements will be found in our advertising columns. The committee have been fortunate in securing some very distinguished speakers, and there will no doubt be a large demand for tickets. As, however, the space available is necessarily limited, application for tickets should be made as early as possible.

THE Autumnal Conference of the United Kingdom Band of Hope Union at Oxford was thoroughly successful, the workers, gathered together from all parts of the country, taking the opportunity also to do a good deal of practical work in Oxford and the vicinity. The jubilee of the Union gave occasion for a paper by Mr. Rowland Hill, of Bedford, on "Looking Backward; or, Fifty Years of United Effort." This and the other valuable papers contributed to the Conference should be read in the Band of Hope Chronicle, of which Mr. Hill is editor. On Sunday, as we announced last week, Canon Barker, Rector of Marylebone, preached in the Cathedral, and at Manchester College the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter spoke at the morning service on the subject of temperance.

THE scathing exposure of Dr. Torrey by Mr. Stead in the July Review of Reviews does not appear to have had any effect upon its incorrigible subject, who is now conducting a mission at Sheffield, with his usual success. He has, of course, been repeating his stereotyped slander of Unitarians, which he imagines to be justified by "God's own words" in John iii. 36. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin, of Upperthorpe, preached last Sunday a sermon on "The Unitarian's Point of View," a report of which fills nearly a column of Tuesday's Sheffield Independent, and we must hope that many of the Sheffield crowd who heard the stupid slander may read this more wholesome statement also.

THE Ealing Tenants (Limited) are making good progress. The houses let readily as fast as they can be built. People appreciate the opportunity of paying rents which compare favourably with those usual in the district, and without further expense securing an interest in the company and a share of the profits. A considerable estate has been recently purchased to add to that which is fast being covered by houses, and it is probable that the land now acquired will be laid out more on Garden City lines than has hitherto been attempted, the price of purchase making this possible. Ealing Tenants (Limited) has not provided houses for the very poor, but it gives better houses to the fairly prosperous workmen, clerks, &c., than they could get elsewhere for the money; and after 4½ per cent. has been paid on loan stock and 5 per cent. on share capital, the remainder of any profit made will be divided among tenants, who will receive it in the form of shares in the company. Up to the present the company has paid the full interest on capital employed, and has had a surplus, and appears to have no difficulty in obtaining the requisite capital.

MUNICIPAL concerts have been arranged by the Borough Concerts Committee at Battersea for the past five years with great success. The first concerts were free, and it was intended to pay for them out of the rates, but the Local Government Board objected, and a small charge was made which, with crowded attendances, has paid all expenses. It is now decided to establish, in addition to the Tuesday evening concerts, a series of high-class symphony concerts on Sunday afternoons, beginning October 1, for which the British Symphony Orchestra of forty-six professional instrumentalists is engaged.

LONDON has shown a remarkable development in appreciation of orchestral music among the well-to-do classes in recent years. Battersea is giving the working-people the opportunity of similar refining influences. Other municipalities are interested in what Battersea is doing, and it may be that, in time, the long suppressed love of music in the English people will be found again, and add joy to the life of the "common people" as it does in Germany, a joy not without religious significance.

THE twenty-seventh annual report of the Social and Political Education League, which has just been issued, is a record of the best year's work since the League was founded by the late Sir John Seeley. The number of lectures delivered throughout the year was 276, as compared with 183 in 1903-4; of these 135 were illustrated lectures, and 88 different societies and clubs were served. The financial statement is satisfactory, showing a balance in hand, and gratification is expressed at the growing financial support given by organisations to which the League renders service. Professor F. W. Maitland, of Downing College, Cambridge, succeeds Sir Oliver Lodge as President for the current year. The League offers admirable opportunities to literary and other kindred societies in arranging for the discussion of social and political topics from a non-partisan standpoint. All lectures are given gratuitously, although societies and clubs are urged to contribute towards the expenses according to their means. The Organising Secretary, Mr. A. H. Reed, 23, Old-square, Lincoln's Inn, will be glad to forward copies of the lecture list on application.

RATIONALISM.

THE interesting letter from Mr. Shrubsole, which appeared in THE INQUIRER for September 9, referring to my first article on "The Omissions of Rationalism," deserves respectful consideration. Mr. Shrubsole disclaims all knowledge of the Rationalist Press Association, but if he had been as familiar with their publications as I am, he would have known that I did its writers no injustice in attributing to them the use of the word "Rationalism" in a sense of which he does not approve. This Association has had an enormous success with its publications, but it must be noted that its books are of two kinds; its chief success has been with a remarkable series of cheap reprints of famous books, for the issue of which it is entitled to considerable praise. But the Rationalist Press Association publishes another class of books written by its own writers, who, with two or three exceptions, are not widely known; and these writers are known as "Rationalists," their doctrine is called "Rationalism," and they appeal to Reason alone. In my first article I implied, if I did not say, that I considered them justified in their use of these terms, and that I should deal with them on that understanding. Mr. Shrubsole, on the other hand, thinks that if these writers use these words in the sense which I attribute to them, they must be wanting in common intelligence. It is not my concern to defend the Rationalists, but as I accepted their use of the terms, his animadversions, in a measure, reflect upon me. I may add that Professor Carpenter referred to one of these writers in his address at Geneva, and another is a contributor to the Hibbert Journal.

"Reason" is an ambiguous term, and is sometimes used in one sense and sometimes in another; but I do not think a writer who uses it in one sense should say that those who use it in the other are wanting in intelligence. The same objection might be made to writers in the Bible. Mr. Shrubsole quotes a saying about wisdom (Sophia) which supports his view, but St. Paul sometimes uses the word wisdom (Sophia) in the very sense in which "Rationalism" is now used. I do not know if any of the "wisdom" writers told St. Paul that if he meant a different sense he should have used a different word.

Mr. Shrubsole also quotes some translation of a passage from Lao Tzse in support of his use of the word "Reason"; but the rendering of the Tâo, by "Reason" is very questionable and certainly misleading. (See introduction to "The Texts of Tâoism," by Dr. James Legge, on the meaning of the word Tâo, "Sacred Books of the East," Vol. XXXIX., p. 12.) Tâoism is (amongst other things) intellectual quietism, and the doctrine of the Tâo Teh King is that the world suffers from too much Rationalism, and not too little, which is very much the same as what St. Paul said or meant of the wisdom of the Greeks.

By Reason, in the Rationalists' sense, a perfectly legitimate sense, is meant, as I said, the exercise of that faculty which is engaged in the verification of propositions and doctrines or kindred tasks; it is what we think of when we speak of "reasoning," the use of logic or dialectic to determine the truth or falsehood of a proposition or doctrine; it is a great faculty, but can only be employed in its proper sphere, and in that sphere I am as much a Rationalist as anyone; but I am not a Rationalist who insists that Reason (in this sense) must be supreme in every department of life, because we cannot reduce life to a series of propositions or apply logic to every thought and feeling, word and deed.

I said this use of the word reason was legitimate; and, referring to the "Century Dictionary," I find (amongst others) this definition:—"The logical faculties generally, including all that is subservient to distinguishing truth from falsehood—except sense, imagination, and memory on the one hand, and the faculty of perceiving first principles and other lofty faculties on the other."

My difference with the Rationalists is justified by this definition, because it appeared to me from an extensive acquaintance with their writings that they neglected to take into account these other faculties. I am anything but alone in this view. Within the last day or two I have come across, quite unexpectedly, several passages in various books which support my contention. I need only give two of them. The first is by Mr. George Trobridge, a Swedenborgian writer, who says:—

"Reason, indeed, is a God-given faculty, but has been unduly exalted. It is a round-about way of arriving at the truth, as compared with the direct method of 'perception.' The one leads or may lead to an apprehension of the truth, the other alone is the road to wisdom." (The Foundations of Philosophy, p. 33.)

And Macterlinck says, even more emphatically:—

"Strangely enough, it is not in reason that moral life has its being, and he who would let reason govern his life would be the most wretched of men. There is not a virtue, a beautiful thought, or a generous deed, but has its roots hidden far away from that which can be understood and explained." (Wisdom and Destiny, p. 110.)

The same idea is conveyed in the well-known sayings of French thinkers:—

"All great thoughts spring from the heart" (Vauvenargues).

"The heart has its reasons which the reason does not know" (Pascal).

Mr. Shrubsole also says that my arguments cut away the very basis of Unitarianism; at which I am surprised, for it is "Reason" as used in the Rationalist sense which is the foundation of Unitarian theology, though Unitarianism as a religion contains much more. It is the exercise of the logical faculties, the distinguishing truth from falsehood, which has led (from one point of view) to the Unitarian position. We have always held that Unitarian doctrine, on its intellectual side, rests upon Reason; we bring the orthodox doctrines to the bar of reason and try them by the rules of evidence and logic, and we hold that evidence and logic are against them; and we sometimes call Unitarianism a rational religion, but we do not call it Rationalism, because this term by itself has no religious signification, and at the present time is often used, not only in opposition to a belief in revelation, but as the antithesis of religion. One of the recent publications of the Rationalist Press Association is entitled, "Christianity and Rationalism on Trial"; and as this is a collection of essays by eleven Rationalist writers, it may be considered representative. With many, perhaps most, of their criticisms of orthodox opinions Unitarians might agree, but on some other important matters our differences are so great that the same name could not possibly describe us both.

My only object in this supplementary paper is to show that the Rationalists are justified in using the word Reason in the sense I attributed to them, and that I was justified in accepting it in their sense; but having admitted this, I thought it desirable to point out that there are other faculties besides Reason which have contributed to the mental, moral, and social improvement of mankind.

THE JUNGFRAU.

MÜRREN looks up to the Jungfrau,
And the Jungfrau points to the sky;
While the distant rush of the avalanche sounds
Like a desolate giant's sigh.

When the work of the daylight is ended
The mountain its calmness regains;
'Tis the sun that the avalanche quickens,
The night that its movement restrains.

I watched the pure gleam of the snow-clad peak,
Till the fancy seized me that I
Was a youth looking up to a maiden,
Whilst the maiden pointed on high.

Then the moon came out in the darkening
And shone o'er a silent land,
On the brow of that silvery mountain
Its crescent seemed to stand.

And the beautiful scene sank into my mind,
So fitting it seemed to me
That Diana should rest on the Jungfrau,
A link with the sky to be.

Now, whenever I see the crescent moon,
A vision comes floating by,
Of where Mürren looks up to the Jungfrau,
And the Jungfrau points to the sky.

CHRISTIANITY is the hope of the world and we ought to regard every conspicuous manifestation of its spirit and power as an era in human history. We are dazzled by revolutions of empires; we hope much from the rise or fall of governments. But nothing but Christianity can regenerate the earth, and accordingly we should hail with joy every sign of a clearer comprehension and a deeper feeling of its truths. Christianity, truly understood, has a direct tendency to that renovation of the world which it foretells. It is not an abstract system, secluding the disciple from his kind; but it makes him one with his race, breaks down all barriers between him and his brethren, arms him with a martyr's spirit in the cause of humanity, sends him forth to be a saviour of the lost; and just as far as Christianity is thus viewed and felt by its followers, the redemption of the world draws nigh.—Channing.

BOOKS, NEW AND OLD.

THE reader's year does not follow the arbitrary ways of the calendar. His New Year's Day may be celebrated more fitly at the beginning of October than on the first of January. The holidays are over; the summer has become a memory; the lamp is lit early in the library; the long evenings of bookish reverie have begun; and old friends are beckoning from the shelves. It is then, unless he is a slave to the calendar, that he makes good literary resolutions for the future, and repents mildly of his wasted moments. Perhaps he is even betrayed in the exuberance of his virtue into mapping out a comprehensive course of reading, and entering it in a neat hand in a note-book, happily blind to the harvest of self-reproach that he is laying up for the future. Those are among the proud moments of our lives, for imagination turns resolutions readily into facts, and we see ourselves already the masters of many volumes, read, annotated and restored to their place with all their subtle essence distilled into the fibre of our brain. But, alas! for the vanity of human wishes. I have heard of very few cases of faithfulness to those self-imposed ordinances, and in a few months the list of unread books loses even the doubtful virtue of good intentions. Perhaps for some of us the failure is a blessing in disguise. The man who reads the Decline and Fall in the train on the way to town, and refuses all other fare till the daily dose has been measured out to the last drop, may turn out to be a very dull person. Literary medicine is seldom a good mental tonic. In the majority of cases it is to be commended only as a cure for insomnia.

And yet courses of reading have their value. We want some principle of selection to guide us. The student, of course, has his special subject. He knows where to go for his material, and he is not to be enticed from his path by any By-ends that he meets on the way. It is in our desultory reading, in our dealings with what we call vaguely "General Literature," that we hardly know what we would be at. We taste many books in small samples, till the palate is jaded, and the modern novel triumphs over every rival. If there are some books, which, as the catalogues say, "no gentleman's library should be without," there are others which ought to be there because they are good to read. If a man finds them long-winded or dull, he should, as Mr. Frederic Harrison has reminded us, "fall on his knees and pray for a cleanlier and quieter spirit." For in the rush of life and the mass of new writing which comes on us every spring and autumn like a flood, the masterpieces are neglected and the great leisurely books in several volumes seem an impossible task. Let every reader reserve the needful time from insipid novels and give it to something that in its way is really excellent, not out of mere dutifulness, but for his own health and joy.

But "the best books," who shall tell us which they are? The fashion of thinking that they numbered exactly one hundred, and that the volumes to be included in the mystic group could be determined for us by the votes of a few popular writers, has been as short-lived as it was foolish. And yet, there is something which raises a piece of literature above the crowd, some vital quality which gives to it inevitable place among the classics. Securus judicat orbis terrarum, which means, in these matters, that the world is no fool, and its judgment should have weight. There is no need to argue that Shakespeare and Goethe are great writers, or that Tennyson had a supreme poetic gift, or that the names of Dante, Milton, Molière and Scott stand for the best achievements of the human mind. It does not follow that we are all to sit down to the "Inferno," or "Paradise Lost." The world is wide, and we must be influenced largely by our own preferences and tastes; but it is a safe rule to remember that the best safeguard against trashy books is to keep company with the immortals.

I have quoted already from Frederic Harrison's Choice of Books, and this well-known essay is an excellent warning against triviality. To some minds, indeed, it is perhaps a little fatiguing in its prodigality of suggestion, a little discouraging in the sheer volume of what it proposes for our benefit; and yet, I confess I can read it always with pleasure. There is something contagious in its enthusiasm, and I am content to marvel at the author's unequalled power of literary digestion. It misses, however, the delightful touches of autobiography which belong to some other pieces in the same manner. Stevenson's essay on "Books which have influenced me," is in a far less didactic vein, and there are pages in the "Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft" which are redolent of the charm of books without any suspicion of doing us good.

The mention of Stevenson reminds me of the three volumes of his essays which have been issued this summer. Formerly, they were included only in the Edinburgh edition, and possibly some of them might have been left with advantage in this comparative obscurity. They are hardly his best work, a few of them are unfinished fragments, and we may doubt whether the fastidious master of style would be pleased by their revival. There is, however, a rage for completeness, and purchasers can be found for every scrap of writing by a great master. The recent issue of Pater's "Essays from The Guardian," in the ordinary edition, is another case of the same kind, perhaps, in some ways, even less justifiable. Be that as it may, we think that Messrs. Chatto and Windus have made a little too much of the new Stevenson material. Two volumes would have been quite adequate. Large print, ample margins, and a mass of disfiguring trade advertisements at the end, have all been laid under tribute in order to eke out the third volume, and in spite of all this artifice it has a rather lean appearance.

However, we are not inclined to grumble. It is not given to us every day to read a piece like "The Amateur Emigrant" for the first time. It is of the best, and surely it is by some mischance that it was not included in "Across the Plains," to which it is the proper introduction. The essay on "Some Technical Elements of Style in Literature," has been the cause of some curious controversy and misunderstanding. The people who are all for spontaneity and inspiration, call it preposterous. It is as though we were to decry anatomy because we love human beings. Nobody imagines, and Stevenson least of all, that Shakespeare and Milton wrote with a mass of rules to guide them. They had the quick instinct of genius and training. But the consummate art of good writing requires a fine ear and practised skill in the use of words, and a noble piece of prose is as artificial, if you will, as a musical symphony. It is not necessary for us all to know how it is done; but for the curious, Stevenson has opened up a fascinating inquiry into the art of beautiful writing. Our complaint is not that in a technical essay he is frankly and delightfully technical, but that he has only given us a fragment. There is so much about the value of consonants and vowels, of words and phrases, which he leaves unsaid.

Reminiscences of George Macdonald are sure to be plentiful just now, and rightly so, for he was above all a romantic personality. He began as a preacher, and it is the preacher who reappears in his books, and gives the note of meditative seriousness to his poetry. There was in him a vein of Celtic mysticism, which early proved too strong for the merciless logic of his Calvinistic creed. His novels may fairly be reckoned among the popular influences which have given a richer humanity to religion. Perhaps, in the notices which have appeared of him, hardly enough has been said of his gift for vivid popular speech. A lecture of his on "Macbeth" stands out in my memory, after many years, as a wonderful piece of oratory. It held its audience spellbound, alike by its intellectual force and the dramatic power of its delivery. He had, perhaps, the most eloquent hands of any speaker I have ever listened to. Perhaps that again was a sign of the Celt in him, for to most English speakers the hand is a fatal embarrassment.

The autumn announcements are bewildering in the number of new books which they promise us. Most of them leave us with a sense of amazement that anybody can be found to read them. Here and there, however, there is one which may be looked for with some eagerness. We are to have the long promised book on 'Pre-Raphaelitism and the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood," by Mr. Holman Hunt. Morley's "Life of Gladstone" is to be issued in fifteen sixpenny parts. Mr. Chesterton has written a book on George Meredith, which is sure to be brilliant, suggestive and provoking; and Mr. Stopford Brooke has his volume of Shakespeare Lectures ready for the press. The book season will not be dull which brings us such good things as these.

THE QUEST OF THE INFINITE.*

AMID the vast mass of theological and semi-theological literature with which we are flooded year by year it is surprising how few works exhibit any real and lasting vitality. Learning, earnestness, a certain felicity of expression—all these may be largely present in a volume of the kind, and yet there may be wanting just that element of first-hand thoughtfulness and experience which is necessary to redeem the whole from dulness. About Mr. Millard's book there is nothing "dull"; from the first page to the last there is something to hold any reader who approaches the great question of religion on the side of free and open investigation. A lover of dogmatic "schemes" and ready-made definitions must look elsewhere, for it is with the principles underlying theologies that our author is concerned; he does not deny—nay, he strongly asserts—the need for doctrine and organisation, but he shows that the primal necessity in matters religious is not this or that Church, this or that presentment of view, but individual realisation of the spiritual and the eternal.

Having, first of all, treated of that "element of 'hiddenness,'" which is the beginning and end of all our knowledge, and having shown that "religion is, in its very nature, full of the element of the mysterious," Mr. Millard goes on to distinguish between a true and a false recognition of mystery in religion; he bids us not forget that, just because "God is inexhaustible"; there is an open way for reason's flight:—"He cannot be 'found out to perfection,' the depths of His Being are far beyond the reach of our longest plummet line; that only gives to the reverent mind the wider scope, provides a field for its exercise worthy of its great powers, and justifies the reason in refusing the fetters which authority would impose to stay its progress and hinder its free activity." There is much in this part of the volume that we should like to quote, but the chapter on "The Place of Reason in a Religion of Mystery" should be read as a whole, and it is, therefore, with the less reluctance that we pass on to glance at the complementary chapter on "The Limitations of Reason." Herein is discussed the subjectivity of all human thinking; for mankind there can be no finality as regards doctrine, since "truth which is of God, must always be greater than doctrine which is of man, and therefore subject to the limitations of the man who frames it." Hence it is that "the doctrines of the Church not only may, but must, be constantly changing their form, readjusting their outlook, varying their emphasis; stepping-stones of our living selves to higher things, and mile-stones which mark our progress towards the ultimate reality." That which we claim as truth must be personally experienced by us, otherwise the truth itself "becomes a lie." Again, our individual freedom is not to be the isolation of anarchy, but the liberty of an ordered community.

And so we are led to consider that religion's final proof rests in "spiritual experience"; the truth of Christianity itself is attested in that personal identification with Christ which the greatest exponents of the faith from Paul onwards have illustrated in their lives. "The supreme witness to the truth of the Christian message lies not even in Gospel or Epistle, but it lies in the living characters of the book of our own life, whose secret pages none other than ourselves can read; the evangel is written plain and unmistakable before us in the Christ within." The man who can write thus has indeed attained a vantage point from which questions are to be seen in a true perspective; for him the close examination of early records, and of the doctrines deduced from them, can have no terrors, since his "apologetic" is based upon a present experience, which is entirely unaffected by the readjustment of dates or the reinterpretation of bygone events. "The cause remains the same, the same eternal truths are at stake, but the battle-ground has changed, the weapons of the Christian soldier are different. The tactics of the foe have altered, and have to be met by a new strategy." The work of the Church should be pre-eminently the renewal of the individual life; to this end are (or, rather, should be) all her doctrines and services, and in so far as they do not effect this they are nothing.

And this internal evidence of religion, this direct "contact with Christ," receives confirmation when we look at the story of the Early Church, and at the story of subsequent movements: "whenever in any age or place, in the lives of individuals, or in the experience of the Church, there has been a return to this living fellowship with the Christ present in the heart, there has always been a flood-tide of faith and power."

Again, when it is objected that such a line of argument reduces faith to a mere personal idiosyncrasy, the reply is made that not only every individual, but every religious community, betrays a bias; whether it be Roman or Anglican or Nonconformist, each doctrine or creed points to some peculiar characteristic of its framer. "Such a thing as a faith void of the human element is non-existent." Indeed it is the "human content" of creeds that has, at all times, been their strength; unless they can find an echo in the individual worshipper they are empty and worse than useless. Revelation is progressive, and the Spirit of God guides us now, as ever, into a larger faith. A living unity must never be confounded with a dead uniformity; however great the differences of men and Churches, there is a human experience common to them all, and "the historic continuity of the faith rests, not on the unbroken continuance of any external organisation, but upon the persistence of the type, of the human element, amidst all the changes and variety of external conditions."

Our author has some wise words on "The Essential and the Accidental in the Christian Faith." Even the "doctrines of the Incarnation, of the Atonement, of the Trinity," he finds to be quite other than "the Gospel of Jesus"; they are attempts at interpretation of the reality—not the reality itself. At the same time we ought not to "ignore or hold cheaply the rich treasure of human experience, the revelation of the human heart in the agonising after truth and God which these doctrines and creeds contain." But, in the last resort, we must go into the inner shrine and listen to the "Christ in us"; in religion a "reflected knowledge" is insufficient.

In treating of the relations between knowledge and faith Mr. Millard uses, in his definition of "faith," the following suggestive phrase: "The spiritual interpretation of the facts of the world and human life." In the light of this definition we can distinguish between the outward symbol or expression, and the truth symbolised: "our perception of the truth will always be dependent on its expression in symbol," and hence our faith can be no more than the "interpretation which at any time may be suggested by the facts which at any time we know. The faith of to-day is sufficient for to-day, but probably not sufficient for to-morrow. To-morrow there may be wider knowledge, and that ought to mean a larger faith." Behind all the shifting scenes of our religious experience stands the "reality of God." In the assurance of that great truth (a truth which is attested by evidence of its own "order") we can boldly face the chances and changes of life.

Lastly, in considering the "Christian Life," we ought to estimate this as an internal principle—not as an external rule. "The Christian life is not, in itself, doing anything or believing anything; it is, at root, simply the submission of the self to the influence of Jesus." In words of persuasive directness our author urges us to examine into the test of Christian discipleship, and to see if it is not comprised in the one demand of Christ to "live our life with him." "He does not say: 'Believe in the doctrine of my Deity.' He simply says: 'Believe on me.'" Such is the concluding note, and it is one to which the whole volume has worked up. Believing that we have here no conventional "plea for faith," but the testimony of an experience at once genuine and wide, it has been our aim to furnish readers with such an outline of the book as will suggest something of its value. What may be thought of individual passages in this or that chapter, there can be no two opinions as to the fearless outlook and intense earnestness evinced throughout the entire discussion. It is long since we have read a work so impressive in its depth of religious suggestiveness; and, we would add, though intended primarily for the "average man," such writing can be read, most assuredly, with profit and pleasure by all who (be they learned or not learned, philosophical or not philosophical) yearn after the coming of the Kingdom.

WITHOUT pretension to anything striking or original this volume has a certain significance. It consists of six lectures delivered on a memorial foundation in Harvard University. "In accordance with the large interpretation of the Influence of Jesus by the late Phillips Brooks . . . . it is intended that the scope of the lectures shall be as wide as the highest interests of humanity. With this end in view—the perfection of the spiritual man and the consecration by the spirit of Jesus of every department of human character, thought, and activity—the Lectures may include philosophy, literature, art, poetry, the natural sciences, political economy, sociology, ethics, history both civil and ecclesiastical, as well as theology, and the more direct interests of the religious life. Beyond a sympathy with the purpose of the Lectures, as thus defined, no restriction is placed upon the Lecturer." No "Model Trust Deed" could well be more open than that.

Then it is interesting to note that an Anglican Bishop, selecting as his subject "The Witness to the Influence of Christ," should deliberately exclude from view "all questions which deal with the evidential value of miracles and prophecy, and other similar matters." The argument from silence is notoriously unsafe and wanting in fairness, but it is worthy of notice that the "supernatural" evidence for Christianity, once so exclusively dwelt upon, should yield to the moral and spiritual. In short, there is hardly a word in this volume by a Bishop of the Church of England which would be out of place in any chapel known as Unitarian. The style is rather that of the accomplished master of expansive oratory than of the close thinker, who seeks to give terse expression to his thought. As an illustration, and also as a reply to an unreasonable demand often made, we may quote a passage. "The wish for certitude may be a very noble or a very cowardly wish. It may be noble; indeed, it is noble, if it spring from the passionate desire for truth, if it be the expression of that courageous emulation of spirit which will not be satisfied with any vision less that that of the truth itself. But the wish for certitude is often an unworthy one: it may spring, not from the imperious love of truth, but from the ignoble desire for ease, or from the cowardly wish to escape responsibility, and so to shirk one of God's current ways of discipline. I need not remind you that the unhealthy craving for authority, which in some times and places has been so frequent, is a symptom of this slothful disposition and this discreditable timidity. Such a wish can never be finally satisfied under present conditions; it is difficult to believe that any mind could expect, as things are, to reach a state in which no question could arise without finding a reply, no doubt enter the soul without being promptly dissolved, in which there would be no room for misgiving, no possibility of meeting any perplexing problem; for placed as we are, we are surrounded by mystery, whether we look without us or within. We only know in part, and certitude, therefore, in any absolute or complete sense must be looked for only when we reach that realm where we shall know even as also we are known."

OBITUARY.

REV. IDEN PAYNE.

EARLY on Sunday morning last at his new home, 23, Stafford-road, Sheffield, the Rev. Iden Payne, who only eight weeks before had retired from the ministry at Stannington through increasing years and infirmities, peacefully passed away in the eighty-fourth year of his age. During the last twelve months of his ministry he had often carried on his work under great pain, but it was hoped that a few years of quiet retirement might have been his lot before he passed on. This, however, was not to be. After removal to Sheffield, he began to fail more rapidly, and from last Wednesday week till the time of his death he remained unconscious. He passed away quietly in the presence of his family as the morning of Sunday began.

Our readers may remember that Mr. Payne preached his farewell sermons at Stannington on Sunday, July 30 last, and that on the following Wednesday a large gathering assembled in the chapel to mark their respect and regard by making him a substantial presentation.

Iden Payne was born at Rolvenden, Kent, on January 24, 1822. He was privately educated, chiefly by his uncle, the Rev. Thomas Payne, for whom, when only sixteen, he often read the lessons in the old General Baptist (Unitarian) Chapel in that village, and sometimes read a printed sermon.

In 1842 he took his uncle's place as minister, but five years later was requested by the General Baptist Assembly to reopen and take charge of the old chapel at Deal, which had then been closed for 16 years. He soon drew a good congregation around him, and established a Sunday-school. He remained at Deal till 1860, when he was invited to Northampton. After fourteen years' ministry in that town he removed to Southampton, but stayed only two years. He then went to Congleton, and in 1880 removed to Holbeck, Leeds; and it was during his ministry there that the new church and schools were erected. He was then invited to Stannington, where he settled in 1884 and remained until the end of July this year, a happy pastorate of twenty-one years. He was beloved not only by the members of his congregation but by the whole village, as well as by his brother ministers and many of the laity of the district, and he was always a welcome preacher in any of the churches when he felt himself able to undertake an engagement outside his own parish.

His ministry of 63 years without a break in Unitarian congregations is believed to constitute a record.

At Stannington the news of his death was received with great sorrow. At the evening service at Upper Chapel, Sheffield, last Sunday, the Rev. C. J. Street announced Mr. Payne's decease, to the evident sorrow of the large congregation, and made an affectionate reference to his work and personality.

Mr. Payne leaves a widow, who is also in her eighty-fourth year, three sons, and three daughters; one son and one daughter still living at home. The Rev. William Mellor, of Huddersfield, is his son-in-law. All were present at the funeral, which took place at Stannington on Wednesday afternoon last, the Rev. C. J. Street conducting the service. At Mr. Payne's special request, there were no flowers, but every possible tribute of affection was paid in other ways. The chapel was crowded in every part, the members of the congregation and the villagers being present in great numbers. There were also present at the service the Rev. T. R. Holmes, of Sheffield, the Rev. John Lee, of Loxley (Congregationalists), and Mr. Luther Mallinson, of Stannington (Wesleyan lay preacher). The Vicar sent an apology for absence, as he had a funeral to conduct at the same hour; but his wife was there. The following representatives also attended:—Yorkshire Unitarian Union, the Revs. Charles Hargrove (Leeds), John Ellis (District Missionary), and A. H. Dolphin (Sheffield); Stannington Chapel Trustees, Messrs. Edward Bramley and W. R. Stevenson; Upper Chapel, Sheffield, Messrs. J. R. Wigfull, H. R. Bramley, and Richard Fisher; Upperthorpe Church, Messrs. T. Beaumont and H. D. Leesley; Attercliffe Mission, the Rev. Henry Dawtrey and Mr. Ernest Parker. Mr. Payne's favourite hymn, "Nearer my God, to Thee," was sung during the service; and the "Dead March" in "Saul" was played.

MRS. HARLAND.

THE death of Mrs. Harland, of Far Headingley, Leeds, on the 15th inst., has removed one who was peculiarly endeared to a very large number of friends by her character, which was strong, yet unselfish, tender and genial, united with a very cultured mind and wise judgment. Her zeal and self-devotion, too, exerted a very ennobling influence which will be long cherished by those who were her fellow-workers, especially among the congregations at Monton, Strangeways, and Mill Hill.

Mrs. Harland was born at Salford, October 11, 1830, daughter of Mr. Joseph Pilkington, of Bolton and Manchester, who was a nephew by marriage of the Rev. Thomas Barnes, D.D.—by whom he was educated. This daughter Eliza was baptized by Dr. Barnes' successor at Cross street Chapel, the Rev. J. G. Robberds, who, with his wife were much interested in the girl, and it was largely owing to their influence that she gained the cultivation of character and true refinement of mind, which were such marked features throughout her life. In 1852 she was married to Mr. John Harland, F.S.A., who was a widower with a family of two sons and two daughters. Mr. Harland was on the staff of the Manchester Guardian, but in 1860, owing mainly to failure of health, he retired, and devoted himself to antiquarian studies, in which he was very distinguished; he edited a very valuable edition of "Baines' History of Lancashire," and several volumes for the Chetham Society. Mrs. Harland not only tended her invalid husband with perfect self-devotion, but also shared and helped his literary work. Her relations, too, with his children by his first wife were peculiarly happy. From the first she won their entire confidence, and they and their children have always regarded her friend ship as a most valuable possession. In 1868 Mr. Harland died, leaving her with a young family of five of her own, whose education and welfare received most self-sacrificing care, so that they were all enabled to receive a very thorough training. During the early years of her widowhood, Mrs. Harland and her children attended the Unitarian Free Church, Strangeways, Manchester, of which the Rev. Brooke Herford was then minister. On Mr. Herford's removal to America he was succeeded by the Rev. J. T. Marriott, who subsequently married her eldest daughter, while her second daughter married the eldest son of Mr. Brooke Herford. Her eldest step-daughter had previously married the Rev. T. Elford Poynting, of Monton and the very warm affection and high regard which all these ministers entertained towards her was highly valued and reciprocated. In the work of the Church and the Sunday School Mrs. Harland always took great interest, and a very active share. She was for many years a Sunday School teacher, a district visitor, and member of the Ladies' Congregational Society, and was also on the Committee of the Victoria Lodging House for female strangers, for some years.

In 1892, after the death of the Rev. J. T. Marriott, Mrs. Harland removed to Far Headingley, Leeds, where her daughters established a school for young children. They all attached themselves to Mill Hill, and for some years Mrs. Harland carried on the same zealous work on behalf of her neighbours. But in a few years she became afflicted by a most painful disease, which not only caused great suffering, but made her a chronic invalid. Yet never was any invalid less subject to invalidism. The acute sufferings were borne with most heroic courage, and her unfailing self-control, her cheerfulness, her simple and sincere piety and faith made these years of rare spiritual influence and a true ministry. It was indeed a very real consecration to enjoy the privilege of intercourse with her. After years of suffering she passed away in perfect peace, on Friday, the 15th instant. The remains were interred in the Lawns-wood Cemetery, on the 19th, her minister and friend, the Rev. Charles Hargrove taking the service, which was concluded with Dr. Brooke Herford's Hymn, "Rest in the Lord."

MR. T. A. WYKES.

THE public life of Leicester is the poorer for the death of Mr. T. Atkins Wykes which occurred somewhat suddenly on Sunday week, Sept. 17, in his 65th year, and the congregation of the Great Meeting has lost an old and honoured member. For many years Mr. Wykes acted as honorary organist and choir master, until he was succeeded by his son. To the last he took the warmest interest in the music and the general welfare of the congregation, and was constant in his helpful kindness. As an amateur musician of rare ability he was indeed widely known throughout the country, and the Leicester Philharmonic and other musical societies owed much to him. Mr. Wykes was head of a firm of chartered accountants, and for more than forty years was the trusted secretary of the Infirmary and also of the Chamber of Commerce. The high esteem in which he was held, both on account of his public services and private worth, was testified by the very large and representative attendance at the funeral service on Friday week, which was conducted by the Rev. Henry Gow, both at the Great Meeting and at the grave in the Welford-road Cemetery. In the course of his address in the chapel, Mr. Gow said that there was no such revealer as death; they learnt to see a man more simply and clearly when he was gone. Through sorrow and striving and love, they were led to feel more deeply the beauty and divineness of the soul. He who lay to-day in that place, which was so long his religious home, needed not many words of praise or honour. They brought to him a tribute of respect, friendship, and affection. They remembered his long and faithful service in the various important offices he held, his attention to detail, his uprightness, his cheerful kindliness, and courtesy. They remembered him also as a skilled musician, and as one always ready to give time and energy in the performance of his part in the encouragement of others. There were many who remembered with untold gratitude his unwearied helpfulness and kindness. They remembered him as a friend—how genial, considerate, and kind; they remembered him in his home, his hospitality, his readiness to please and be pleased, his affection and kindness. It was a true and beautiful home life in which he lived, helped by her whom he loved best, and whose loss he never forgot. They must think of him as united once again with her he loved so truly, still working for right and good in the great labour house of God.

At the conclusion Beethoven's Funeral March was played.

Mr. Wykes, who was born February 20, 1841, married a Miss Rowlett, of Leicester, a member of a family connected for five generations with the Great Meeting.

MISS SARAH HIRST.

THE Sunday-school at Stockport has just lost its oldest and most devoted teacher in the person of Miss Hirst. She had been in enfeebled health for the past year or two, and about twelve months ago, to the great regret of herself and all the school, she was quite unable to continue her work as teacher of the adult class of young women, of which she had been the leader for nearly the whole of the 54 years during which she had been connected with the school. About a fortnight ago she was seized with paralysis, and on Tuesday, September 26, she breathed her last at the age of 75.

Miss Hirst was a native of Stockport, and began to teach in the Unitarian Sunday-school on the first Sunday in February, 1850. Two years afterwards she was appointed leader of the adult class of young women, and continued to occupy that post to the end. Never was there a more devoted teacher, or one whose whole life was more completely identified with the school. She was accustomed to make the dresses for the children's plays every Christmas, and was in her element with a crowd of children about her. Everything was left in her hands with perfect confidence, and she spent days and nights alone in the church and school preparing for the various events. During the cotton famine she spent whole nights there making garments for the sufferers. She was a wonder to all who knew her, and very few schools indeed have enjoyed the privilege of having such a useful and devoted worker in their midst for so many years. In addition to being kind, and gentle, and much beloved, she was intelligent beyond the average, and had distinct and strongly marked opinions on nearly every subject. In January, 1897, she was presented with an illuminated address and a purse of gold, in recognition of her long and valuable services, and subsequently she received one of the long-service gold medals presented by the President of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, in recognition of her fifty years' service as a teacher. In October, 1902, family circumstances necessitated her removal to Marple, but this made no difference in her attendance at school. She longed to return to Stockport, and at last did so, but only a few weeks ago—not, as we had hoped, to renew her strength, and resume the work of her beloved class, but only to lay down her burdens and enter her eternal rest. She was highly respected, and much beloved, and the Stockport Unitarian Sunday-school will always hold her memory dear, and feel that it has suffered an irreparable loss.

MISS SLATTER.

THE recent death of Miss Slatter, at Brighton, leaves the circle in which she was known and beloved the poorer by her loss. Debarred of late years by age and suffering from taking an active part in the life of the church or in social movements, her sympathy remained warm with all good works and workers. She withdrew into the ministry of quietude and endurance, yielding for praise, patience, and with a cheerful heart its own good company. The experiences of a long life had left her a child in spirit. She lived on the sunny side of the wood, and knew how to winnow pain with mirth. News of the fields and the country from child or older friend ever gave her delight. Her secluded corner of the world during these last years, just off the main thoroughfare into Brighton, was like a cottage garden beside the noisy high road to any wayfarer who called and rested awhile in her company. Even when sight failed and she had to sit in darkness to break the bread of life, it was with a sweet submission that sent others away chastened and happier. Blessed are the feeble who help the strong.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

HAVE you ever thought of all that the word "home" means to you? You know what it is to be at home, to go home, or to want to go home. Is anything more forlorn than a crying child that wants to go home, and can't find the way, and cannot tell anyone where its home is? Yes, there is something still more forlorn, and that is a child without a home to go to.

Of course, you can each tell where your home is. Can you also say what it is?

Is home the place where you live? Yes. It is that, and it is something more than that.

Is home the house where you live, or what is in the house, or both?

If we move from one house to another and take our furniture and belongings with us, we can by degrees make another house home-like. But if our house were burnt to the ground with everything in it except ourselves, could we make another home? Yes, as long as we ourselves are left as one family. For you will see that it is the people who make home for us more than the place.

If boys or girls are sent away from home to school, or if, when school days are over, they leave home to earn a living elsewhere, home is no longer the place where they themselves live most of their time. It is the place where their parents live, where they go back for holidays, or if they have no work, or if they are in trouble.

Little children take what is given them, and all that is done for them, without thinking about it. Then, as they grow older, they learn how much has been done for them from the first, how the father has worked to earn the place where home is, food and clothing for them all, and much besides. They feel how their mother has cared for them all the time, and how all the love that makes home has come to them from father and mother.

Whoever builds the houses and makes furniture, it is fathers and mothers who make homes. And the children themselves. Can they do anything to help in the home-making?

They may look forward to working and earning by and by; and even now they can help to make home happy and bright, by being happy and bright. Each one can find other ways, too, of helping at home. And being happy to help is part of true home-making, doing little things, not grudgingly, but willingly, gladly.

The spirit of peace and goodwill in the home is like a treasure given to each one to guard with faithful care. Its brightness may be dulled by frequent crossness or quarrelling, or even by thoughtlessness in little things. If you learn to guard this home treasure faithfully, you will wish also to do or say nothing in the outside world that would make you feel ashamed at home, and bring grief there.

In his poem of "Evangeline," Longfellow tells a sad story of the destruction of happy homes a hundred and fifty years ago. Acadia (Nova Scotia) had been first settled by the French, but afterwards it came under English rule. Some of the Acadians did not like to promise to fight, in time of war, for their English rulers against their French friends and neighbours. So the governor received orders to turn them out of their homes and to disperse them amongst the English colonies further south.

The Acadians, who were peaceable folk, had gathered in their harvests in the autumn, and were preparing for a quiet winter, when they were suddenly told what fate awaited them. A few days later, on September 10, men, women and children, nearly two thousand in all, were shipped off to different places. Not only were their homes burnt behind them, but in the confusion families were separated, husbands from wives, and parents from children. Many died from privation, and many were too heart-broken to make new homes elsewhere. Others spent years of homeless wandering in search of their relations and friends. Amongst these were Evangeline and Gabriel, who were to be married and begin a new home together. The lads of the village had built them a house, and filled the barn with hay and the house with food for a year. It was on the betrothal day that the terrible news was announced to the assembled men in the village church. They were kept as prisoners there till they were sent on board ship. Then, in the confusion, Gabriel and his father were separated from each other and from Evangeline.

Put ashore on different parts of the coast, the poor exiles knew not which way to turn in their search for each other. At one time Evangeline heard of a new home built by Gabriel's father in the far south; so she travelled in a boat down the great river, Mississippi, to Louisiana, and arrived just too late. Gabriel had set off westwards to the prairies, and they must have passed one another on the way.

Again and again she found traces of him, near the Rocky Mountains, near Lake Michigan, but always too late. Gabriel could not rest at his father's, and Evangeline had no home to go back to, and so they never met.

At last, after long, sad years spent in patient search, Evangeline gave herself up to gentle care of the homeless. Settling down in the Quaker city of Philadelphia, she tended the poor and sick as a Sister of Mercy.

Then one summer a terrible fever visited the city, and numbers perished, rich and poor alike. The poor, who had neither friends nor attendants, crept away to die in the almshouses, home of the homeless. Thither by night and by day came the Sister of Mercy. The dying looked up in her face and were comforted by her pity and love and hope. And one Sabbath morning, when Evangeline entered the hospital as usual, among the homeless strangers who had been brought in during the night there was an old man, who was very near to death; and with a sudden cry she saw that it was Gabriel, whom she had sought so long in vain. Her cry roused him; and though he could not speak, he knew her again for one happy moment before he died.

So they two met again at last. Gabriel, seeing Evangeline, was comforted at the end of his homeless wanderings; and she also, after all her restless searching, had found peace. They were both at rest now with God, who is our Home.

THE GUILDS UNION.

SIR,—The Council of the National Conference Guilds Union ask the courtesy of your columns in which to make known their aims, and announce their winter plans.

The objects of the Union are (1) To promote the formation of Guilds in connection with the churches on the roll of the National Conference, which shall aim at uniting the young people, together with the various workers of our congregations and schools, into a League of Fellowship to (a) foster the religious life, and (b) inspire personal service. (2) To promote the efficiency of Guilds as factors in religious work and worship by means of a common manual, literature, meetings, conferences, and any other methods which from time to time may be adopted.

In furtherance of these aims, the following members of the Council are willing to address meetings of young people, elder classes in the Sunday-school, or local Unions in the various districts, on the invitation of the minister or committee:—Miss Edith Gittins (Leicester District), Rev. Jos. Wood (Birmingham), Rev. J. J. Wright (Manchester), Rev. J. Ellis (Yorkshire), Rev. A. Hall (East Anglia), and the Rev. F. K. Freeston (S.E. Provincial Assembly).

In continuation of their Prose Essay scheme they have arranged a fourth set of subjects, with rules and conditions for the various classes of competitors. The subjects for 1905-6 are as follows:—

(1) The Life of Jesus Christ. To be told in the writer's own words and based on the first three Gospels.

(2) The Work and Writings of Mazzini. (Text book and references given.)

(3) The ideal Guild.

The Council again recommend the formation of Reading Circles, in order to encourage the practice of regular reading and common study directed definitely upon profitable subjects; and they are, moreover, prepared to furnish a list of suitable works at reasonable prices, some of which have already been used in the Guilds with much advantage.

For the benefit of any smaller Guilds which may have difficulties in filling up all the dates in their syllabus, they are also prepared to lend type-written copies of prose essays, or other papers, which may be read aloud, considered and returned.

By the foregoing, and other means, the Guilds Union earnestly desires to increase amongst the young the happy spirit of true religion, and the dutiful, willing service which is perfect freedom.

It therefore appeals in confidence to all parents, ministers, school superintendents, and teachers and others, who are in sympathy with its aims, to support its high ideal, and so help our young people to feel both in church and school that religion is something very young, real, thoughtful, and joyful.

A circular giving full and detailed information concerning the plans here announced may be had on application from the hon. sec., Rev. Gordon Cooper, B.A., Mansford-street Parsonage, Bethnal Green, London, E., to whom all communications must be addressed.

POET AND PHILOSOPHER.

"I HAVE ventured," says Professor HENRY JONES in the preface to his Essex Hall Lecture,* published this week, "to apply the methods of philosophy to the poets. And if I have been wrong, I can offer no apology, for the wrong is deliberate. It has long seemed to me that the current distinctions between the methods of the philosopher and the poet, and of the scientific and the common consciousness, are less significant than they seem to be, that in the last resort there is only one way of seeking to know what is true and one way of holding it when it is found. This fact has not been overlooked by recent writers on philosophy. But, on the whole, the use they have made of it has been destructive. They have sought to expose the hypothetical and imaginative character of reasoned thought, rather than to bring into view the broad principles that give coherence to our great imaginative literature, and stability and sanity to the ordinary experience of mankind. I have sought in this lecture to put this conception of the ultimate affinity of all forms of human experience to another use, and especially in its reference to the objects of religious faith. I have tried to show that to these, too, belong the cogency that comes from reason. In so far as religious conceptions serve to make the world more intelligible and man's practice more rational, they share the right to convince which belongs to the most secure of all the human sciences. The function of reason in religious life is denied or limited only because its nature is little understood. And we wrong our great poets, even as they wronged themselves, when we treat the truths they bring as if they were but rapt, unreasoned utterances, expressing nothing more than their individual moods."

The lecture, which made so deep an impression when delivered last Whitsuntide, is now published in worthy and attractive form, and is sure to be very widely read and earnestly pondered. "The Immortality of the Soul in the Poems of Tennyson and Browning" is a subject which could not fail to waken the keenest interest, and the remembrance of Professor JONES'S well-known book on "Browning as a Philosopher and Religious Teacher" would give an added zest to the expectation.

The theme is great, and it is treated here by a man whom one feels to be thoroughly alive and profoundly aware of the significance of spiritual things. Here is vivid, stimulating thought, and a strong plea for the reasonableness of life, in which God and the universe are seen to be at one, and to involve for man a destiny and an inheritance far beyond what can be bounded by the fate of any mortal body. "If not Immortality, then something better, if better there can be," are the closing words of the lecture, quoted from Dr. EDWARD CAIRD. But on such an "if," as it appears to us, we need not dwell. Life in the spirit, life after what men call death, abiding life with God, is the real conclusion of the argument, and the conviction in which we may rest, for of anything better we can have no conception. That was the faith in which, undoubtedly, both TENNYSON and BROWNING found their strength and joy, and it is a faith, so Professor JONES argues in this lecture, which rests upon a foundation of the soundest reason.

The lecture reminds us how intensely both poets felt on this subject, and the argument is that the feeling which they so passionately expressed rested, far beyond what either TENNYSON or BROWNING realised, upon the strong conviction of reason, that in human life the things of the spirit are the most real and must be the most abiding, and therefore that for the living soul death is not.

It is true that this whole order of thought rests upon hypothesis, the great "hypothesis of God," and cannot be said to be absolutely proved. But in this respect Professor JONES points out, it is in exactly the same position as the realm of natural science. All knowledge rests upon hypothesis, but it is hypothesis which is being proved all the time. And as in natural science the conception of uniform order and law gives coherence to our knowledge, so in human life the thought of God. There is no other answer to the great questions of life that can compare with this, as bringing order into discord, and satisfying the demands of sound reason. "It remains a hypothesis," says Professor JONES, of the conception of the world as ruled by law, "and will remain a hypothesis to the end of time; but it is a hypothesis surer than any particular fact, for it is a condition of the meaning of every fact. This is why I should call it knowledge. And in the same sense I call that knowledge which our poets call 'faith.'"

"How can we account," he says in another place (p. 34), "for the fact that BROWNING, who had sat so near the heart of humanity and felt the depths of its sorrow and crime and foolishness and frailty, could so consistently throughout his life strike a note so free and full of joy? Who told him that failure is but success in the making, and that shadow implies light? 'His heart,' you will reply. And I agree. But what is 'the heart' in such a context, except the whole rational experience of the man chastened and purified and enlightened by observation up and down the broad order of things and the ways of men, and made wise by such reflection. His faith was, indeed, 'the faith of reason.' It was reason that penetrated through the shows of life to the reality, and recognised, amidst the rubble, the fair proportions of the spiritual edifice that was being built. It was reason that stretched forth its hands and firmly held the principle that gives meaning and sanity and substance to the whole process. And the method which his reason employed is, in the last resort, identical with that which distinguishes between seeming and reality, first appearance and real meaning, in the sciences; and identical, too, with that which establishes more and more securely the broad hypothesis on which we base our common knowledge of common things and our ordinary conduct and ways of life."

The working out of this argument will be found in the lecture to be of the deepest interest, culminating as it does in the great faith of the two poets, the "faith of reason," as expressed in the conclusion of BROWNING'S "Paracelsus," and in "Abt Vogler," in TENNYSON'S "Two Voices," and "In Memoriam." Man, as a spiritual being, and above all through the power of love, stronger than death, implying GOD, who is most of all GOD in His love, and so for man no despair or shadow of death—such is the faith, firmly grounded upon sober reason, for those who see into the deep things of life.

We are grateful to Professor HENRY JONES for the gift of this lecture. This is not the first time that he has touched for us the springs of hope and confidence in the great spiritual truths of life. "Poet and Philosopher" we set down as the heading for this article, but there is another category under which we have been more than once inclined to think of him, and that is, not simply as philosopher interpreting the poets, but as prophet, giving fresh insight into the things of GOD, and strength and courage for nobler life.

DR. BARNARDO.

DR. BARNARDO was a Ragged School teacher in the days when the country had not yet discovered anything better than those very rudimentary institutions for the education of the youth of the country. Most of the Ragged Schools were extremely faulty, and their work of a low order. They sprang up as a first response to the discovery of a perplexing need, and we may appreciate the zeal which founded them while marking their defects. Perhaps we cannot improve on the judgment of Mary Carpenter, that the chief good of the movement lay in the stimulus given "to exertion in the right direction." It is fitting to make this reference to Dr. Barnardo's Ragged School experience for two reasons. Without it we should not easily appreciate the magnitude of his work. So much has been done since he commenced his life-work nearly forty years ago, and so much owes its inspiration to his faith, enthusiasm, and pertinacity. There were no Board Schools then; the workhouses, commonly unfit for any human habitation, were specially harmful in their effects on children. Boarding out was unknown; separate schools, village homes, all the present devices for giving the children a chance were a thing of the future. Dr. Barnardo, of course, was not the first to care for the little ones, not the first even to raise this as a national question. One of his early schemes was the forming of destitute boys into city messengers; and here he had a forerunner in John Macgregor, of Rob Roy canoe fame, who had tried to do exactly this, and had started the familiar Shoe Black Brigade. But Dr. Barnardo did raise the question in a successful manner, and he carried the work of child culture into some new and most promising developments. Whether, then, we regard a noble record of faithful service, or the mere greatness of the undertaking, we do well to pause and ponder over this man's work.

The Ragged School experience is important further, because it led Dr. Barnardo to the discovery of his first "street arab." Into the emotions which followed on that midnight quest, into the secret of the great resolve to which it gave rise, we may not enter. Except, perhaps, to say this. The impelling force was religious—of a type which may, or may not, seem to be the highest. But in this friend of the author of "Jessica's First Prayer" we recognise that consecrating touch which has quickened men to brave all peril, and bear all strain of toil, and was now to impel him along the paths of social service. From the first arab we pass to the Edinburgh Castle, that transformed public-house so inseparably connected with his name, and from which this week the funeral procession appropriately took its start. From Limehouse we pass to Ilford with its prosperous village of little girls—a population of 1,000 taken from the neglect of the streets to be cared for, and fitted for life. This children's village stands out, perhaps, most prominently in the public mind. It is only one of a great many institutions. There is the Babies' Castle, the Convalescent Home at Felixstowe, the Home for Little Boys in Jersey. One provision or another is made for the child from infancy to the verge of manhood or womanhood. We recall, too, the emigration work referred to in last week's note, the thousands of Canadians who owe their life's chance to the work which radiates from Stepney Causeway.

One branch of social amelioration to which men are now slowly turning is the training and care of crippled children. In a few of the large towns of the country something is being done for them. Special schools are open, crippled children's unions are in existence. To name the places where any adequate effort is being made would seem to over-emphasise what is still a too general neglect. In this work Dr. Barnardo was one of the pioneers and one of the chief workers. The Association for Destitute Waif Children of which he has been the leading spirit has been obliged, not unwillingly obliged, to make provision for the children who cannot be sent out to struggle in the labour world. In the various homes and in the Waif's Hospital, there are some 1,300 of these sick and crippled ones.

Dr. Barnado and his work have been the subject of much criticism, some of it unworthy criticism. He has made his mistakes. We might instance the almost unreasoning fear of the Roman Catholic. Errors, also, doubtless, of administration. Some men are too busy to ask always whether by leaving a thing undone, they may not avoid doing it imperfectly. But the fact I have tried to bring out that Dr. Barnardo has so frequently anticipated or followed what are commonly accepted as the right lines is justification for a good deal of impetuosity. And though accurate criticism might be offered it is not necessary to offer it now.

Dr. Barnardo early discovered what it is hard to avoid recognising, the overwhelming importance of environment. Children's lives were being wasted, blighted, vitiated, destroyed, because they were denied the chance of living healthfully. Mind and body were lost. But with changed conditions mind and body became right and good. Was it in Stepney labour home, or Ilford village, or Canadian farm, the story is the same. If any human material is bad, these waifs of the city purlieus were bad. Given the chance, they proved good. Not all. Some were not rescued. Failures there were, but surprisingly few. In part this is the simple outcome of poor human nature. There is quite an incalculable reserve fund of honour and ability in every slum to-day. Power waits to be freed—that is our hope. Still waits in manacles—that is our shame. But this fact does not detract from the worth of the work which has given fair opportunity to so many lives otherwise to be lost. The policy under which boys and girls have gained so much was marked by humaneness. It was flexible, fitting itself to human beings, not asking human beings to constrain themselves to a system. It was a policy, above all, of reaching the deepest and best in the human heart, of surrounding the children with strong, tender helpfulness, and so evoking in return the nobler emotions and affections.

But the thought of this life leads us not alone to the past, nor leaves us in the present, it points also to the future. The specific work Dr. Barnardo did must continue for a time, and beyond question will continue. But for the children of the future? Is this quest of the waif always to continue? Or shall we not round off the work by abolishing the waif altogether? He is a creation of evil conditions, he could not survive in a healthy and holy society.

B. KIRKMAN GRAY.

DAN TE GABRIEL ROSSETTI.
III.

THAT Rossetti began his artistic career in pursuance of a lofty ideal is evidenced by a romance he wrote in his youth, entitled "Hand and Soul," which is generally held to be autobiographical. It relates an episode in the life of a young painter who has been lured from the pursuit of art by the seductions of city life. Out of this lethargy he is awakened by the desire to achieve great fame, and he nerves himself so strenuously to his task as to reach the goal of his ambition.

When won, however, he realises that there is a deeper hunger in his soul which fame leaves unsatisfied, that if he has achieved success it is because his aim was low, and his ideals are housed under mean roofs. Out of this dissatisfaction grows a new aspiration after a higher purpose than mere worship of beauty and the applause of men, an aim no nearer earth than to devote his art to the presentment of some moral greatness that should influence every beholder.

One day there is a popular mêlée in the streets, and in this bloody affray the frescoes with which the painter had adorned a certain porch abutting on the street, intended to represent Peace in an allegory, are bespattered by the blood of the combatants. So little reverence for beauty his designs had produced. The practical failure of his art-mission filled him with sad thoughts; but, as he sat sadly musing, a light breaks upon his vision, revealing a form of marvellous beauty, who calls herself the image of his own soul. She tells him that, though he has failed, nevertheless, because he has not followed ignoble ends, like wealth or ease, he should cherish stout hope.

He is to work, expecting no reward, even in the shape of success; he is to offer his labours as a humble service.

The value of this essay lies not so much in the beautiful periods, the chaste diction, marvellous descriptions set forth in admirable language—an astonishing production for a lad of twenty—but in the revelation of the ideal which Rossetti evidently set before him, the principles upon which his life-work was to be established.

That he did not always remember that ideal goes without saying. But the main source of defection was the contortion his nature received in sustaining the great sorrow of his life.

Caught in the Rose-Mesh.

The artist met a very beautiful girl with those peculiar features, destined in days to come to furnish a type of Rossettian female loveliness, and fell deeply and utterly in love with her. The faintness which his hero in the romance of "Hand and Soul" felt in sunsets and at the sight of stately persons, the "yearning like one who gazes upon a path of stars," became more than ever his own actual personal experience, when the sweet and stately face of Miss Siddal woke within him dreams of beauty out of depths hitherto unplumbed. He not only painted and immortalised her in many a picture, but he discovered her unknown gifts in drawing and colouring, which were somewhat too intensely quickened by his artistic ardour and his loving adoration. Ruskin, who was intimate with both, and played the part of a liberal patron at this time, remarked with pleasure that Rossetti's drawing was at its best when he drew the beloved queen of his heart.

Love and Death.

Lack of means and the bride's delicate health prolonged the engagement for ten years, and their married life was brief, but two years, too soon ended by the tragic death of his wife. Rossetti came home late one night to find her dead, through an overdose of a sleeping draught.

Then, indeed, the light seemed to have gone out of Rossetti's life, and in the remorse with which self-reproachful memory gnaws the heart, he placed in her coffin his MS. book of lyrics and poems, that then appeared to have absorbed the care that should have been devoted to the living wife.

An Angel of Memory.

A year after her death, he ventured again to unlock the casket that held the image so closely associated with his great sorrow, and from memory of the dead, painted the Beata Beatrix. It gives special interest to the religious teacher in that it conveys the artist's message concerning death. We are back in Florence on a sunny morn in June, 1290, the ninth day and the ninth hour, and it is the time of the passing of Beatrice. She is sitting on a balcony, whence the streets and orchards, and the bridge over the Arno is seen. The figure leans slightly forward, and though the eyes are closed, the half-open lips and the raised face suggest the wonder of an inner vision, which is both promise of liberation and a call to peace. The yellow poppy borne in the beak of a crimson dove is a symbol of that sleep through whose gates Beatrice is to pass to wake in a world of ineffable ecstasy. It is that trance of death, in which the body falls like a dismantled ruin, but the dweller is suddenly rapt from earth to heaven. It is love's messenger that brings the token of death.

Already a haze is blotting out the earthly scene, passing along which Dante is startled to see the Angel of Love beckoning to him, with sad visage; yea, indeed, for him the news is sad. His lady is gone up, her new birth's begun, and Love's presence is left below to mourn with him.

"Beatrice is gone up into high heaven, the kingdom where the angels are at peace; and lives with them; and to her friends is dead."

The Fragrance of Crushed Violets.

To her friends alone is Beatrice dead; for already the face of the dying is suffused with a beatitude and a peace which is but a foretaste of the fuller life for which her perfect gentleness has fitted her. Many have regarded this as Rossetti's finest picture. The colouring receives especial mention, for the tints of the plum-coloured sleeves, the green robe, the hair of burnished gold harmonise with the rest in a noble symphony. Rossetti himself said that no picture ever cost him so much pain in painting, but none ever gave him sense of greater mastery in art. Against the might of his sorrow, against his despair, he has here wrought in obedience to "Love, and man's unconquerable mind," his faith in the deathlessness of the spirit, the indestructibility of life.

To readers of the INQUIRER it will afford a grateful reflection that the possession of this picture by the nation is due to the generous Unitarian philanthropist who built and dowered the Tate Gallery. The large canvas depicting Dante's Dream, that adorns the walls of the Walker Gallery in Liverpool, is held by some to be Rossetti's masterpiece, and it is of this that Sir Noel Paton's opinion was expressed that fifty years hence it would be named among the half-dozen supreme pictures of the world.

Both subjects are taken from the Vita Nuova, but the substance out of which they were wrought was taken from the painter's own heart, as Olive Schreiner sets it forth in her parable of the "Artist's Secret."

An Oak growing in a Delicate Vase.

The Beata Beatrix illustrates a characteristic method of its creator. In early pictures like Found and the Laboratory, he had expressed moments of intense dramatic purport chiefly in the faces of the dramatis personæ, but also by aid of accessory. In the progress of his art, he strove to concentrate this dramatic intensity of emotion in the face alone. Thus it has been said of Proserpine, that by sheer force of facial expression, a woman is made to render lofty tragedy as fully as though the canvas had been crowded with figures. Rossetti strained his material in this aim at intensity to the last anguish, both in his poems and in his pictures. If he failed, his failure was as much due to the limitations of his art as of himself.

To strain the face in order to reveal abnormal tragedies or heaven's ineffable rapture, is to attempt to overstep the bounds of matter. The soul can feel more than its material vehicle can ever express.

"Can there not be in the universe (asks Sir Oliver Lodge) a multitude of things which matter as we know it is incompetent to express? Is it not the complaint of every genius that his material is intractable, that it is difficult to coerce matter as he knows it into the service of mind as he is conscious of it, and that his conceptions transcend his powers of expression?". (Hibbert Journal, January, 1905.)

Does the Veil hide or express the Face?

To some extent Rossetti was driven to his pursuit of an impossible execution by his theory concerning the inter-relationship of soul and body. It is summed up in his lines as to the type of beauty in which he believed:—

"Whose speech Truth knows not from her thought, Nor Love her body from her soul."

To Rossetti the body was sacred as a vehicle of an unseen essence, a beautiful form was sacrosanct for its beauty. Rossetti's expressed abhorrence for copying the nude is confirmed by the testimony of a model who sat for Burne Jones and Rossetti of their treatment of her. "I never saw such men; it was being in a new world to be with them. They were different from any one else I ever saw. And I was a holy thing to them—I was a holy thing to them."—(Memorial of Burne Jones.)

Yet Rossetti, by writing poetry, as a painter, by charging his lines with the pictorial sensuousness of colour and form, laid himself open to a charge of voluptuousness, of which he is not quite guiltless. Buchanan retracted the charges made in his attack on Rossetti as exponent of the fleshly school of poetry. None but a saint indeed can be trusted to render what Rossetti strove to render; and, in spite of his robustness and humour, there was an absence of stoic asceticism and a presence of a tendency towards neurotic morbidity that disqualified him from dealing immaculately with the medium through which human passion and emotion express themselves artistically.

Nature the Consoler, forsworn.

Rossetti led a rather unnatural life, especially in his later years. He was city-born and bred; he had no deep love of Nature; he took no exercise; in his conflict with insomnia he became a victim to a drug; he rather cultivated his grief than submitted to its chastening; so his fancy became shadowed and gave a tinge of deep melancholy to his later creations. We miss in them the joyousness of the creator of beautiful images.

His fate is that of a haunted man, haunted by a face, out of which he wove all his dreams, in which his ardour looked to quench his soul's insatiable thirst for beauty. But no physical form can hold so much. In a world of change, the chief purpose of beauty in form would seem to be its testimony to the deeper beauty which that form conceals as much as reveals. Rossetti, as it were, tried to capture in immortal bonds of sense the suprasensuous reality. But the soul's hunger cannot be allayed by any outward shape, however fair.

Therefore his achievements, instead of being an arch wherethrough gleam flashes from that untravelled world, whose margin fades for ever as he moved, became a portal through which he saw the gaunt figure of fate mocking with disillusion his most ardent strivings.

"Throughout the whole of his painting and throughout the whole of his poetry," maintains Mr. Harry Quilter, "there runs one dominant idea, and only one—Love baffled by Death. Speaking broadly, this is the beginning and end of his philosophy."

Not Failure, but Low Aim is Crime.

This is largely true; but, except in his later years, it is only true of Rossetti as of all those who "dwell with Beauty—Beauty that must die, and Joy whose hand is ever at his lips, bidding adieu"—that they must strive, and fail, in order to wage a higher strife. It is the malady of the ideal, the pain of all who dream large dreams and make effort to reach the unattainable. Yet through such pain are all men taught, in one lesson or other, to discriminate between the things that are seen, which are but for a time, and the things that are not seen, which are eternal, and, through the exhaustion of illusion, to find the way of life and the Peace that endureth.

"AGAINST THE WAR SPIRIT."

SIR,—Mr. Page Hopps, answering Mr. Howse, does not attempt to deny that in the case put he would have been thankful for the casual assistance of a well-armed friend, but he objects to such pre-arranged assistance as would be involved in "going in company with a bully for protection when I take a walk on the Thames side." May I be permitted to point out to our friend that this is precisely what he and all of us do every day of our lives, only that the "bully" whom we employ for the purpose happens to be called a policeman, and that we hire the service of him and his like conjointly instead of separately. The present peacefulness of the Thames side which enables him to dispense with a revolver when walking there, has been brought about by the very same method of careful and sufficient provision against disorder which he deprecates in its application to international security. When, and not until, we have an international police under the orders of a "federation of the world," will the disbandment of armaments be a measure conducive to peace. Till then, the problem for the true statesman is how to contrive that in each dispute as it arises the big battalions shall be on the side of God. It is not "against the war spirit"—if by that is meant the spirit of readiness to fight in a good cause—but against the spirit of national and personal selfishness, of indifference to the right or wrong of our national policy, that sermons are needed. To ask whether one is for or against the war spirit, is like asking whether one is for or against the use of the knife in surgery; the only practical question is whether we can trust the judgment and humanity of the man who holds the knife.

Personally, I do not believe in either conscription for adults, or universal training for boys as methods of securing military efficiency; but that has nothing to do with the question of principle.

R. K. WILSON.

Sept. 26, 1905.

SIR,—The discussion on the question, "Does preparation for war conduce to peace?" which has been going on for some time in the INQUIRER, has made me ask—Can so general a question be answered with a bare No or Yes?

Clearly, preparation for war does not conduce to peace under certain circumstances—among such circumstances being the existence of an aggressive spirit in the preparing people or government, the dominance of a military caste, a proud and extreme sensitiveness in a neighbouring people.

But, on the other hand, is there not an analogy between an individual citizen and a nation, as regards the need of security and the steps they must take to ensure it? If it is necessary or prudent to provide the doors of our homes with locks and bolts, our places of business with strong rooms and safes, and our highways with police, must it always be best for a nation to pursue the opposite policy, and to abstain from defensive measures indiscriminately, and without regard to circumstances? For example, is the training of volunteers, unconditionally objectionable as provocative of wars? This, surely, is a reductio ad absurdum. Reason and history give one and the same answer.

The peace movement can progress only in proportion as we modify the conditions which provoke war or make it easy; and secure and lasting peace will come only when the whole of those conditions shall cease to be. True, large professional military forces form usually (though not necessarily) one of those conditions. But is it not useless to discuss the increase of such forces by itself and in the abstract? The only effect of such discussion appears to be persistently opposite opinions from persons who are probably equally peace-loving, and a little waste of heat!

THE OPEN BROTHERHOOD.

SIR,—Truly, in July last, I read, with all the interest and attention that anything which the Rev. Mr. Spedding writes or says always commands, the report of his Address on his suggestion of a "Van Mission," in furtherance of his desire to stimulate the action of—excuse me for saying—his "Body," and in conjoint effort to extend "our Unitarianism" amongst a larger company of hearers.

But, as I read the report, I felt as large or a larger disappointment, in that so manifest a desire to stimulate the Christian effort of his purpose should have been presented (as it seemed to me) in language, not so much of impassioned zeal for the Good Message, much less of a self-lost evangelical urgency,—as of a certain exaggerated, self-conscious, presuming self-regard and self-satisfaction on the part of his Party, of his Church, and, I must say it, of his Unitarian Sect.

Indeed, it seemed as if I heard again the cry of John, who forbade some one because "he followed not with them," and the Master's kind confidence in their faithful energy;—and felt moved (with other counsel beside my own) to offer our comment upon the address, namely, in my letter of the 12th of August, to the details of which I need not refer.

On the 19th I found my serious remonstrance had only excited what I may perhaps be excused from describing as controversy, somewhat too ecclesiastical in character; lending itself too readily to hasty or isolated quotation, and consequent misrepresentation, amongst which I do not care at this distance of time now to entangle myself; nor indeed is it fair for me to assume offence which, if there be any, is also, I must allow, innocently avowed by many friends, and innocently dismissed.

I have been travelling abroad, and did not receive THE INQUIRER until just lately, and will not now return on the lines of verbal or personal misapprehension,—much of which may, after all, be due to my own inexperience in writing on these great concerns.

I will, however, ask leave to state another view of the Christian teaching and Christian effort (as some of us apprehend them) than that of the WE's and OUR's, of which we certainly hear a great deal too much.

In the first place, none of us ever think of scandalising any "Unitarian" for that name. Any such personal attack is absolutely out of the question. We do deplore and mean to protest and to fight against the Scandal (as it appears to us) of the Unitarianismatic disease now so prevalent, and against its organisation, and its flattering aspiration to prove its dogmatic Name, Position, and Segregation.

Nor can we be seduced to such practice by the curious device of reviving a duly honoured distinction of purely theological definition—the "Unitarianism" of the early last century, and its descendant—and of endeavouring to perpetuate the name to make it easier to rake in less independent thinkers—taking as it has been pointed out—and practised at Rome (under the cunning veil of the most unchristian organisation in the world)—a statue of Jupiter, and offering it to the people as Saint Peter, to the woeful confusion in a great many persons' minds between the Killing Letter and the Life-giving Spirit. But indeed we do want to hear (as Jesus himself said) not the words of the speaker but the words of the Father that has sent him!

We do want a genuine humility, a more faithful word than that of the WE's and OUR's who shout around.

We want to pass by the Images of Christian Faith, Hope, and Love which are put forward by "Unitarianism," and to leave behind any so-called "Unitarian" Church in order directly to worship Our Father in His own temple not made with hands, and there and outside continually to love and follow our Lord, and love and live and speak as He did. A "Unitarian" "Church" is, to my mind, quite another thing than the Meeting House or Chapel in which our pious ancestors loved to meet for "the worship of God" in certain Faith, in assured Hope, and in Christian Love.

There is no comparison between "Unitarian Churches" and the Freedom and Openness of meek Brotherhood, spending itself, body and soul, in pouring out to any and every neighbour day and night and everywhere, on every opportunity he can find or make, the very personal faith, hope, and love in which our Master spent himself. It is the same that has kept alive amongst men and women and children to this day His own Personal Christianity of self-forgetting Life and Love, underneath and in spite of all the claims and the controversies and the malice and persecutions of Orthodoxies, of Priests, of Theologians, and Talkee-Talkers, who continually falsely claim and profess an exclusive loyalty, which is not Christian, nor Religious—in the face of a Divine Catholicity such as neither Rome, nor Canterbury, nor—Essex-street, in any true sense, comprehend.

We well know, from much and minute experience, how simple and faithful is the devotion of Spirit to Spirit in the Ministry of the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, amongst unaffected self-forgetting Roman or Anglican men or women, priests or people, Friends, Independents, or Methodists. We profoundly respect and admire the personal dedication of all (and especially the personal dedication and outpouring of the true soldiers of the Salvation Army), and I now again, for my company of Brothers and Sisters, deliberately repeat our entreaty to every neighbour and friend, and every one of their Associations and Conferences, and every Minister and every one of all to cast aside, once for all, all doctrinal array and its flags and drums and cutlasses and baggage wagons, and humbly and perseveringly to seek the strait gate and the narrow way of personal dedication that "leadeth unto life." Let us all strive and live from day to day a new life in a real Holy Communion in Christian perseverance and goodness, self-lost in the Kingdom of God within us, in the meekest recognition of His eternal power and glory.—For some of Open Brotherhood, R. D. DARBISHIRE.

CAMBRIDGE SERVICES.

SIR,—May I call the attention of readers of THE INQUIRER to the fact that the Unitarian services at Cambridge will recommence on Sunday, October 15. As there is a great difficulty in making known the existence of these services, and our congregation must necessarily be a variable one, we depend largely on the arrival of new members at the commencement of each year. It will, therefore, much assist the committee if all those Unitarians who are entering the University this October will communicate with the secretary as soon as possible after the beginning of Term.

L. B. BOOTH, Hon. Sec.

Christ's College, Cambridge.

WHAT is the end and essence of life? It is to expand all our faculties and affections. It is to grow, to gain by exercise new energy, new intellect, new love. It is to hope, to strive, to bring out what is within us, to press towards what is above us. In other words, it is to be Free. Slavery is thus at war with the true life of human nature. Undoubtedly there is a power in the soul which the loss of freedom cannot always subdue. There have been men doomed to perpetual bondage who have still thought and felt nobly, looked up to God with trust, and learned by experience that even bondage, like all other evils, may be made the occasion of high virtue. But these are exceptions.—Channing.

THIS simple openness of mind and heart—this trusting, responsive, receptive attitude of the unspoiled child—holds in itself the secret of scholarship, the highest philosophy, and the wisdom of the angels. There is no other door into the kingdom, no other way into the spiritual order. It is the ground principle of honesty, of moral and intellectual rectitude, to let every fact of the world impress us at its full value, as it is also the part of self-respect and self-justice to meet all realities as if we ourselves were as real as any of them. At the heart's core of it all is a deep instinctive faith in the universal order and the Power which is above all, through all, and in all. To submit our whole being to that Power in fearless, childlike confidence, at every stage of our history, is to be continuously transformed and renewed, re-created and born again. —Charles G. Ames.

LIFE—MORE ABUNDANTLY.*

BY THE LATE H. A. R. JOY.

IF religion is mainly an attempt to answer the question how may our consciousness of sin be reconciled with our belief in immortality, the religious significance of Jesus must consist in the light which he threw upon this problem. What then was the answer of Jesus?

To appreciate this we must clearly comprehend the conditions of thought which prevailed at the time of his birth.

Briefly it was a condition of universal scepticism modified here and there by some outburst of unreasoning fanaticism, which at least served to keep alive the memory that religion had once been an emotional reality, and a feeble hope that it might yet prove so again. A cold and barren legality, professing a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof. Ephraim lost in the outer darkness of the gentile world; Judah in proud but powerless servitude to the hated tyranny of a heathen overlordship. And this as punishment for rebellion against a jealous God, who had turned from them in anger and revenge. And what was there left to hope for? Some few there were who yet cherished an unfailing faith in a future consolation of Israel. Of the rest, too many soon wearied of the vanity of abstract ideals, and plunged in cynical conplaisancy into such business and pleasures as life admitted of; ever conscious of a vanished glory that had left them without hope and without God in an inexplicable world. Some few debarred from any prospect of a restoration of the temporal glories of Mount Sion, began to picture to themselves new hopes of the fulfilment in another order of the aspirations doomed to disappointment in this. And yet at every point this dawning hope was baffled by the memory of sin, so that it was only those whose consciousness of consistent right-doing seemed to themselves to constitute a claim upon God's clemency, who could look beyond the grave with any confidence in a happier future, and say to the godless tyrant whose sin seemed justified by success: "It is good, being put to death by men to look for hope from God to be raised up again by Him; as for thee, thou shalt have no resurrection to life."

But surely then, as now, it was they who loved God most who were conscious most of wrong within. So that confidence in the favour of God remained only with the self-righteous, who in the strength of his aristocratic prerogative was content to regard the mass of his fellows as a people who knowing not the law are cursed.

For the rest, if they had any remaining conviction of God's concern for them, it seldom got beyond the despondent deprecation of a punishment that was becoming greater than they could bear, in some such prayer as "God be merciful to me a sinner!"

Such, then, were the characteristics of the religious thought in the midst of which the life of Jesus came to manhood. A general scepticism, tending in one direction to a cultured formalism, in the other to an acquiescent indifference.

That God existed, and was still the God of Israel, had never been denied; nor yet that every Jew still owed him homage and obedience. But it had become the reluctant obedience of a slave who knows his master's power, and respects it for prudential reasons; not in much hope of gain, but at least in determination to merit no further loss.

When Jesus looked out on such a world, and knew in his heart (by the penetrative insight of a pure soul that has held itself aloof from the degrading fiction of a popular theology, and learnt to read the character of God in all that is best and highest in himself and his fellow men) how far the God his people had pictured to their terror differed from the God he himself had learnt to love; he saw as he could not but see, what a revolution was involved in the conception he felt himself destined to proclaim. What wonder if his thought took shape in the familiar forms of his national religion, and that his mission should commence with a public identification of himself with the grand national hope that centred round Isaiah's portraiture of the coming servant of Jehovah, when in the synagogue of his boyhood's home he took the roll of the prophet Isaiah and read:—

> The spirit of the Lord is upon me
> Because He anointed me to preach good tidings to the poor:
> He hath sent me to proclaim release to the captives,
> And recovering of sight to the blind,
> To set at liberty them that are bruised,
> To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord.

Others might judge God by the presence of the evil they are familiar with. Not so He. Evil, indeed, is not difficult to think of in association with evil livers and evil lives; but how to account for the good that is everywhere conspicuous in it? Here surely is the finger of God. And so he rises to the triumphant challenge: "If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly father give good gifts unto them that ask Him." Not for a moment is he oblivious of the evil; the consciousness of it weighs on his spirit like a darkness that may be felt, yet does he ever see through it the gleam of a light beyond, and this light he communicates to all who have eyes to see in rich variety of parable and illustration. No sowing, but some seed must fall on rocks; and yet the harvest is not frustrated.

No crop but there are tares among it; yet the tares, though in it, are not of it.

And so when he turns from evil in the mass to the contemplation of evil in its relation with the individual soul, his experience of human life has taught him that though sin may and does condition every normal human activity, it has no essential relation to such activity, while in a thousand and one ways that careless observation misses man is ever rising superior to the seductions of temptations that would lure him from a toilsome duty. And whence this sense of duty, this impelling force of goodness, this co-ordination of wisdom and righteousness, but of God?

Yes, sin there is in man, but there is also goodness, and this goodness explains him as the sin cannot. For the more of sin in a life the lower, the less worthy of man the life is seen to be; but the more of goodness the truer, the stronger, the more worthy of man it becomes. Is not then the sinless life man's norm and ideal? And do we not think of God as sinless? And so the cry: "Be ye therefore perfect, as your Father which is in heaven is perfect."

Man then, is a son of God, that is to say, in accordance with Hebrew usage of the term, he is partaker in God's own qualities. That being so, immortality belongs to him by right of sonship; and sin, being accidental and temporal, cannot avail to destroy a right which is inherent and essential. And here the parables of the prodigal son, the lost sheep, the lost piece of silver, the grain of mustard seed, and others explain again on human analogy how man, though conscious of his sin may yet aspire in confidence to share the life of God. I grant you the anthropomorphism of the imagery does not satisfy our sense of the Divine, but this does not one whit invalidate the force of the conviction which it represents, viz., that no human life is so far from God that it cannot turn at will and find him.

It is in the will of man that Jesus recognises his determinating factor. And the beginning of a life that is not merely the living death of conformity to the present age is by subordination of that will to Him whose commandments direct in the way of life; or, as Jesus expresses it: "Except a man be born again he cannot see the Kingdom of God."

While in a whole-hearted readiness to conform to the will of God lies the guarantee of a progressive understanding of that will—"whoso willeth to do His will shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God." But how to win the homage of man's wayward will? Was it not exemplified every day? A mother's patient love controls a passionate child. A father's discipline advances the best interests of his household.

And Jesus, knowing his own heart, how it burned day and night in compassionate love for the teeming multitudes whose every sorrow was felt as but another claim upon his sympathy and relief—how could he be conscious of this character in himself and not ask, as others have asked since,

> Derives it not from what we have
> The likest God within the soul?

So that he was able to say to his disciples out of the depth of his own spiritual experience: "I say not that I will pray the Father for you; for the Father himself loveth you."

As also he was able to point inquirers to his own life of self-sacrificing devotion to the welfare of others as an illustration—as a revelation—of the character of God Himself and say, "If ye knew me ye would have known my Father also."

But he did more than this.

Many who had drifted through life in that aimless way which characterises persons whose every day is a separate entity of existence, lacking any great co-ordinating purpose which all the days should intelligently subserve, ranking each in turn as so many completed steps in a ladder of progressive attainment, began to understand that life was more than a constant demand to provide for its comfort and prolongation; and that thought might take intelligent part in wider interests than those which centralise in a man's own personality. For Jesus brought within the grasp of ordinary comprehension the idea that every individual man had part and lot in the life and interests of humanity at large; and that it was by the categories of this wider sphere that the only true life of man could be defined and regulated. Not self-aggression in the petty interests of one; but self-subordination in the universal interests of the many in a sense of sympathetic fellowship that flowed from a consciousness of equal claim upon the affection of a common Father, became henceforth the slowly recognised ideal of daily action. For the children of this world ambition might continue to be regulated by such questions as "Shall I succeed?" "Shall I make money?" "Shall I obtain position?" "Shall I triumph over my competitors?" But for a citizen of the Kingdom of Heaven the criterion must be, can I succeed without injury to another? Can I make money without compromising my integrity? Can I better my social status consistently with justice to my neighbour? And what new worth accrued from the sense of citizenship in such a kingdom? None so mean in the circumstances of his physical existence but that he might live in the conscious dignity of personal relation to a God who noted every movement of his thought, and deemed not slight any service done in the interests of a fellow being.

Surely a personality that broke free from the cramping restrictions of egotism to find itself a responsible agent in the working out of the destinies of the human race at large, called upon to train and subordinate every faculty in the reasonable service of a God who was controlling all things for the common good of man, must have realised a sense of re-creation and new birth that is not more than adequately described in the phrase of the evangelist when he writes, "To as many as received him to them gave he power to become the sons of God." "I am come," said Jesus, "that ye may have life; that ye may have it more abundantly."

Alienated from the life of God. Such is the condition of the children of this world.

But a conscious part in a boundless scheme of infinite good—what is it but to share in the life of God Himself; what is it but to step out of time into eternity; what but, in the phrase of Jesus, to become a son of the kingdom; or in that of St. Paul a fellow-worker together with God?

To understand the purpose of God and intelligently co-operate with Him in giving it effect; so to identify yourself with His will that nothing displeasing to Him could give you pleasure; so to realise His love for men as to interpret it to them in your every act; is not this a life worth living though you may be conscious of being in all respects what the world accounts a "failure"?

You will observe that Jesus does not place eternal life in a beyond that is only to be entered upon after death. Eternal life in his teaching is

> Theirs who live
> Above our finite hopes and fears,
> And from eternal thoughts derive
> The purpose of their mortal years!

St. John, who perhaps more than any other of the disciples entered into sympathetic comprehension of his master's thought, has it thus: "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren. He that abideth in love, abideth in God, and God abideth in him."

This, then, is the answer of Jesus to the question: "How may sinful man make good his claim to immortality?"

Man's immortality is assured by virtue of participation in the nature of God.

The nature of man is essentially good; and the sin which distorts it will be forgiven on repentance.

God's attitude towards man is not of despotic tyranny, but of parental love.

And what, you ask me, of that great doctrine of redemption, which we seem to trace in progressive development from the first chapter of the Bible to the last; nay, which seems to link all the great religions of the world to the cross of Christ as their explanation and fulfilment by the various but universal witness to a common human sense of need?

If I seem to slight the doctrine of the redemption, it is only because I am jealous for the honour of Jesus Christ, in place of whose personality, which is in itself a revelation of God, it has become too customary to substitute a systematised series of his special acts, which can only be rightly estimated in their due relation to his whole life and character. Otherwise, so far am I from denying that the death of Jesus was redemptive in effect that I go further and claim that his life was so also.

Nay, further yet, I claim that the life of every true man is in its degree an act of redemption; that your life and mine ought to be so; if it is not it is missing its ideal. So long as we live in a world where evil is so largely blended with the good there is a redemptive work for every man on every plane. What is the work of all the trades and professions but a redemption of humanity from physical, social, political, or moral evil?

But, though we are thus all, inevitably, and from the very constitution of life co-operating under God in the redemption of the world—except, of course, so far as we refuse to take our shares in life's obvious duties and responsibilities—there are some few whose personality and circumstances combine to single them out to some special vocation of redemptive enterprise. And such are the powers of evil that they are able to make the life of such a man but one long martyrdom to the convictions which animate his action, whether or not a martyrdom, which is sealed by death, is merely a question of his own character and the circumstances of the time. Such a death is not to be estimated apart from the life it terminated; the principle which nerves to the death is the principle which has animated the life, viz., that of submission to the will of God in the path of duty. With what emphasis this speaks to us in the words of Jesus in Gethsemane: "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; yet not as I will, but as thou wilt."

And this is a spirit which may animate us each and all, and give a richness of meaning to the thought of Jesus as our great exampler which cannot consist with a conception of his life and death which puts it out of all relation with normal manhood.

But for the rest, what need to preach to us a scheme for the rescue of men from a divine tyrant who exists only in man's own imagination? And what the meaning of the plan of restitution to a condition from which we have no reason to believe he ever fell?

The sin of which we are conscious does not lose for us its character, because we come to regard it not as the result or cause of a fall from a higher state; but as the imperfection of a nature that is still only progressing towards the realisation of its ideal. Not a piece of good land run to waste; but a piece of waste land half-reclaimed.

Nor, I think, are we justified in assuming any hard and fast boundary between the physical, intellectual, and moral planes: rather do we hopefully await the man who shall teach us (as Emerson somewhere has it), how we may unite in one conception the law of gravitation and the law of love.

But meanwhile, such terms as "sin" and "forgiveness" may be used in a sense that remains true for our consciousness.

There must have been a time in the course of the evolution of man's nature when the capacity for the discernment of the things of the spirit first appeared; and in whomsoever it first appeared, it constituted him a new type. Say if you like, with Gulick, that Jesus is the first representative of this new type. Whether the first or not absolutely, he is certainly the first for any appreciable effect upon the after development of the race.

We cannot appreciate a character with which we have no affinity. And it was due to the intense spirituality of the nature of Jesus that he was able to recognise the lesser degrees of it in his fellow-men, and to argue, with self-knowledge and observation of the world and life, that the God who had planted love and goodness in the human heart, and had so constituted man's nature that he is more or less of a true man in proportion to his loyalty to his spiritual instincts could only Himself be goodness and love and spirit.

Thus a speculative ideal of manhood being formed in the thought of Jesus, he formulated in his teaching the practical ideal, best calculated to realise the speculative in actual life. Of this practical ideal the leading features have been already discussed.

It is particularly noteworthy that this new interpretation of life carries with it a new, or at least a newly emphasised interpretation of motive. Men are no longer to be thought of as dumb driven cattle, hedged in with legal restraints, urged forward by legal penalties. For the notion of law compelling from the outside we get the notion of a spiritual principle controlling from within; and men who are put in intelligent apprehension of the designs of God are called upon to fulfil the object of their existence in order to co-operate with the tendency of those designs. It is no longer, "Ye shall keep all these statutes, I am the Lord," but "Son, go work in my vineyard." Hence such degree of individual freedom of action becomes legitimate as does not trespass upon the right to an equal freedom on the part of another. And the self-subordination of private interests to the interests of the whole becomes a social duty on the part of each.

It is useful to a right appreciation of the influence of Jesus to compare the Christian with the Mahometan development of Judaism.

Mahomet did not attain as Jesus did to a spiritual conception of religion; and the difference in his teaching between the heavenly and the earthly is consequently not qualitative but quantitative. His heaven is but the best of earth on a larger scale. A place where men sixty feet high live amongst a profusion of luxuries proportionate to their presumably increased aptitude for the desire and enjoyment of them.

Unconsciously, it is true, many Christians indulge a notion of celestial bliss that is not less sensuous in character, though, perhaps, less coarse in its sensuousness than the Mahometan. And there are words attributed to Jesus that may be quoted in support of such a view; but, whether Jesus ever spoke the words or not, it is certain that they do not exhaust his thought of heaven, which has at least an element in it that must remain inexplicable by the categories of the sensuous; and in virtue thereof the Christian religion is incomparably nobler than the Mahometan. Buddhism, it is true, recognises a distinction between the spiritual and the material; but only to condemn matter as the negation of spirit. In the thought of Jesus no such antithesis perplexes; matter is for him not the negation but the organ of spirit; far, indeed, from a perfect organ, but intrinsically capable of becoming perfect.

Thus we see that Jesus holds the key to the problem that Gotama and Mahomet tried by opposite methods to solve: the one by ignoring spirit, the other by denying matter. Whereas Jesus acknowledges both and indicates the normal relationship.

There is a richness of meaning in the claim of Jesus to be the way, the truth, and the life, that we are slow to apprehend. Not the way merely, as Buddhism claims to be; not the truth mainly, as Mahometanism calls itself; but the life also, that which gives consistent purpose to all action; to truth a present interest, and to the thought of progress an idea of unity.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Bolton District Sunday School Union.—On Saturday evening, September 20, Mr. A. J. Waldegrave (author of "A Teacher's Handbook of Moral Lessons"), representing the Moral Instruction League, gave a Specimen Moral Lesson, followed by a short lecture on Moral Instruction methods, at a Conference held at Unity Church. There was a large attendance. The discussion, which was well maintained, turned on the problem of how to get the method of the lesson followed in existing Sunday Schools. The example of the Moral Instruction League teachers may be of real service in rousing an ambition to give better lessons among Sunday School teachers generally.

Carlisle (Induction and Welcome).—A service for the induction of the Rev. Albert Thornhill as minister of the Viaduct Unitarian Christian Church was held on Monday evening. Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, who had also conducted the services on Sunday, gave the charge to the minister, who had been one of his students at Oxford, and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie gave the charge to the congregation. The Revs. Charles Travers and W. H. Lambelle, former ministers of the congregation, also took part in the service. At the conclusion of the service a public meeting of recognition and welcome was held. The Earl of Carlisle, who was also present at the service, took the chair, and gave an address, which is fully reported in Tuesday's Carlisle Journal. This we hope to reproduce next week. Mr. Ridley, secretary of the church, Mr. H. Edmondson, on behalf of the Sunday-school, and the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, representing the Northumberland and Durham District Association, joined in the welcome, which Mr. Thornhill acknowledged in an earnest speech. He felt sure, he said, that they would not lay his shortcomings down to any want of desire to serve what he conceived to be the highest interests of the Church, and to be faithful to his own ideal of the Christian ministry. Whilst expressing his thankfulness for the presence of Dr. Drummond, the Earl of Carlisle, and others who had spoken, he said that if in his ministry the words of the Gospels should cease to be mere texts upon which doctrines had been built and become living words spoken by a son of man to sons of men; if the Epistles of the Apostle Paul coming to them from the spirit of a man filled with zeal for the welfare of the pagan people of the West should cease to be mere texts upon which crumbling dogmas had been built, that fact would be due in a superlative degree to the contact that he had had for three years with Dr. Drummond. The Rev. C. Travers, who seconded the vote of thanks to the speakers, said that he was sure Mr. Thornhill would find what he had found during the eleven years of their struggle together that he would have in the congregation willing co-operators, ready friends, earnest sympathisers, and strong supporters. Lord Carlisle and Dr. Drummond spoke in reply. Dr. Drummond said that Mr. Thornhill had been a most earnest and faithful student at college. He felt sure that his whole heart was in his ministry, and that he would take up the work in Carlisle with the same steadfastness to duty by which he had won their affection at Oxford. He expressed regret that Mrs. Thornhill had not been well enough to be present at the proceedings that night. The proceedings terminated with the Benediction.

Colne.—Special Mission Services were held on Sunday, when the Rev. James Harwood, of London, representing the B. and F. U. A., preached to good congregations. On Monday evening Mr. Harwood gave a most interesting and instructive lecture on his "Visit to India." The Rev. J. Evans presided, and there was a good attendance of members and friends. A hearty vote of thanks was unanimously accorded, and the members of the congregation were grateful to Mr. Harwood and the Association for his visit.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The Annual Aggregate Service was held at Walthamstow on Sunday afternoon, September 24, conducted by the Rev. W. H. Rose, who took as the subject of his address the Beginning of Nonconformity in England. About 130 scholars and teachers were present.

Harvest Festivals.—The following further harvest thanksgiving services are reported:—Chester (Rev. H. E. Haycock), collections for Infirmary and Parkgate Convalescent Home; Dover (Rev. S. Burrows); Knutsford (Rev. G. A. Payne), with Sunday-school anniversary; Long Sutton (Mr. W. J. Pond), followed by a successful Tuesday evening meeting; Manchester: Longsight (Rev. H. J. Rossington), afternoon musical service; at the evening service, Spohr's cantata, "God, Thou art great."

Ilkeston (Welcome Meeting).—A meeting to welcome the Rev. W. H. Burgess to the work at Ilkeston was held on September 16 in the High-street Chapel, presided over by Mr. Thomas Shaw. The Revs. J. M. Lloyd Thomas and E. S. Lang Buckland were present, together with Messrs. G. Bryan and Dixon Lee, members of the local Lay Preachers' Union. On Sunday last services of thanksgiving for the harvest were held.

Liverpool: Hope Street.—A meeting of the Guild was held on Wednesday evening, Sept. 20, in the Church Hall, to inaugurate the winter's work. A brief devotional service was conducted by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, after which the secretaries of the various congregational societies reported on their aims and plans of work for the coming season. The object of the Guild is to co-ordinate and strenghten the efforts of the various societies, and to enlist further help on their behalf. The Guild last autumn carried out the organising of the People's Services at the Institute. Its special undertaking this winter will be to establish a social problem circle for the study of such problems with a view to some definite practical work in Liverpool. On Wednesday evening, Sept. 27, the annual soirée of the congregation was held in the Church Hall. Mr. W. B. Bowring, chairman of the congregation presided, and an address was given by the Rev. H. D. Roberts on the past and future work of the church.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—The annual Devotional service at the beginning of the session was held in Hope-street Church Hall on Tuesday evening, conducted by the Rev. H. D. Roberts. The address was given by the Rev. R. P. Farley, of St. Helens, the district minister. On the Thursday evenings of October and November 2 and 9, the Rev. J. Collins Odgers will conduct a central class for Biblical instruction at the Mill-street Mission. The class is freely open not only to teachers, but to elder scholars and others. The early chapters of the Gospel according to St. Luke will be the subject. Printed syllabuses of twelve lessons have been prepared, two of which are to be dealt with at each meeting.

Manchester: Pendleton.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday, Sept. 24, the preacher morning and evening being the Rev. J. J. Wright, of Atherton; in the afternoon a service was held in the school-room, when an address was given by Mrs. J. E. Manning. Special music was rendered by the scholars and the choir at each of the services, which were well attended.

Manchester Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual meeting and soirée were held in the Lower Mosley-street Schools on Saturday, Sept. 23. After tea the business meeting was held, the rest of the evening being given up to music and conversation. The report and balance-sheet were read and adopted, and an appropriate address was given by the Rev. W. Holmshaw, the retiring President. The meeting passed a resolution recording its sense of the valuable services rendered to the Union by the Rev. C. Roper during his long connection with it, and expressing its regret at his leaving the district, and good wishes for the future. There were about 80 persons present, and the meeting was the most successful held for some years. The officers were re-elected.

Portsmouth: High Street.—Mr. Delta Evans, editor of the Christian Life, preaching last Sunday, took for his subject, "Jesus and the Common People." There were many problems, he said, awaiting solution to-day which did not trouble the people in the time of Jesus. If the Master were with us to-day how would he treat the housing of the masses problem and the unemployed problem? What would he think of the slums of our large towns and cities? If there was one fact that stood out more prominently than others in the simple life-story of the Master that fact was surely that he was a practical man, and had come from among the people. No wonder, therefore, that the common people heard him gladly, for his mission was pre-eminently to the masses; being one of the people, he knew all about their struggles, and was able to sympathise with them and help them. There lay the secret of his marvellous influence over the crowds. In conclusion, the preacher appealed to his hearers to accept Christ as their leader, Master, and friend, and to strive to live in his spirit.

ONE foot of ground from utter annihilation, I sat on the precipice this morning. Feet got unsteady, head dizzy, to look below, on that depth of three or four thousand feet; yet how the bird-notes, gay or tender, or sad, came from above and beneath, now the virgin winds crept and cooled my brow, the hidden waters called to rest. What mysterious wealth of many hued verdure! There is terror and joy in the heart to look about. This is awe! I behold, and worship and tremble. Lord, take not away from me the privilege of this glorious worship so long as life lasts.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR columns this week bear witness to the beginning in good earnest of the new season's work in our churches. Amid these reports we ask the special attention of our readers to the account of "Liberal Christianity in a Scottish Parish," which we have received from a correspondent, and cordially welcome not only for its own sake, but for the light it may throw on our own ideal of religious life and fellowship. We doubt, however, whether these Liberal Scottish preachers would feel able to accept even the most cordial invitation to preach in one of our free pulpits, or whether they could open their pulpits to one of our men. On our side there certainly would be no difficulty.

OF coming events we note the annual meeting of the North Midland Association at Mansfield, on Tuesday, when the Rev. W. J. Jupp, of Croydon, is to preach; and the seventeenth annual meeting of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South Eastern Counties at Unity Church, Islington, on Thursday, October 19. The Rev. Henry Gow, of Hampstead, is to be the preacher. The President, Mr. W. Wallace Bruce, will be in the chair at the business meeting.

THE report of the Sunday-school Centenary celebration at Bury reminds us that another of our Sunday-schools is also to celebrate its centenary this month. The High Pavement Sunday-school at Nottingham has done a notable work, and many precious memories attach to its history. The celebration will extend from Friday, October 20, to Monday, the 23rd.

PROFESSOR B. NATH SEN, of Calcutta, who sailed from Liverpool to New York by the White Star s.s. Celtic, gave an address on Wednesday evening, September 20, to the company in the saloon, numbering about 150. India was his subject, and he spoke eloquently of its people, their history, and religion. The address was much appreciated.

WE bid farewell this week to probably the last of our American visitors of the summer, the Rev. C. E. St. John, secretary of the American Unitarian Association, and Mrs. St. John. They were to sail for home on Friday.

SOME notes of the Church Congress held at Weymouth this week, and of the Baptist Union meeting at Northampton, we must reserve for next week.

THE remaining copies of the "Memorial of the late William M. Ainsworth, being a selection of the Sermons, Prayers and Letters of Travel; edited with a Memoir by James Harwood, B.A. (1891)," having been presented by Mr. David Ainsworth to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, we are requested to say that any minister whose name is in the Essex Hall Year Book, who does not already possess the Memorial volume, will receive a copy on forwarding sixpence for postage to the Book Room at Essex Hall.

IT is with good reason that we are accustomed to put a high estimate on experience; to give heed to men who have it; and expect from them counsels rich in wisdom. But experience, in any high and comprehensive sense, is the rarest, as it is the choicest of human qualities. More must go to make it than we are apt to suppose; not habit and opportunity alone, which can only give a narrow dexterity of hand or mind; but some breadth of faculty to seize relations, and depth of conscience to read life truly, and quickness of affection to sympathise with it largely; and a cultivated reverence of mind to know its own ignorance, and find the way to others' wisdom.—James Martineau.

TO CORRESPONDENTS. — Letters, &c., received from A. O. A., W. A., I. C. B., J. A. B., J. G. D., J. W. D., E. G., W. S. H., C. C. L., W. R. M., P. P., C. R., C. S., J. J. S., L. S., O. A. S., A. W.

ABERDEEN MEMORIAL STONE-LAYING.

THE memorial stone of the new Unitarian church in Skene-street, Aberdeen, was laid on Saturday afternoon, September 30, by Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P. The lower half of the building is practically complete, the church being built over a schoolroom, and the ceremony took place on a temporary floor on the upper story, where a platform had also been erected. In spite of cold and showery weather, there was a large attendance.

The Rev. Alexander Webster, minister of the church, presided, and was supported by Sir John Brunner, Mr. C. F. Pearson, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; the Rev. R. B. Drummond, of Edinburgh; and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. The other M'Quaker trustees present, in addition to the President and Secretary, were the Rev. J. Harwood, Mr. Ion Pritchard, and Mr. Percy Preston. Among the representatives were the Revs. H. Williamson and Dr. G. K. Wood (Dundee), Rev. J. Forrest and Dr. Barlow (Glasgow), the Revs. E. T. Russell and W. Wilson, and Messrs. J. G. Davidson and D. Strachan, of the Scottish Unitarian Association.

Mr. Webster, after the opening hymn, read the Scripture lesson, and Mr. Drummond offered the prayer of dedication. A silver trowel and granite mallet were presented by Mrs. Shepherd, one of the oldest members of the congregation, and a daughter of one of the founders of the church. Various papers and other documents were placed beneath the stone.

Sir JOHN BRUNNER having declared the stone well and truly laid, delivered a short address, in the course of which he said that he was very heartily pleased to be associated with the work of that day, and he congratulated them—and he might say he congratulated all the citizens of Aberdeen—upon the change in the circumstances of the foundation of the first Unitarian church in Aberdeen. The stone of the first church was laid in 1840—not so very long ago—and yet, as he was told, the pioneers of Unitarianism in Aberdeen were stoned in the streets that day, and here the congregation was now met together with the respect of all their neighbours. He could not say that many more in Aberdeen were openly professing the principles of the Unitarian religion, but this he did say, that they had all broadened and softened in their feelings towards them by a distance that was like a gulf as compared with 65 years ago. Might he not congratulate the Unitarian body and Aberdeen upon the change? He remembered with great respect two men who had assisted in that change—Professor Robertson Smith, an Aberdonian, and George MacDonald, the novelist, poet, and preacher, who had only a few days ago gone from them. Yes; Scottish theology had broadened and softened, and these two men had done much to perpetuate the spirit of charity amongst the people. In the hope that that building might be the centre of many an incitement to the spirit of charity, he had laid that stone, and in that hope, most fervently held, he congratulated them, and thanked them for the honour they had done him in inviting him to be present that day.

Mr. C. F. Pearson said that, as President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, it gave him much pleasure to assist in laying that stone. Although they, as Unitarians, were of necessity known by that distinctive name, that ought not to imply a sect, or any closing in of the horizon, either for the present or the future. He trusted that many years of good work, success, and happiness lay before their Aberdeen friends.

After the singing of "Forward, 'tis a time of vision," the benediction was pronounced by Mr. Bowie, and this portion of the proceedings terminated.

Commemoration Meeting.

A public meeting was afterwards held in the Union Hall, close by, where the congregation is at present worshipping, until the completion of their new church.

The Rev. Alexander Webster again presided, and reported a number of apologies for absence, including one from the Rev. W. S. Smith, of Antrim, the only surviving minister of the old church in George-street. He congratulated the architect and builder on the expedition with which the work was proceeding, and proposed a hearty vote of thanks to Sir John Brunner and the other friends who had assisted at the stone-laying. From what they had already seen, he was sure they would admit that the building would take rank amongst the very best structures in Aberdeen, and would be worthy of their solidly progressive city, now the third in Scotland in respect of population. He had received expressions of sympathy from friends in Caithness, Ross, and Inverness. Several of the friends from Inverness he was pleased to see present. By those very warm expressions, he was reminded that their church was not for Aberdeen only, but was the church for the north, and they would have to stand as a sort of sentinel with face to the north, and, he hoped, not so much in the future with their hands to the south. The kind of church to which he believed the understanding and the emotion of Scotsmen and Scotswomen were working up was an ideal Free Church, without the trammels of dogma or the meshes of ceremony—a church representing the very fullest knowledge and the very purest aspirations, inspiring all its members with an enthusiasm for the highest, and such a church, he trusted theirs would be in common with the other churches in Scotland—he wished they were more numerous—of the Unitarian connection. Then he was reminded that their church had a very special function, and a very special message. While other churches were hampered by creeds and traditions, the Unitarian Church had always stood for freedom of investigation and development. Without boasting, he might say of the Unitarian churches that they had been as pioneers pointing the way to God—

"That God, which ever lives and loves,
One God, one law, one element,
And one far-off divine event,
To which the whole creation moves."

That message came before them in a very special manner at the present day, and they should realise their responsibility in connection with it, and therefore desired a fitting place in the new church for its presentation. They did not wish to be separated from other sects, but wished simply to have a place fitted for the declaration of their own message, for they had a message of liberty, rationality, and, above all, of spirituality to proclaim.

Sir John T. Brunner, in reply, said that since he had seen Mr. Webster amongst his own people, he was not surprised at the respect in which he was held, and the influence he had in the city of Aberdeen. To such a man he was always ready to hold out the hand of fellowship and friendship, and to wish him God-speed in his work. Sir John then referred to the bad character he had received from a Parliamentary candidate in that city, some eighteen years ago, and proceeded to tell of the steps which had led to the establishment of an eight-hours day amongst the workmen in his employment, adding that none of his colleagues in the management of the business would think for a moment of reverting to the twelve hours' day. Mr. Webster had laid before them that day an ideal of the work of the church, but he did not think the statement had been altogether complete. There was a work for the church in reconciling all classes. There was a work for the church in the pressure to be brought to bear on employer and employed alike, to do their duty by one another. Such a church as that which reconciled and softened the asperities of the difference between class and class, was, he believed, the church presided over by Mr. Webster. It was no wonder then, that, feeling as he did so strongly about those matters, he was always, not only willing, but eager and anxious to help men who were engaged in this work of the Christian churches. He hoped that the congregation and the new building might long be associated together; and that the church, minister, and congegation might long flourish was what he wished with all his heart.

Mr. C. F. Pearson said that in his official capacity, and also as an individual, he was very pleased to have the opportunity of coming there. He thought a gathering such as they had there that day did much good, a gathering of those who believed as they did, and had the same purpose at heart—namely, pure religion, and the progress of that religion in freedom. He wished the new church and congregation every happiness and success in the future.

Mr. Ion Pritchard spoke to the sentiment, "Civil and Religious Liberty; may its influence extend and become richly effective throughout the world!" If they had now equal opportunity before the law, there remained, he said, the power of society, and they had still to resist the tyranny of boycott. They wanted toleration and goodwill.

The Rev. H. Williamson responded, and said it was most important that when they got liberty, they should know how to use it.

Rev. James Harwood proposed "Prosperity to the Unitarian movement in Scotland, and especially to its procedure in Aberdeen." He said there were two ways in which they might have a Unitarian movement in Scotland. One was general progress in religious thought, and he thought anyone acquainted with the current of present-day opinion would allow that religious thought was very largely tinged with Unitarian influence. There might be at the present time in their University some young student who in the days to come would fill the place in literature which was occupied by the writer who recently passed away, George MacDonald; but if he came to write stories dealing with the problems at present in his mind, they would be of a different character from "Robert Falconer," or "David Elginbrod." They had left all that behind, and left it behind because the religious thought of the present day was so largely pervaded by what they understood as the Unitarian phase of thought. If, however, they came to the Unitarian movement in the organised form of churches, then they felt that there was still a great deal left to be desired, and it was the especial business of the Association to which several of them belonged to do what they could in carrying out the principles committed to their keeping years ago, to promote the Unitarian movement in Scotland. He wished they could rejoice over greater success than had been achieved; but sometimes it was said that the darkest hour was the one immediately before the dawn, and so, as they had been laying that memorial stone in the new church in Aberdeen, they hoped it might be the signal of a much more rapid movement than had taken place in recent years. He recalled some memories of the church in Aberdeen, of the fifteen hours' coach journey in December, which George Harris made from Glasgow to be present at its establishment, and of the late John Warren, his friend and theirs, from whom he had heard much of Aberdeen long before he had seen their city. The reason why they wished such churches to become more numerous was that wherever a Unitarian church was planted it stood as a witness not only for liberty of thought, but for the union of liberty of religious thought with devotion to a religious life. It was extremely important that they should not consider that Unitarianism consisted in running after every new thing. While keeping their minds open for scientific and religious truth, they had to combine with that the religious life and the cultivation of the religious spirit and the spirit of worship. Unless a church made its influence felt on the lives of those who belonged to it, it failed in one of the most essential elements of its being. He thought that if the word Unitarian stood for anything it stood for character, and for religiousness of life, and he maintained that the more they were able to strengthen their Unitarian churches the more they would contribute to the religious life of the community. That had been a memorable day for Aberdeen, and those of them who had been visitors would remember it. They would look forward with great interest to the opening of the large work which the congregation would be able to accomplish in their new building. They had great good fortune in having a minister who was a live minister, who was wide in his interests, and certainly was conscious of having a message to deliver to the world. Perhaps there never was a time when the world was more ready to hear a man who had a religious message than to-day. He looked to the future with great hope, and trusted that in Aberdeen they would be such an example that the other Unitarian churches in Scotland would be encouraged to go forward and prosper as they did.

Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE said he had no fear whatever of the future of the Unitarian movement in Scotland. They planted no fixed barriers beyond which the thought and love of man were not allowed to go. Their movement was a free movement—free and progressive. He had little doubt that the ministers who preached in the first church, now no longer in existence, preached with a slightly different accent on many questions, compared with the minister of to-day, and yet each generation of Unitarians remained true to the great principle not only of freedom but of character in religion. They had insisted again and again that the mind of man must be left free to think his truest thought, and not only to think it, but to express it frankly and fearlessly, caring not for creed or priest, or church, but caring only that his own mind should be free, and that the God of truth when He looked into it, should know that he was speaking the truth and living it. He had no fear of the future of the Unitarian movement while it meant freedom, truth, character, and fellowship in religion. He left Aberdeen just when the Robertson-Smith trial was more or less in progress, and he was sure that to-day the great mass of religious sentiment in the United Free Church would not dream of such a thing. There had been great progress in all directions, in the way of making men feel that so long as they were true to their own highest principles and thinking, so long as they tried to put into their daily lives the best that was in them, they were serving the cause of religion, and were children of the Most High. It was with special delight that he was there that day, for he owed personally a very great deal to the Unitarian church of Aberdeen. He remembered as a lad walking up and down past the door of the old church in George-street, wondering if he would go in and if he was not committing a sin against God, as he certainly was committing a grievous offence against his own relatives and friends, in setting foot within that church door. He managed to summon up courage at last, and he entered and continued to go there until he went to college in England. His experience of Unitarianism as a great liberating, sanctifying influence had been the experience of many men and women all over the world That religious community which had the power of freeing the mind from error, and yet not leaving it empty of religion, was the church that the world needed to-day. The old creeds were crumbling in the dust, the living forces of thought were shattering them, and it would be impossible to gather up the fragments and piece them together. The problem which confronted them to-day was whether they could succeed in putting in the place of the old creeds and dogmas a living religion, a religion that would keep the mind alert to the truth, and would keep the heart pure and simple, and the life noble and reverent and useful. That, as he understood it, was the supreme work and mission of the Unitarian movement—to preserve all that was true and good in the preaching of the past, to gather in all that was worthy and noble in the living present, and to keep their hearts and minds open for any larger revelation of God's truth. He congratulated Aberdeen on its civic progress, the stability of its character, and the citizens who could produce such things, and he hoped the people of Aberdeen would welcome the new church they were building, not only as another ornament to the city's architecture, but as a living witness for truth and righteousness.

Mr. T. M. SPIBY gave as the next sentiment—"May the generosity of the donors to the building fund of the new church prove an enrichment to their hearts, and a boon to the cause of religious progress." The Rev. E. T. RUSSELL seconded, and Mr. PERCY PRESTON, in responding, said it was only carrying out the wish of the M'Quaker Trust that they should help those who helped themselves. The Benediction brought the proceedings to a close.

Towards the cost of the new church, including £1,350 for the site, over £5,100 has been already raised, of which £2,000 was from the sale of the old church, and £750 from the M'Quaker Trustees, who have also promised another £250. A further £1,000 or £1,200 will be needed.

THE minister should not yield himself to romantic aspirations; for disappointment may dject him. Let him not expect to break in a moment chains of habit which years have riveted, or to bring back to immediate intimacy with God souls which have wandered long and far from Him. This is romance; but there is something to be dreaded by the minister more than this—I mean that frigid tameness of mind, too common in Christian teachers, which confounds the actual and the possible; which cannot burst the shackles of custom; which never kindles at the thought of great improvements of human nature; which is satisfied if religion receive an outward respect, and never dreams of enthroning it in men's souls; which looks on the strongholds of sin with despair; which utters by rote the solemn and magnificent language of the Gospel, without expecting it to "work mightily;" which sees in the ministry a part of the mechanism of society, a useful guardian of public order, but never suspects the powers with which it is armed by Christianity.—Channing

LITERATURE.

PROFESSOR HERFORD ON BROWNING.

No one who has read "The Age of Wordsworth" can fail to turn with eager expectation to any account of the continuation of modern thought by the same author. And those who take up the present work* will not be disappointed. Naturally, it is far from being a sequel to "The Age of Wordsworth." There is, indeed, a chapter towards the close in which the intellectual affinity of Browning with the elements of that Age is discussed, and for some reasons one would like to see this chapter introduced at an earlier stage in the work—just as one would like to see the whole of Part II. interspersed among the more personal or biographical notices of the poet's work. As the chapter stands, however, it witnesses to Professor Herford's just appreciation of his task. Browning was not, except in order of time, the sequel of Wordsworth, and it is not of the time but of Browning that Mr. Herford undertakes to write. The result is that we have one of those delightful books—part biography, part criticism—that light up the poet's work with the fire of his life, and quicken us into something at least of a participation of what is manifest in both.

Moreover, the task of tracing Browning's affinities with his own Age—and therefore with the Past—requires a different medium than that afforded by a series addressed mainly ad populum. On the one hand, those affinities were extremely subtle, and, on the other, it is quite possible to appreciate the poet without a knowledge of them. This is more than can be said of any of his contemporaries or of the generation that preceded him. Shelley is unintelligible without his context in history; Byron obviously more so. Arnold, Tennyson, Clough—each in different ways—send us back to history, the superficial history of events and policies and controversies. In Professor Herford's pages there is no history—or next to none. The reason is plain. Browning himself, superficially speaking, has scarcely any historical context. At first sight this is amazing in a man whose powerful and versatile intellect assimilated almost everything that came in his way. It is true that his song bears witness to the struggle of Italy and the passion of France, that his "St. John" seems to have companied with Strauss, and that some catch in "Christmas Eve" an echo of the Tractarian Controversy. These, however, are very meagre evidences of historical milieu, considering what the contemporary history was. Where was Browning in the great Revolutionary decade? Or in the still greater Evolutionary one? And yet, where is the poet who fits so unmistakably into his time? Who had a "message" at once so needful for it, and characteristic of it? The key to this seeming paradox lies in the fact that Browning's poetry was the offspring, not of stirring events or broad phases of thought and feeling, but of obscure yet no less formative tendencies. The theme, e.g., which he was never weary of touching, and which is as characteristic as anything in his "message," that of the success of failure, what is it but an expression of the growing recognition of the intrinsic worth of the individual, which, together with the kindred principle of relativity, forms one of the strongest undercurrents of nineteenth century thought? Never before—save once and in one only—did this tendency obtain, and therefore it is as impossible to imagine the burthen of "Abt Vogler" being voiced by any poet of a preceding age, as it is impossible to connect it with any superficial trait of the nineteenth century. Though apparently "dwelling apart," Browning was as much the child of his age—only in a quite different way—as Tennyson or Arnold.

The assimilation of elements so subtle that they must have entered his consciousness by an unformulated byeway, gives us the clue to the dominant note in Browning's verses. His interests were more purely intellectual than any other poet of his time. Was this a limitation? In some ways, undoubtedly. At any rate, it accounts for the limitations which his latest exponent freely admits. One of these is his rejection of the supernatural, in the literary sense of the word:—

"Himself the most ardent believer in the supernatural among all the great poets of his time, the supernatural, as such, has hardly any explicit place in his poetry. To the eternal beauty of myth and folk-lore—dream-palaces 'never built at all, and therefore built for ever'—all that province of the poetic realm which in the memorable partition of 1797 Coleridge had taken for his own, splendidly emulated by Shelley and by Keats, Browning the Platonist maintained on the whole the attitude of the utilitarian man of facts. 'Fairy-poetry,' he agreed with Elizabeth Barrett in 1845–46, was 'impossible in the days of steam.' With a faith in a transcendent divine world as assured as Dante's or Milton's, he did not aspire to pass the 'flaming bounds of Space or Time' or 'to possess the sun and stars.' No reader of 'Gerard de Lairesse' at one end of his career, or of the vision of 'Paracelsus' at the other, or of 'Childe Roland' in the middle, can mistake the capacity; but habit is more trustworthy than an occasional tour de force, and Browning's imagination worked freely only when it bodied forth a life in accord with the waking experience of his own day."

"The waking experience of his own day"—not the time so much as the method—all was subdued to the psychologist's method. In Tennyson and Goethe the world of faerie—as one would prefer to style the supernatural in this context—becomes a medium for thought which otherwise must have "broke through language and escaped." It hampered Browning. Paracelsus had to go without his attendant spirit and magic sword. Mephistopheles and Excalibur were "thick films" to Browning. He swept all this aside and looked straight into the heart's working. The method was purely intellectual.

The same "note" naturally explains Browning's failure as a dramatist and success as the dramatic exponent of human nature. The spirit of reflection predominates unduly over the spirit of action. The chapter on the Dramas is one of the most discriminating and luminous in Professor Herford's discriminating work.

But the intellectual predominance had a yet deeper influence on the poet, and one which it is not a little disappointing to find undealt with in this volume. It accounts for the place Love holds in the poet's work.

In all Browning's poetry—materially so after 1845—Love is the dominant theme. He is par excellence the poet of Love, in all the intricate windings of that river of life. In his own soul, however, it is abundantly evident that Love and Faith held equal place, and what had become of Browning's Love without his Faith is better left unthought. His "sureness" of God and personal survival of death was as fundamental as was his conviction that > life with all it yields of joy or woe

> Is just our chance of the prize of learning love.

Yet, unclouded as was Browning's spiritual vision, he never achieved for Faith anything like what he did for Love. And the reason is that Faith is a thing of action, a hazzard, a venture; it requires imaginative treatment, it is fully revealed only in the great crises of every day. Whereas Love, while, of course, demanding scene and movement for its passion, calls into play for its exposition the reflective powers of the casuist and psychologist. To learn the lesson of faith it is necessary to go to Galahad and Merlin, to the Red Cross Knight, to the "great allegory"—things which are all action. To learn the lesson of Love we track the labyrinthine mazes of motive and circumstance as Browning invariably treads it. And what is the result—on the reader of Browning? It should be a conviction of his incompleteness even at his highest—incompleteness as a critic of life. "Life" is not "just our chance of the prize of learning love." Does not the poet, out of the very instinctiveness of his own faith, lose sight of it as an essential for life? The question is asked not in the interest of any one of the numerous "faiths," nor merely in that of Faith itself, but from a logical sense of the incompleteness of even Love without it. Certainly, Love presupposes faith in the individual loved, in the race loved; but, suppose the fortunes of the individual or of the race alike throw doubt on a Universal Love, where is love then? Out of the deeper experiences of life the question comes, not as an idle problem, but as an evidence of the longing in the human heart for a sure ground of its affections, a ground that can survive the shocks of time, founded on the unyielding rock.

Very beautiful is Professor Herford's story of the wedded life of the two poets which forms the summit, so to speak, of his story.

"Their intercourse disturbed no conviction on either side, for their convictions were identical. But her intense personal devoutness undoubtedly quickened what was personal in his belief, drew it into an atmosphere of keener and more emotional consciousness, and in particular gave to that 'revelation of God in Christ' which they both regarded as what was 'most beautiful in the Christian doctrine'—a more vital hold upon his intellectual and imaginative life."

The "revelation of God in Christ" naturally excites our interest as to the poet's real attitude towards the stupendous subject of the Man of Nazareth, and we read a little further on:—

"The idea of Christ as the sign and symbol of the love which penetrates the universe lost none of its hold upon his imagination; and it inspired some of the greatest achievements of the Men and Women."

And again:—

"In one supreme, crucial example the union of God with man in consummate love had actually, according to Christian belief, taken place, and Browning probably uttered his own faith when he made St. John declare that

> The acknowledgment of God in Christ
> Acknowledged by thy reason solves for thee
> All questions in the earth and out of it.

To this important passage is appended a note: "These lines, however 'dramatic,' mark with precision the extent, and the limits, of Browning's Christian faith. The evidence of his writings altogether confirms Mrs. Orr's express statement that Christ was for him, from first to last, 'a manifestation of divine love,' by human form accessible to human love; but not the Redeemer of the orthodox creed."

Something very far from justice has been done Professor Herford's book by this scanty notice. The admirable brevity and insight of the notes on the individual poems, the pages dealing with Browning's relation to art and music, the suggestive difference between the effect upon him of Italian painting and Italian music—these, and several other features, can only be referred to. They are none the less earnestly commended to the increasing circle of students. T. J. Hardy.

SHORT NOTICES.

We have received from Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton the first part of a fine art publication, Bethlehem to Olivet. Pictures by Modern Painters from the Life of Christ. The text by J. R. Miller, author of "The Silent Times" series. Edited by W. Shaw Sparrow. To be completed in six parts, published fortnightly. The size of the page is about 15 in. by 12 in., and the actual prints, which are mounted on brown paper, measure 12 in. by 8 in., or somewhat smaller, in various shapes. Five pictures are reproduced is this first part, Burne-Jones' "Star of Bethlehem," representing the Adoration of the Magi, being one. The other four are quite modern in conception as well as date, three being of the French school and the last, "Jesus Christ as a Child," by Jef Leempoels, of the Belgian school. The first picture is "The Arrival of the Shepherds," by Henry Lerolle. Dagnan-Bouveret's "Mary and the Child Jesus" shows a beautiful mother's face. The letter-press is quite orthodox in its conception of the Gospel narrative; but it need not trouble those who are glad to have the pictures. There are to be thirty pictures in the complete work, including Holman Hunt's "The Shadow of Death" and "The Light of the World," Madox Brown's "Christ Washing Peter's Feet,"[2] and Munkacsy's "Christ before Pilate." The German school will be represented by Uhde, Hofmann and others. (Hodder & Stoughton. 1s. net, each part.)

Driven, by Margaret Watson, is, we believe, a substantially true story of peasant life in Oxfordshire in the "hungry forties." It is a tale of poverty and oppression and of crime which proved at last to be deliverance, powerfully and pathetically told. It is a timely enforcement of Mr. Balfour's admission that history has so bitten into the consciousness of England the horrors of dear bread that, rightly or wrongly, it has become impossible to tax the food of the people. The story is not in any sense a political tract, but it is a bit of the history on which politics rest. (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

The Pocket Richard Jefferies, being Passages Chosen from the Nature Writings of Jefferies, by Alfred H. Hyatt, is a charming little book, which, as the editor says, "needs no introduction." Lovers of this lover of Nature will delight to have it, and to give it to their friends. It should send many fresh readers to the complete books themselves. (Chatto & Windus. 2s. net in cloth, 3s. net in leather.)

The issue of a popular edition of John Morley's "Life of Gladstone," in fifteen sixpenny parts, has been begun by Messrs. Macmillan. The new edition is printed from the plates of the three-volume library edition, and when completed will make two volumes of about a thousand pages each. The library edition costs 42s. net. The popular edition, in the fifteen parts, in paper covers, will come to 7s. 6d. net. The book is a noble memorial of a great life, and thousands of English-speaking people, we doubt not, will be grateful for this opportunity of securing it at so moderate a price.

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE GENEVA MEETINGS.

IT seems to me that on this side of the ocean the INQUIRER offers a new and constant platform to those who were present at Geneva. I take the liberty, and join my old and new friends. It is not only pleasant, but at the same time most encouraging, to be and feel together with so many devoted spirits who were drawn together by that higher Power which guides us on our way. I was present in Boston (U.S.A.) when this most excellent movement was begun. I saw the first disciples in the very moment when the Spirit descended upon their head and when they began to speak in different dialects of the same grand thing which was to unite all the good and noble souls of the world. I was present at the third meeting in Geneva, and I felt, as I feel it even now, that though everyone uttered his best words to express his noblest ideas, it was not the mere words,it was that Spirit around and above, that made us all feel sanctified and pledged for a further grand work of which formerly we could not even dream. As for myself and those of my Hungarian friends who were present, we are certainly all of us far stronger and ready for more devoted work than we could have been without this meeting. It is almost natural that it should be so with Mr. Józan and myself, who took part in former meetings; but the testimony which a Budapest gentleman, Mr. Géza Shulek, his wife, and two grown-up children, and Miss Fangh, and her Kolozsvár lady friend bear to this is, indeed, a noble result. They, most of whom belong to other denominations, are simply in an ecstasy, because they have seen realised all that they dreamed of before. They were searchers for that very spirit which they found active among so many men of such variety of race and culture. These meetings came as a new revelation to them, and now I fervently hope that, with their zealous co-operation, we shall soon see quite a number of Hungarian men and women as our co-workers.

My friends at Kolozsvár (I speak of those outside the Unitarian circle) have such a great interest in the proceedings, that I have to continue my correspondence, begun at Geneva, to a Kolozsvár daily paper. They wish to hear more of this.

Let me tell you that as a result of the Geneva conference we had two sets of visitors at Kolozsvár—Dr. Barrows and his wife, and the Rev. Charles St. John and his wife, of Boston. The former came before I reached home. Dr. Barrows knows Kolozsvár well. He goes about here like a native. He ran over to Torda to see and show our famous town to his wife. I am sure the grand picture of the 1568 meeting, at which religious tolerance was decreed there, must have impressed them both.

Mr. St. John, the secretary of the American Unitarian Association, arrived on the same day with me. I knew him already from Boston, and knew of his zealous activity in Boston and throughout the country. We were very fortunate in being able to show him our Unitarian headquarters, and my joy was full when we had him at the opening of the new session of the theological college. Mr. St. John made a most beautiful and encouraging speech to the students. It will be memorable to all of them, 27 in number. Mr. J. György, who has come home from Manchester College, Oxford, spoke in the name of the students, and thanked Mr. St. John for his kind words. In the afternoon the Consistory held its ordinary monthly meeting. Our guests were introduced, and the bishop greeted them in warm terms, to which Mr. St. John responded in a touching and enthusiastic address. At a dinner, given in their honour, Mrs. St. John was first addressed, and replied in fitting words. Though very small as compared with the Geneva gatherings, these meetings continued to move in the same spirit, and will be remembered by those who could not be present at the former.

As far as I could gather from the conversation we had with the leaders of this movement, it will be some years yet before we shall see a conference at Budapest, but I feel it much nearer now than ever before. I hope our field will be prepared for that time; and since the three dominant languages, English, French, and German, are known by cultivated Hungarians, there is no doubt that we shall be able to make a successful meeting.

The success, no doubt, depends to some extent on the press, and in this respect most hearty thanks are due to the INQUIRER; but far more it depends on the general leaders, of whom the Revs. Charles Wendte, Copeland Bowie, and Professor Carpenter took so splendid a part this year, as formerly. To Mr. Wendte we owe the universal character of the meetings, to Mr. Bowie their grand attendance, and to Professor Carpenter the great names of co-workers. Our deep admiration is due to Professor Montet for the manner in which he filled the office of president.

For my own part I cannot close without mentioning that most touching assembly around the memorial stone of Michel Servéto. As for myself, I think I was most deeply moved there. The beautiful addresses made by Dr. Barrows and Miss Tagart perfectly suited the occasion, and filled our hearts with sacred memories and thankful feelings for this great achievement of tolerant Christianity. It carried my thoughts back to the distant past, to the disciple also, Francis David, whose fate was very much the same, but who is still waiting a similar act of expiation on the part of non-Unitarians. It will doubtless be done ere long in a visible form also, since Hungary has already done justice in other ways to the spirit and the great merits of Francis David. And if the International Council will continue its excellent work, we shall see the day perhaps not so very long hence when the living men, who seem to be enemies now, will embrace each other as dear and loving disciples of the Lord of peace.

PROFESSOR PFLEIDERER'S GENEVA PAPER.

THE paper read by Professor Pfleiderer, of Berlin, to the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at Geneva, on Wednesday morning, August 30, was on "The Sources of the Christian Doctrine of Redemption." We must wait for the complete publication of the paper before its value can be fully appreciated, and its bold suggestions as to the origin of Christian doctrine duly weighed; but the following most imperfect notes may serve as some indication of the tenour of the argument.

A doctrine of redemption, Professor Pfleiderer said, was found in other religions before Christian times. The divine Spirit, moving everywhere, called forth the desire for redemption in different peoples and at various times; so it found various expressions. Of the Christian doctrine there were two forms, distinct in their origin—one, looking to the end of the world, connected with the earlier Jewish apocalyptic teaching, the other, which was due to Paul, centred in the death of Christ.

The Christian hope of redemption to come connected the Messianic hope of the Jews with the new faith in Christ as Messiah. That Jewish doctrine, again, had two sources. There was the old prophetic hope of Divine help which should redeem Israel; that was a faith national and political, but also religious, yet in a form in which it could not become universal. But then, in the time of the Maccabees, in the century before Christ, a second influence came in, from the side of Persia, and the narrow national outlook was widened to faith in a cosmic and transcendental renewal of the whole world, by the Divine Power, destroying all evil powers and establishing the kingdom of God. "Thy kingdom come" was a prayer of the Jews long before the coming of Christ. This idea of a universal catastrophe, out of which should come a new heaven and a new earth, and the righteous should be raised up from the dead, was derived by the Jews from the Persian Eschatology, in which Saoshyant was the Messiah, the divine Mediator, at the climax of the world-conflict, and the victory of the good. Christian faith entered into this inheritance of the Jewish hope derived from Persia. It gave a personal historic form to the Messianic hope, and so gained a new power. The thought that he who had died and overcome death was himself the great deliverer gave an added force to the doctrine.

Paul's conception of the death of Christ, on the other hand, was connected with the ancient idea of sacrifice. To Jew and Pagan alike great calamities were signs of the Divine anger, to be met by sacrifices, the giving of the best. Hence the sacrifice of children both by Pagan and Jew. Such a conception made it easy to pass to the thought of the sacrifice of heroes and the innocent death of martyrs as being for the redemption of a sinful people. That thought was dominant in the time of the Maccabees, and was held by the Pharisees. So it came naturally to Paul. And with this was linked the idea of the sacrifice of a Divine being, which was common in the Mysteries of Asia, suggested by the myth of the circling year, the annual death of the Sun, and his return to life. In those Mysteries water baptism was the ceremony of initiation and the meal of communion was also found. In the deliverance of the God from death to life was seen the mystic pledge of immortal life for man. Parallels to such ideas were to be found in Romans vi. and 1 Cor. x. and xi. It was not mere chance that it was at Antioch the disciples were first called Christians. Antioch was the first great centre of Gentile Christian influence, and there also the worship of the Syrian Adonis prevailed. The rites in connection with his worship were taken over, the lecturer suggested, as a part of the new Christian ritual, their doctrine being applied to Christ; and thus the Christians were marked as a distinct body. The discrepancy in the New Testament tradition as to the resurrection "on the third day," or "after three days," he also explained as due to different traditions in the Mysteries. The return to life in the Adonis celebration was on the second day, in another on the third, and in the Attis celebration on the fourth. Thus there was no uniformity of idea. The story of the women at the empty grave on the morning of the resurrection he similarly connected with the heathen myth of the Syrian women, who solemnly buried their Lord Adonis, and then saw the body rising out of the grave in which they had laid it. When the Christians took up this heathen myth and connected it with their faith in Christ, the annual occurrence became a great historical event whch happened once for all. And then followed the mystic communion of the disciples, the dying and rising with Christ into the true life.

But, though the doctrine of redemption brought by Paul into Christianity was seen to be of heathen origin, he gave to it a deeper meaning for the moral and spiritual life of man. In Christ Paul saw the ideal manhood of the divine Son of God, through the obedience of love making good what the first man in his folly had lost. His death and resurrection brought the promise not merely of the renewal of the natural life, but of the deeper inward life of moral obedience, for the spiritual sons of God. Then baptism signified the death of the old sinful self, the perfecting of the new man in faith, and the Lord's Supper was not merely a magical means of sharing in the life to come, it was the actual perfecting of brotherly love in the community. That was the heart of Paul's doctrine. So they might thankfully set aside the old physical, mythical, heathen elements in the doctrine, which were the husk in which the nobler kernel had grown. As the early church gave up its millennial dream, so they might give up the mythical form, whether from Jewish or heathen source, and hold fast to the one true idea of redemption as the divine power of love, brotherly love in which each should bear the others' burden, as children of God.

REST IN THE LORD.

Labour is o'er;
Daylight is gone;
Toil we no more!
Night cometh on.
Tired grow our hands
As twilight grows dim—
"God loveth weary ones"—
Rest we in Him!

Weary with labour
Toiling for bread?
In love for thy neighbour
Is't, thou hast sped?
Working for others
Wearied each limb?
God loves such weary ones;
Rest thou in Him!

Or, for mankind
Spendest thy might?
Bringing the blind
Back into light?
Bright rays of holiness
To the soul, dim?
God loves such weary ones!
Rest thou in Him!

Always when weary,
Fighting our way
Through the path dreary
Leading to day,—
Life's cup of sorrow
Filled to the brim—
"God loveth weary ones,"—
Rest we in Him!

And when the soul
Ceaseth from strife,
Weary and worn
In the battle of life,—
Then, as our life
Like a lamp groweth dim—
"God loveth weary ones,"—
Rest we in Him!

OBITUARY.

JOHN KEATES OF TROWBRIDGE.

(From The Western Union Chronicle.)

In our prayers, after thanking God for "saints and heroes whose names are recorded in the pages of the world's history, and are held in honour and everlasting remembrance," we thank Him also for "those, unnoted and unremembered, whose humbler lives have done good service for mankind."

John Keates' name is not likely to be handed down to future ages among the saints and heroes of the world's history, although more worthily it might be than some names on the calendar. A life little heard of beyond its immediate surroundings, but a strenuous, faithful life in the service of God and fellowmen; a life not unnoted by those among whom he lived; a life that will be long remembered by the people to whom he ministered, and, rightly, reckoned by them as among the really great, because the good, ones of the earth, and for which, while they live, they will thank God.

Readers of the Chronicle will have noticed that John Keates has been "planned" week after week, year after year, for Rushall. They will read the announcement of his death among the Trowbridge news with regret.

Rushall is a quaint little chapel far out on the Salisbury Plain, six miles from Woodborough, the nearest station. To get there Keates had to catch the 5.55 train from Trowbridge on Sunday mornings. This he did summer and winter for fourteen years, and for fourteen years summer and winter before seven o'clock he might be seen trudging the road from Woodborough to Rushall, with his lantern lighting up the way in winter time. Storm or sunshine, fog or rain, he was always at his post. Oft-times when his people did not think he could brave the snow and cold, he would turn up to their surprise and joy. The mornings were spent in visiting the sick and attending to the Sunday-school. There was service both afternoon and evening, and then followed the long walk back to the railway, home being reached about 9.30. A hard day's work of sixteen hours away from home.

There is a small income of about £30 attached to the chapel, but out of this various expenses had to be paid, so there was not much left for a minister. But John Keates, earnest lay-preacher that he was, did not trouble about that; whether he was more in or out-of-pocket is indeed doubtful; he was devoted to the cause, and the congregation, composed for the most part of poor farm labourers and their families, loved their pastor dearly.

In addition to having charge of Rushall Chapel, John Keates was a trustee of Trowbridge Chapel; also a member of the Committee of the Town Soup Kitchen and in the winter months could be found in the poorer districts of the town distributing the free tickets. In the local Benefit Societies and the Co-operative Society he took not only a deep interest, but a prominent place. Such place he did not seek. He was naturally very reserved; but his power was soon felt, and his advice welcome on any committee.

The funeral, which was at Trowbridge, was conducted by the Rev. J. Wain. The Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, of Saffron Walden, a life-long friend, delivered an address, and the Rev. J. Moody, Wesleyan minister, also took part. In memoriam services will be held in the Conigre Chapel, Trowbridge, on Sunday evening, October 8, and at Rushall on the following Sunday.

Who will carry on John Keates' work at Rushall? "God buries His workman, but He carries on His work" is the inscription on a tomb in Westminster Abbey. Who will be His agent at Rushall? Is there in Trowbridge another man, devoted as John Keates, who will take up the cause in this outpost of liberty and free religion, now more than 200 years old? In Trowbridge, or elsewhere, the man exists, if he can be found.

MR. JAMES SIMS, OF BOLTON.

SOME of your readers will be sorry to hear of the death of this "Carlyle of Bolton," as he has been called.

James Sims was, until a few months ago, President of the Bolton Labour Church, and his whole-hearted devotion to the building up of that body has given it an unique character among the labour churches of the north of England.

Mr. Sims was already old in years and feeble in health when his heart was captured by the new Labour Church movement started in Manchester by Mr. Trevor (then of Upper Brook-street Free Church) in 1891; and it was not long before Bolton too joined in the movement.

A Socialist, with advanced views in labour matters, Mr. Sims was a man full of quiet reverence for the higher things of man's life. His influence was always on the side of "charity in all things." He denounced evils, but had patience with and allowance for the entanglements which beset the evildoers. The writer has long been in touch with most of the Labour Churches, but in none was the truly spiritual atmosphere so felt as at Bolton Labour Church with old Mr. Sims as its leader. Largely through his influence and watchfulness it has for many years had the benefit of a good type of speaker, Sunday after Sunday. He had a quiet scorn of mere froth, and yet there was nothing oppressively conventional about him.

Archdeacon Wilson was one of the speakers who always seemed glad to come, as also Rev. S. Thomson, of Rivington, Rev. C. J. Street, and others.

Mr. Sims was a working man all his life. His hobby was the collection and study of mosses, on which he was an authority. He once showed the writer drawer after drawer full of dried specimens, and said he had had to choose between them and working for the Labour Church, as he had no leisure for both; so his tramps over the moors were given up. His reading was very wide, and the direction of it might be guessed from the portraits on the narrow walls of his cottage—Carlyle, Ruskin, Walt Whitman, and Tolstoy.

The funeral service was taken by Rev. Wilfrid Harris, whose address was in entire keeping with the dignified simplicity of the old man whose "outworn shell" only was before us, but whose spirit had passed to other fields of work.—H. V. H.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"HOME AGAIN."

I WONDER whether each of you has a favourite picture-book, that you would like to keep always and show to other children when you are grown up?

I had two favourites, and though the part to read was lost long ago, I still keep the large coloured pictures, six for each story.

First, there was the story of the kitten who wanted to go out alone, and was in such a hurry that she disobeyed her mother and ran away.

Her home was in a street with a garden behind the house, shut in by high walls. She was not content to play there, but wanted to see what was beyond the walls, and what the world was like out in the street.

Her mother told her she must wait until she was older and able to take care of herself. But Kitty thought herself old enough. So one day, finding a top window open, she escaped out upon the roof, and on and on and down and down, until she reached the street.

At first it was good fun, and she thought how brave and clever she was to venture out alone. But after a time a strange, big dog barked at her and frightened her, and she found she was not so brave nor so clever as she fancied.

Then she tried to go back, but could not remember the way. She had many a fright, and felt very tired and hungry and wretched, until at last she was found by chance by someone from her own house and taken back. They had been so unhappy about her, and she was in such a forlorn condition, that she did not receive the scolding she deserved. She had found her own punishment and received a severe lesson—a warning not to be disobedient.

An even greater favourite was the story of the lost lamb, who, like the kitten, was disobedient and ran away, getting into all sorts of trouble and misery before it was safe home again.

The pictures for this story are more beautiful and so is the story itself, for there is the kind shepherd who goes in search of the lost lamb.

In many parts of our country it would not be easy for a lamb or a sheep to get really lost. The flocks graze in fields enclosed by walls and hedges, and even when the sheep are driven from one field to another, they cannot wander far. A sheep or lamb may be tiresome and not go just where it is wanted, but it cannot get really lost.

In other places where there is less grass the country is not divided up into fields, shut in by walls or hedges. It is all open and sheep are in charge of a shepherd, who, with his dog, leads or drives his flock from one place to another to find fresh grass or water. It is easy there for a sheep to stray off alone, and it may not be missed till counting time comes, when the flock is driven for the night into some enclosed shelter, called a sheepfold.

So it was with the lamb in my old story book. The first picture shows a sheltered valley with fresh green grass, a stream, shady trees, and, in the distance, high, bare mountains, looking cold and dark. The shepherd is resting with his dog beside him, and the lamb is playing by its mother's side.

In the next picture it is evening, the dog is driving the flock into the fold whilst the shepherd stands at the door and counts them as they go past. Last of all comes the mother sheep looking back for its missing lamb and bleating pitifully.

Then the night comes on and the lost lamb is shown alone in the dark under a starry sky with rocks around, a lake near, and dark mountains in the distance. The poor lamb looks so utterly forlorn that we can almost hear its piteous bleating, calling in vain for its mother, as it wanders on, cold and hungry and frightened, and perhaps sorry, out alone in the dark.

We know that when that lonely night was over at last, the lamb found food and water, for the next picture shows it in a wood, drinking from a tiny brook, flowing through fresh grass. But it is not safe yet. It is scratched by brambles, and among the trees we see a strange, wild animal also coming to drink—a wolf, and we fear that the lamb will be frightened and hurt. But help is at hand. As soon as the shepherd found out that one of his lambs was missing, he set off with his dog to try to find it. All that night he searched, and early in the morning he reached the wood and found traces of the lamb, little bits of wool here and there on the brambles, so he knew he was on its track. He was just in time to save it from the wolf, and you may imagine how glad the lamb was to hear the shepherd's voice, and to feel his strong arms as he lifted it up to carry it home.

In the last picture they have reached the shepherd's cottage. His wife stands in the doorway, and the children crowd round the truant lamb, clapping their hands with delight at its safe return. One little lad gives it food from a saucer, and the sheep dog is just as pleased as the children. The shepherd is telling all about his search, and they are all rejoicing together over the stray lamb that has been brought safely home again.

In the Bible we find many word-pictures from pastoral life.

The Jews had been a wandering people, moving about from place to place with their flocks, and at last settling in the good pasture lands in Palestine. They were accustomed to think of themselves as a flock of sheep, and of God as their shepherd, leading the faithful and going in search of the faithless who had gone astray. Turn to these verses, and you will see: Isaiah liii. 6; Ezekiel xxxiv. 11, 12, &c.; Psalm xxiii. 1, 2: "The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: He leadeth me beside the still waters."

And remember the parable of Jesus about the lost sheep. "How think ye? if any man have a hundred sheep, and one of them be gone astray, doth he not leave the ninety and nine and go unto the mountains, and seek that which goeth astray? And if so be that he find it, verily I say unto you, he rejoiceth over it more than over the ninety and nine which have not gone astray. Even so it is not the will of your father which is in heaven that one of these little ones should perish." (Matthew xviii. 12-14.)

FOR BETTER SERVICE.

WE stand now at the beginning of another season's work in the churches, and in all social effort for the uplifting of our common life, for reform and progress in the great battle against wrong. The time of summer resting is over. The time for strenuous municipal and political activity is near at hand. All the winter's work of beneficence and education, for the enrichment, the cleansing and ennobling of life is now begun or immediately to be begun; and in our churches the press of engagements, the full tide of earnest effort is upon us.

We have to ask, What is our strength? What is the great commanding purpose of our work? How shall we preserve the true spirit, and most wisely use all that we have of power for good, and how gain more power and a fuller measure of inspiration and joy in the work?

The answer is that we are enlisted in a great service, and that in obedience and self-forgetfulness will be our best strength. It is the service of that Power, not ourselves, which makes for righteousness. We are in GOD'S hand, called to the service of His kingdom. That is the true ideal for all public service, for all beneficence, for the consecration of every gift of knowledge and strength and sympathy, of wealth in this world's possessions and wealth in a loving human heart.

To this service our churches assuredly are pledged, and we in their fellowship, to be quickened by their inspiration. A frank confession of our weakness and unworthiness will not be amiss at this moment of prayer for the renewal of our strength. There are grave questions we ought to face, urgent needs, which must be met. We alone are not sufficient for these things. What we have to seek is a more perfect obedience and devotion in self-forgetting service, a more humble and joyful surrender to the living GOD.

The needs indeed are manifold. In the churches themselves a truer and more reverent spirit of communion, a deeper sense in every member of the church of the overshadowing of the Divine presence and of a trust in work and worship in which everyone must have a part; and in this communion an enrichment of the ministry, in vision of the things of GOD, in power of utterance, to stir men's hearts to the instant call of duty. And in every kind of good work a new determination to be faithful and true, to destroy every vestige of pride and self-seeking, of paltry jealousy, and every littleness of temper that corrodes and weakens the common purpose of good. It is the service of the Kingdom to which we are pledged, in the pure unselfishness of CHRIST, with his ideal of brotherly love. Our whole life is to be brought into obedience, and this must be effected by the power of religion, kindled in daily duty and at the sources of inspiration in secret prayer, and in the fellowship of the Church. Of what is needed in our churches, and for the making of men devoted to their service, we hope soon to be able to speak more fully.

LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY IN A SCOTTISH PARISH.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

AFTER a stay of some weeks in a small village in the West of Scotland and attending each Sunday the services at the Scotch Established Church, it is impossible to resist the impulse to attempt some account of what has been a most stirring experience, and to give some idea of the catholicity and freedom, with deep religious spirit, that exist in that church to-day. The "Unitarianism" that we at home are apt to think is left to us alone to teach, with the freedom of conscience and of utterance of which we sometimes think we have a monopoly, are here an accepted and acknowledged fact—not necessarily so if the theological question were put to each member of the flock, but clearly and admittedly so in the mind and thought of the three ministers we have had the privilege of hearing. And there is no reason to think that they are isolated instances.

The service is without liturgy or any expressed form of creed or confession, and consists of the usual two readings from the Old and New Testaments, the former very often a Psalm, and splendidly read, by the way; the singing of a paraphrase and several hymns, one often specially for children; and extempore prayers, so devout, so uplifting, that one felt again and again a keen regret that the words must pass inevitably from the mind and leave but a vague memory; and more than once a familiar phrase of Dr. Martineau's has mingled with these petitions.

Of the sermons it is not easy to speak, except in terms of the highest admiration of their strong reverent Christianity and glowing earnestness of faith and liberality of spirit.

In private conversation, the minister said his aim was to dwell on the great affirmations of religion; to leave doctrinal or controversial matters, and to teach fundamental truths of Christianity and faith.

Truly, he is realising his ideal; and his Unitarian hearers this summer have listened with an amazed sense that here exists in actual being the Free Christian, Catholic Church for which they have longed, and in which their faith finds itself absolutely at home.

To such a church "the Unitarians" appear to be merely one more sect or denomination; and one, alas for us, which appears to concern itself over-much with insistence on doctrinal matters and the justification of its position, and is therefore but barren in its harvest.

One Sunday an exchange was made with the minister of a neighbouring parish, a much older man, but of the same spirit.

His sermon was an earnest appeal for the thoughtful study of religion and the grounds of religious faith, in order that "the foundation might be upon the Rock;" urging that whatever fresh light criticism can throw on the Bible, upon Christ and Christianity, may—nay, must—be fearlessly accepted, in the full assurance that the application of the best powers of intellect and science can but strengthen the reality and grandeur of the religion which is fundamental.

The culminating point of the sermon was the assertion that the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man are the essential and unassailable truths of religion and life; and yet, this was not a "Unitarian" Church, but the Established Church of Scotland.

The third minister came from a distant town, and his visit was announced the week before from the pulpit as that of a "former class-mate, one of the most brilliant men of his time"; and from this preacher, a keenly intellectual man in the full vigour of his powers, came the same stirring, strenuous thought and fearless acceptance of whatever modern research and liberal thought can show, with a glowing confidence in the religion which uplifts and sustains all faithful souls, and is common to all churches.

The minister of our parish in the course of a long talk on the subject, said that, dwelling in his sermons on the truths that are universal, he never sought to trouble the older folk, who accept the older forms of doctrine unquestionably, with these newer thoughts; but that he gave his whole heart to the teaching of the children and those growing into manhood and womanhood; to teaching them the great affirmations of religion; so that when in later life they see, as see they must, the crumbling into dust of what is left of the old bulwarks and divisions, their faith may remain unshaken, being indeed "founded upon the Rock."

Now in all this, is there any dividing line from the teachings of those of our own churches whom we love and revere and follow, in the past and in the present? None whatever, that I can discern; and a sense of keenest regret, nay almost of shame, comes over one in thinking of the isolation in which our churches seem to stand, and in which we acquiesce as though it were a necessary condition of our "heresy."

We have thought we stood upon a summit and had a view of sublimities that were hidden from those on lower heights; that we are leaders in the forward religious movement. Maybe in the past this was so; we may proudly remember that from among us have come many bold and faithful pioneers of the liberal faith, and that our forerunners have bravely borne a heavy burden of obloquy and isolation for the sake of their religion. But we live in better times; others have entered into the heritage; and, as it seems to me after this summer's experience, have attained a wider outlook and a more assured faith—that the stream is flowing on, and we are in danger of being left upon the bank.

It is clear that for a long time there has been an elastic interpretation in the Scottish Church of the terms of the Westminster Confession. To-day, as all the world knows, Parliament has given it the power to revise its articles of faith from time to time, as the progress of thought and the conscience of its people may declare. By the law of the land, religious liberty and progress in Scotland is now safe-guarded—a tremendous step, and yet so quietly effected that it is obvious the time had become ripe, and that it is in accord with the will of the church and the nation.

What can we do, how must we bestir ourselves, to join in this great forward march—not to be left in the rear while still believing ourselves to be in the foremost rank?

Do we know this Church? Do we realise its breadth? Do we show our brotherhood by inviting its ministers to preach in our free pulpits?—are we free and fearless enough for that?—these men whose Unitarianism is as deeply thought out as that of any of ourselves, though not necessarily dwelt and insisted upon in their pulpits, but who preach and teach with overwhelming earnestness of personal faith, the Christianity that is of Christ himself: "The critics cannot touch that"; "that will abide for ever"; "that teaches us to know the everlasting arms that are beneath us."

"Unitarian? Of course we are Unitarian; all thinking men are," said our Scottish friend; but there is sad reason to know how he and many another leader of religious thought look upon the sectarian label on our churches—that name which some of us think is synonymous with freedom and religious progress, but which is in reality only a banner raised in one corner of the field, and is a barrier which keeps many earnest thinkers from entering in with us.

Let the name be taken from our gates and as far as possible from our lips: the great truth it proclaims is there, has come, is acknowledged, and is no longer in need of constant argument or justification.

"Of course we are Unitarians," therefore, let us give our whole soul to the realisation of the Christianity of Christ, to the teaching of the young and the uplifting of the people. Let us enlarge our borders and form new links of brotherhood with other churches, and go forward boldly in full confidence. Let us seek out and invite, in the Christian fellowship in which they alone will come, leaders of thought and ministers of the Gospel in other churches to preach in our free pulpits—not Unitarianism, for that is there already, but the greater thing, the glowing faith and the reverent freedom of utterance that exist beyond our walls. Let us seek with their help to realise that we are not alone and crying in the wilderness, but of a great and faithful company, whose church is as broad as the love of God for Man.

LORD CARLISLE ON LIBERAL RELIGIOUS THOUGHT.

AT the Recognition Meeting to the Rev. A. Thornhill as minister of the Carlisle Unitarian Christian Church, on Monday evening, September 25, reported in last week's INQUIRER, the Earl of Carlisle took the chair, and opened the proceedings with the following address. Our report is revised from that of the local Journal.

The EARL OF CARLISLE said that they in Carlisle were a small community, and their Church in the country was not a big one. He did not know whether in their Church they were increasing or not, but he was certain that in his recollection the thought and the spirit which he believed animated their Church had increased enormously. Outside the Unitarian community, in the Church of England, and he believed in other Churches, they would find a growth of those thoughts and of those feelings which used perhaps at one time to be only found in Unitarian bodies. Sometimes they were disposed to regret that those who were with them in thought and belief did not join them. Some of the reasons why they did not do so might be very good, and some not so good; but he thought that they ought to feel that for those who agreed with them they had a certain responsibility. Sometimes he was disposed to think that the name of their body might possibly be responsible for some misconception. Historically the name might be accurate enough; but he thought it not unlikely that to those who had not heard, and who had not read what their leaders thought and said, the impression might be given that they existed mainly for negation. How false that impression was any one who attended those services that night would know; but it was not known to many who ought to know it.

It was not only in the churches that there were those who ought or who might belong to them so far as their beliefs and their feelings went. There were many who had ceased to belong to any Church nominally, who would feel able to join with them, but the fact was, that at present persecution for ideas was not limited to the orthodox, and there were those who had left communities who felt a certain shyness or fear of what might be thought of their intelligence in joining another body. He thought that they could not know how free they would be or how much, by joining their body, they would gain in being able to continue that religious tradition without which he believed that the individual must suffer.

But it was not only of their small numbers; it was not merely of the thousands of those who agreed with them silently and unknown to others; but it was of the great leaders of thought who had influenced the world in the same direction that he would like them to think for encouragement. He thought in particular of three men, though the number might be greatly added to, who had largely influenced the world in the last century, but who, as far as he knew, had never in any way been associated nominally or otherwise with the Unitarian community. He was thinking in particular of Matthew Arnold, Thomas Carlyle, and Joseph Mazzini. A sentence from each, taken rather casually, would show his meaning in speaking of them.

Matthew Arnold, who was called the apostle of sweetness and light, wrote:—"As time goes on, it will be more and more manifest that salvation does really depend on conformity to the line of Jesus; and that this experience and nothing miraculous or preternatural is what establishes the truth and necessity of Christianity. The experience proceeds on a large scale, and therefore slowly. But even now, and imperfectly moreover as the line of Jesus has been followed hitherto, it can be seen that those nations are the soundest which have the most seriously concerned themselves with it and have most endeavoured to follow it. Societies are saved by following it; broken up by not following it; and as the experience of this continually proceeds, the proofs of Christianity are continually accumulating and growing stronger." That was what Matthew Arnold said, and he thought that much more to the same effect, perhaps more to the purpose, might be gathered from what he wrote.

A very different man indeed—Thomas Carlyle, who was supposed to be the apostle of individualism and of strength and a great hater of all hypocrisy—summed up his belief more than anywhere else in his "Sartor Resartus" when he said:—"Small is it that thou canst trample the earth with its injuries under thy feet, as of old Greek Zeno trained thee; thou canst love the earth while it injures thee, and even because it injures thee; for this a greater than Zeno was needed, and he, too, was sent. Knowest thou that worship of sorrow? The Temple thereof, founded some eighteen centuries ago, now lies in ruins, overgrown with jungle, the habitation of doleful creatures; nevertheless, venture forward; in a low crypt, arched out of falling fragments, thou findest the altar still there, and its sacred lamp perennially burning." . . . And again:—"A man, be the heavens ever praised, is sufficient for himself. Yet were ten men, united in love, capable of being and doing what ten thousand singly would fail in. Infinite is the help man can yield to man." That sentence seemed to him the greatest encouragement that they could find for any work in congregations and churches and not merely for themselves.

Last, he should like to mention Mazzini, who had been called the regenerator of his country. He had never himself met a man who had a more magnetic influence, and who gave one so much the impression of a saint. It would be hard to find a sentence in Mazzini that did not justify his claim. One of the last addresses of Mazzini ended thus: he was speaking to Italian workmen, and he said to them:—"Yours is the solemn mission to prove that we are all the sons of God and brethren in Him. You can only prove this by improving yourselves and fulfilling your duty." He felt and hoped that that was what the minister who had come among them would help them to do.

In the newspaper that morning he had read an account of a ceremony at Leeds, where the eloquent Bishop of Ripon was inducting a new clergyman, and he thought he could not end up what he had to say so well as by reading the last sentence of what the Bishop of Ripon said:—"We ask," said the Bishop, "for gentle toleration, since all men are liable to make mistakes, for kindly consideration, and a true and kindly construction upon all our actions. Best of all and most of all, we ask that your hearts shall bend with ours before the Throne of God, that the grace and the help of God may be ours, and that as we join hands with him who takes up his high ministry amongst you, we may be linked together in a closer bond of brotherhood, ready to share in all God's work, so that it may prosper according to His word."

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL CENTENARY.

THE centenary of the Bank-street Sunday-school at Bury was celebrated on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, Sept. 23-25, with the utmost heartiness. The school was first established in Silver-street, during the ministry of the Rev. William Allard, among the founders being Edmund Grundy, of the Wylde, and his sister, Elizabeth Grundy. They were both workers in the school for more than fifty years, as the memorial window in Bank-street Chapel, erected by the teachers and scholars in 1865, records. Another veteran of fifty years' service, who has been one of the superintendents for nearly forty-four years, is Mr. Thomas Holt, J.P., who presided at the Monday evening reunion meeting. More than 300 old scholars and teachers accepted invitations to be present, and many others wrote, expressing regret for their enforced absence and affection for the old school. They wrote from all parts of the country and from Canada and the United States.

On Saturday afternoon, Sept. 23, the five superintendents—Miss M. E. Grundy, Miss Mary Wilde, Mr. Thomas Holt, J.P., Mr. W. Stephenson, and Mr. L. Wilde held a reception in the upper schoolroom, when the roll of signatures taken included 48 names of those over 60 years of age, nine over 70, and three over 80. Upwards of 400 people were present, and after tea a meeting was held, with a much larger attendance.

Alderman THOMAS HOLT presided, and among those present were two former ministers, the Revs. Douglas Walmsley and J. Collins Odgers, with the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, the present minister, and the Rev. J. M. Bass, of Chesham; Mr. C. C. Grundy, a former teacher, and Mr. J. Kentish Wright, son of the late Rev. John Wright, minister for twenty years, in whose time Bank-street Chapel was built. The Rev. S. A. Steinthal was also to have been present, but was prevented by ill-health, and was represented by his eldest son.

The CHAIRMAN gave a hearty welcome to all friends who had come, some of them from great distances, to join them in that celebration, and then gave a most interesting account of the school, from its foundation in 1805, with its successive buildings, and the changing aspects of its work. He recalled the memory of many faithful workers, Edmund and Elizabeth Grundy, Franklin Howorth, John Wright, and others. One instance of the good influence of the school he related in connection with Mrs. Smithels, late of Rivington, who became a teacher in the school sixty-five years ago. Mrs. Smithels, then Miss Martha Livesey, living at Heap Bridge, took a great interest in a poor lad living in a cellar. He had been told by that boy, since he had grown up, that he well remembered the time when Martha Livesey brought him by the hand to that Sunday-school. That poor boy became a post boy, working in a paper mill, got into a good working hand, became a manager, a master and partner of a paper mill, and to-day was the largest paper manufacturer in Great Britain, and a commercial genius; he who was once that poor lad was now Edward Partington, of Glossop, who would have been present that day if he had not been on a visit to Canada.

The Rev. Douglas Walmsley, who succeeded the Rev. John Wright, was also minister for twenty years, and the Rev. J. C. Odgers, after him, for ten. They were both devoted to the school, and taught the adult class of young men, while Mrs. Walmsley and Mrs. Odgers took the adult girls' class on Sunday mornings. Mr. Priestley Evans had now taken up the work of his predecessors. At Bank-street, he reminded them, evening classes were held before the passing of the first Education Act, and through long years of the Sunday-school many had received there the only education they ever got. Many who had been scholars and teachers had filled important positions requiring ability and integrity, and they had occupied places of honour and respect in their public duties. The Sunday-school began by supplying the elementary wants of the working classes as well as the instruction of moral and religious lessons, bringing out and improving the talents which God had given them, forming good habits, sober honest, truthful, self-reliant, industrious—in fact, the building up of good characters, fitting them for an active, industrious, and good life, and preparing them for that which was hereafter.

The Chairman was followed by Mr. J. W. Barlow (hon. secretary), Mr. C. C. Grundy, Mr. J. Kentish Wright, and Mr. D. A. Wormald, who had become a scholar in the school 45 years ago that month.

The Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY said that wherever he might go he could never forget the friends he made at that place, the work he tried to do in that room and the church, and how they all pulled so heartily and earnestly together to do something that might tell for good and something that might last in the lives and characters of those around them. Although the subjects taught in the school had changed, it had been from the first a truly religious work.

Councillor R. KAY, who, in the words of the chairman, was "a scholar in the forties, a teacher in the fifties, and a superintendent in the sixties," declared that the best he had in him and had done was the outcome of the early influence of Bank-street Sunday-school.

The Rev. J. C. ODGERS said the history of Bank-street Sunday-school showed in a remarkable degree the steadfastness, perseverance, and the long and devoted work of many teachers and superintendents who had stood to their work through many decades, and another of the causes of the great success of the movement was the constant steadfastness of the scholars. In 1872, when he first came, Mr. T. Holt and Mr. Stephenson were superintendents of the school, and they were still occupying that position now.

The Rev. E. D. PRIESTLEY EVANS proposed, and the Rev. J. M. Bass seconded, a vote of thanks to the speakers and chairman, and all who had taken part in the gathering.

THE SUNDAY SERVICES.

On Sunday, Sept. 24, three services were held, in which the only three ministers of the chapel now living took part. At the morning service the Rev. Douglas Walmsley preached an earnest and impressive sermon from the text Matt. xxv. 40, "Forasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

In the afternoon the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans conducted a Welcome and Dedication service, at which fifty-five young people from the school were received into the fellowship of the church. Those who took part in the service and received from their minister the right hand of fellowship were only part of the eighty-five (fifty-five young women and thirty young men) who during the past twelve months have joined the church. At the conclusion the Communion service was held, about 150 remaining, most of whom partook. The Revs. D. Walmsley, J. C. Odgers, and J. M. Bass helped in the distribution.

At the evening service a congregation of over 600 was present, and the Rev. J. Collins Odgers preached from John xxi. 15, with the closing words, "Feed my lambs." The sermon dealt with the history of the school, and concluded as follows:—

How many faithful workers, men and women, have given some of the best years of their life to the service of their fellows in this Sunday-school? I knew the Rev. Franklin Howorth, whose wonderful influence over the young people of this town is still gratefully remembered; and the Rev. John Wright, whose dialectic skill and organising power and cheering words are among the sacred traditions of this place. And, as I look down from this pulpit, I see with the eyes of memory a number of faces familiar to me in the old days, all of which with very few exceptions, have passed into the unseen. You retain the features of some of them in beautiful portraits on the walls of your schoolroom, but there is a whole gallery of portraits in the heart of many here present, and each face is illumined not by the light of memory alone, but by the glory of sacred associations which will never fade away. Oh! how much willing service has been given here, and how freely, how generously given! Can we see the extent of the harvest? No, it is only a small part of it that we can observe. From this Sunday-school there has come a noble offspring, the schools at Heap Bridge, and Heywood, and Chesham. From this Sunday-school have gone forth many who have become honoured citizens of this town, who have held worthy places on its bench of magistrates and in its Council Chamber, who in the conduct of public affairs have been known far and wide for their spotless integrity, blameless life, and unselfish actions. Yes, if we were to regard ourselves as gleaners in this harvest field, we might, I think, collect from this side and from that what would go to make up many a noble sheaf, many a good example of a worthy life and an honourable career. But what we can see and gather up in this great harvest field is but small indeed in comparison with that which we cannot see, cannot compute, cannot inscribe on invoice or way-bill. We cannot estimate what has been achieved by the good impressions that have here been made on tender minds by the strengthening of the moral perceptions, the timely word of warning in the midst of life's temptations, the guidance given to the mental powers by the regenerating influence of good companionships and by the upraising of noble ideas before the eyes of the soul. No, that is God's harvest, and He alone can compute it. He alone can gather it all into His garner from which nothing can be lost.

On the following Monday evening a most successful scholars' party was held at the school.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SYDNEY BAZAAR.

SIR,—You kindly inserted in your columns last July a letter from my friend, the Rev. George Walters, of Sydney, N.S.W., appealing to English Unitarians for assistance towards a bazaar to be held in September for the purpose of clearing off a debt which had long burdened his church.

The notice was short and the time inopportune. But September in Australia answers to our March, and is the best month for bazaars there. The response to the appeal here was very small, at which I am not surprised, but the Bazaar Fund has at my suggestion been kept open, and I trust that I shall not have to confess to my friends at Sydney that I was wrong in assuring them that English Unitarians would come to their help if only they made a vigorous effort on their own part.

The misfortunes of this congregation have been without parallel in our denominational annals, and the faults, it must be confessed, have been great. But—thanks to the minister, who, after having been forced to withdraw, returned again and resumed the charge when the cause was at the very lowest and seemed beyond hope of recovery—everything is going on well now. The attendance at the services is excellent, and the respect which had been forfeited is restored. The only remaining embarrassment is the legacy of past errors in this debt, and the congregation has no wealthy members who could afford to give largely to clear it off at once.

Under these circumstances I add my own appeal to that of Mr. Walters. It is most important that we should be honourably represented in that great city of the Southern Hemisphere, and at present we are so both as respects minister and congregation. All that is now lacking is a little immediate pecuniary aid to set them free of debt.

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association has promised to add ten per cent. to whatever may be raised by the bazaar or by subscriptions, which will be thankfully received by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, of Gee Cross, or myself.

"JOHN POUNDS" COTTAGE.

TRAINING HOME FOR DESTITUTE GIRLS.

8, Netley-terrace, Southsea.

SIR,—May I, through the medium of your paper, make an appeal on behalf of our "John Pounds" Cottage. This institution, as most of our friends know, is an off-shoot of the "John Pounds" Mission, carried on so lovingly and untiringly for many years by Mr. Blessley among the very poorest of our Portsmouth children. Young girls who are anxious to go into service, but prevented by want of proper clothing, are assisted if they apply at our little home, and in cases where they have no mother, or a bad one, and miserable home, often in a common lodging-house, are received for some training before being placed out in a situation.

During the last year the work has greatly increased, our five beds are seldom empty, and girls are anxiously waiting for admission. The need of this special work in our large town is great; dozens of girls go on our streets yearly, simply for want of a helping hand at this time of their lives. After they are in service, they are encouraged to visit us and to look upon the cottage as a real home, where they can be sure of love and sympathy in times of difficulty and trouble.

Our clubs in connection with the Home are held in the High-street Chapel School-room, and number about 80 girls. We need funds badly, our annual subscriptions amounting to about £68 a year; but the work cannot be carried on effectually, with the most rigid economy, unless we can raise double that amount in donations; and, so far this year, these have come in very slowly

I ask the help of all who recognise the importance of saving many of these girls from a life of shame, and of raising the standard of our young working women's lives to a higher level by close contact with those more fortunately placed.

NATIONAL UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—May I appeal through the columns of your valuable paper for the help of some ladies and gentlemen to act as honorary speakers for our Temperance Association? There are now twenty-five societies in London Unitarian churches, and I want to send one speaker each month to each society. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant's review in your issue of September 23, entitled, "Which Sacrifice shall be made?" is a splendid challenge to the waverers. "Which sacrifice do we prefer, this national woe and disgrace . . . or a little sacrifice of personal gratification, of idle ease, and a little time spent in service with brethren in the cause?" he asks, and a satisfactory answer will be given by those who will "lend a hand." There are already many ladies and gentlemen who help, but more are wanted. I shall be glad to give the fullest information to any inquirer.

W. R. MARSHALL

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON.

MENTION is made by a high medical authority of a gentleman "whose mental faculties never reached their full power except under the irritation of a blister." If a judicious irritative could be applied to some highly-contented "Liberal Christians" their mental faculties might be usefully stirred. But what blistering could be more severe than the thoughts born of a few minutes' open-eyed consideration of the facts? One of my correspondents, writing from one of our busiest churches, concludes by saying: "But how little are we doing, after all!" It is, probably, only those who are trying to do much that are much distressed at the scanty range of their influence for good. It is not for me to apply blisters; but I would respectfully recommend those few minutes of open-eyed consideration of the facts. Here is London, and here are our churches, and missions, and schools, &c. The number of families in this city that are adrift from all regular, or even irregular religious culture is indisputably enormous. What efforts are we making to reach them?

Well, I testify from the letters and calendars that have reached me, there are many honest efforts being made; here and there, apparently, by minister and people, mostly (I fear) by minister alone or nearly so. Of course, the ministers are the leaders; on them very properly lies the responsibility of initiative and unflagging diligence in the work. But leaders ought to have followers. The only hope of our churches doing what they ought lies in the increase of faithful workers.

The air is full, not of farewells, but of welcomes; and every one of our metropolitan pulpits is now "full"—or practically so. An exception will have to be made, however, I am very sorry to say, at the end of the month, when the Rev. G. Critchley is to leave the pastorate of the KENTISH TOWN Free Christian Church (Clarence-road), which he undertook in 1902. This church has just celebrated the jubilee of its foundation; and if clear and powerful preaching, the utterance of a fully-matured and fully equipped mind, could have secured it, there should have been something more like a note of jubilation to sound at this juncture than is the case. But Mr. Critchley has the satisfaction of knowing that in some important ways the church is in a better state than it was, thanks to his good services. May he and the church severally go forward to more assured success! Perhaps one ought to say another pulpit is vacant, but at STEPNEY GREEN the conditions are not wholly those of an ordinarily constituted church, and I am not sure whether a successor to the Rev. C. A. Ginever is in view or not. Needless to say, both at Kentish Town and Stepney, the population is dense, and the room for ameliorative work is wide. Five new-comers this year are already at work, though the "public "welcome" is yet to be given to three of them. The first of these new settlements was that of the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth, who, from the early part of the year, has been minister at HIGHGATE, and by this time is very much at home with his people. The "institutions" here are numerous and the extensive suite of rooms is fully utilised. Subscribers to the Spears Memorial Buildings would be gratified to see the good use made of them; every day, Sunday and week-day alike, they are occupied, and ingenious schemes are on foot to squeeze other items of work into the programme. Mr. Charlesworth announces two courses of evening sermons, for October, on "Novels of the Bible"; for November, "Unitarian Principles and Ideals." At HACKNEY, the Rev. H. Rawlings has recently entered upon his ministry, and a welcome is to be given next Friday (13th), when, in addition to ministerial brethren, including the Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed and two local ministers, Congregationalist and Baptist, the Mayor of Hackney and other friends will attend. Mr. Rawlings is no stranger to London. It is only six years since he left Little Portland-street Chapel, and he knows the trying conditions which he now courageously faces in a second London pulpit. He follows in a line of men of honoured name; may it be given to him to bring to this ancient congregation a new lease of effective life! At PECKHAM, the Rev. A. F. G. Fletcher, late of the Richmond Wesleyan College, has succeeded the Rev. George Carter; and the signs of reviving interest in the neighbourhood are unmistakable. He will be "welcomed" (though he has been already actively at work here for half a year) on the 17th of this month. To him, and to his former fellow student, the Rev. Arthur Hurn, who will be "welcomed" at ACTON on Wednesday next, a cordial "right hand" will be extended. They come, young and ardent, into our field of labour, bringing to it a fresh sense of the value of our principles and conceptions. One more new-comer is the Rev. A. Golland, late of Manchester College, Oxford, who succeeds the Rev. F. Hankinson as assistant to the Rev. F. K. Freeston at Essex Church, Kensington. Mr. Golland comes of good northern stock, and this further period of post-collegiate training will assuredly go far to equip him for the trying responsibilities of the sole charge of a congregation. With these new and young recruits the ministerial fellowship in London ought to develop a freshness and vigour which have been somewhat lacking of late.

But still another comer has to be named—the Rev. Charles Roper—who is neither new nor immature. He comes in the full tide of his strength and with a stimulating experience; his congregation at Moss Side, Manchester, is a living monument of his power and devotion; and in putting his hand to the work of developing the church at KILBURN he is playing a right manly part in our work. We shut our eyes to Manchester's loss, thinking—I hope not too selfishly—of the needs of our own vast community. Mr. Roper is to begin his duties here in December, and the colder the weather the warmer the welcome must be.

It will be seen from the foregoing that many changes are taking place; at the same time there is much that will be as before, only, let us hope, "more so." At ESSEX CHURCH, already mentioned, Mr. Freeston has the satisfaction of seeing his work thriving. He has a good band of helpers, including an active Visiting Committee, whose operations might well be copied in other districts. All the homes of the parents of the scholars, and the members of the mothers' meetings, are regularly visited monthly, and all cases of absence, sickness, or distress are reported and carefully dealt with. The Guild flourishes, having over seventy members all above sixteen years old, and the Congregational Society opens its eleventh session with excellent prospects. These and similar institutions are mentioned here as typical—other churches have the like, but few, I think, have them in so satisfactory a condition.

The church at Rosslyn Hill, HAMPSTEAD, under the charge of the Rev. H. Gow, has made one apparently little, but not insignificant change in its hours of service. In the evening, instead of beginning at seven, as usual in London, the service now begins at half-past six; and it appears that this does really fit better with the social and domestic arrangements of this suburb. At the Whitsuntide meetings of the B. & F. U. A., a suggestion was made to change the morning hour and begin much earlier—presumably in the interests of people who want to "make a day of it," with their friends. So drastic a move would probably be hazardous; but the more moderate adjustment now being tried at Hampstead may commend itself elsewhere. The regular work of the church calls for no special mention here—no one who knows Mr. Gow's pulpit ministrations need be assured that he is well worthy to stand where Dr. Sadler and Dr. Herford stood. One feature of the services deserves reference. Mr. Liddle, the new organist, has a celebrity for piano music, and his brief recitals after evening service show him a master of the sister instrument, and evidently appeal to many music lovers.

Looking round the north side of the map we see CHILD'S HILL, where the Rev. E. Daplyn continues his pioneer work with signs of success. Over fifty members are enrolled, and though the organisation of the congregation is as yet in its infancy, it would appear that a vigorous plant is striking root here. At WOOD GREEN our veteran friend, Dr. Mummery, aided by a zealous group of workers, carries forward the work steadily; the attendances show improvement, and new efforts are being made by special lectures, beginning to-morrow, to inform the district as to our thoughts and aims. Coming in toward the centre again we find the folk at LITTLE PORTLAND STREET, with the Rev. John Page Hopps at their head, bravely maintaining the work of the church and institute. Mr. Hopps makes a suggestion which others may note besides the Little Portland-street people. Why not, he asks, attend definitely and regularly once a month, say on the first Sunday? Of course, the hint is not ironical, but is sincerely thrown out for people who live at really great distances from their place of worship, and who may only too easily lose count of when they did go last. We should like to hear that the "monthly rally" proved a success; but let no one be tempted to substitute it for the weekly attendance that ought to be the rule. It is good to hear that young men continue to be attracted to the library and other institutions of the place. STOKE NEWINGTON GREEN makes little or no history in the sense of "departures"; it does better by "keeping on." The various societies and clubs are renewing their activities with the promise of as much success as ever, and the Rev. W. Wooding must rejoice in seeing so much active young life around him. At ISLINGTON, the Rev. E. Savell Hicks finds the membership roll steadily mounting up. Happy they who feel the flowing tide with them; even though our tide, when it flows, does not come with a rush! Mr. Hicks, like most of us, has his new course of evening lectures in hand; and when the Provincial Assembly meets at Unity Church on the 19th inst., the delegates will see that his people back him up well in his work. One piece of his work I may here mention specially. He is secretary of the Choral Society which was recently founded for the benefit of our London choir music generally. The society is busy preparing for a grand concert at Essex Hall on November 15 next. Friends will book the date.

So far, for North and West—and the East? Ah, the East—my good, well-satisfied "Liberal Christians," you may find all the "blistering" you require if you will really look at the East, and consider our share in it. I have mentioned Stepney; STRATFORD also is there, struggling, ever so bravely, without a minister for years; FOREST GATE is there, as bravely struggling, but fortunately with a minister. The Rev. H. Woods Perris, in his labours here, has struck upon a rich vein of intelligent and loyal life in the school-teachers of the district, many of whom know him and appreciate his teaching, and some co-operate diligently with him in the work of the congregation. The work attains no great dimensions, but its sterling quality is indubitable. "But the East has its missions"—true; there is MANSFORD-STREET, Bethnal Green, where the Rev. Gordon Cooper continues the manifold labours of the "church and mission," and where the suite of rooms is really a credit to the promoters, and is well used throughout the week. Farther on, the Rev. J. Toye conducts the LIMEHOUSE mission with unwearying fidelity and much benefit to the neighbourhood. These and the domestic missions at GEORGE'S-ROW, St. Luke's (Rev. F. Summers), RHYL-STREET Kentish Town (Dr. Read), and LISSON-GROVE, Edgware-road (Rev. S. H. Street), stand for our direct effort, to cope with the dreariness, vice, ignorance, and hopelessness, of the submerged or submergible class north of the Thames. A special article, however, is needed to describe their operations, and something more than an article to secure them in their good work. I must leave that to other pens, and hasten South.

Here, beginning down the river, is PLUMSTEAD, where the Rev L. J. Jones, now concluding his second year in the mayoralty of the borough of Woolwich, still finds himself hampered for want of a proper church building. He has a small and comely hall; but there are many doubtless who look askance on so modest an equipment for worship. Ground and plans are in possession, the money to build is wanting. The good people here have done wonders in contributing to the cost, but here, as at Lewisham and Kilburn, progress is stayed for the lack of generous outside help toward the new building scheme of the London District Unitarian Society. No doubt we must be patient, but the grass is a long time growing; meanwhile—. Well, meanwhile, the Plumstead and Lewisham people are doing manfully with things as they are. At LEWISHAM, the Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope is so ably supported by intelligent workers that the congregations were never better; they include at least as many men as women, and the Literary Society commences its ninth year with a decided increase in its membership. "We are brighter, happier, more confident than ever"—welcome note, sweet as a cuckoo's in this springtime of our church-life! At DEPTFORD and BERMONDSEY things do not take on such flattering tints, yet each is doing useful work—slowly, ever so slowly, yet surely, we hope, winning a way into people's hearts and lives. The Rev. A. J. Marchant, at the former, is just celebrating his fourteenth anniversary of settlement. The Rev. Eustace Thompson, at the latter, needs helpers; will no one volunteer? Ladies or gentlemen, there is work for either or both.

At BRIXTON, the Rev. F. W. Stanley has a chance of undoing some of the mischief (as we must think it) done by the unenlightened methods of the Torrey-Alexander Mission of last winter in this neighbourhood. Whether or not a reasonable and quiet appeal will soon overtake the headlong pace of error and superstition on the one hand, and of re-action and prejudice on the other, the effort must be made; and the Brixton folk have a clear call to special duty here. STAMFORD-STREET, BLACKFRIARS, is seriously grappling with the problem of how to get the men into week-evening meetings—how happy should I be to record success by and by. The Rev. W. L. Tucker is quite seasoned to the district and the work now, and things are going happily and busily forward. There is nothing new to say of WANDSWORTH at present. With such means as we have, we go on, still considering the facts, the enormous population around, the little group we make amongst so many.

Of forthcoming events in London I have mentioned two, the Choral Society's concert and the meeting of the Provincial Assembly. I am not exactly informed as to the programme of the Layman's Club, but doubtless it will stir us up one way or other. The London District Society will hold an autumnal meeting by and by, as usual, but the possibility of an autumnal dissolution of Parliament rather interferes with plans for such gatherings. After all, the best of our wisdom consists in maintaining the work of the congregations and allied institutions, and thus making our own calling and election sure. A deeper spirit of consecration is ever needed—it may be that many will find, in a series of united devotional services which are in view, fresh sources of inspiration.

W. G. TARRANT.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdeen.—In connection with the placing of the memorial stone of the new building for the Unitarian congregation, the Rev. Jas. Harwood preached twice in the Union Hall, on Sunday, October 1. The morning was damp and cold, but a large congregation assembled. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie conducted the devotional part very impressively, and Mr. Harwood delivered an eloquent discourse on the Liberal Faith. In the afternoon, he, in company with Mr. Ion Pritchard, visited and addressed the Sunday-school. In the evening the congregation almost filled the area of the large hall. The Rev. W. Wilson, Kilmarnock, announced the hymn and read the lessons. Mr. Harwood's convincing discourse had for its title "Christ our Leader, not our Substitute." The visit of these and other gentlemen was helpful in the highest degree.

Barnsley.—The committee of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union are making vigorous efforts to gather together a congregation at Barnsley. Encouraged by previous results the district minister (Rev, John Ellis) has now completed arrangements for Sunday evening services, in the Arcade Hall, to the end of the year. The first of the present series was held last Sunday, conducted by Rev. C. J. Street, his subject being "Unitarianism a Progressive Faith." There was a fairly good meeting, and all present warmly appreciated his eloquent discourse.

Brighton.—The front of Christ Church, New-road, has just been repainted and the lecture hall tastefully redecorated. The anniversary of the church, which has not hitherto been celebrated, will this year be commemorated on October 15, when sermons will be preached by the minister, Rev. Priestley Prime, and on the Monday evening, when a public meeting will be held in the renovated lecture hall.

Harvest Festivals.—The following further harvest thanksgiving services are reported:—Ciliau Aeron and Rhydygwin, Cardiganshire, on Tuesday, October 3, with collection at Ciliau for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association (Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford); Congleton (Principal Gordon); Crewkerne, followed on Monday by a numerously attended public tea and entertainment (Rev. Alfred Sutcliffe); London, Bermondsey, with an afternoon service for the children in the afternoon, conducted by Mr. Harold Titford, of Stoke Newington Green (Rev. Eustace Thompson); Middleton (afternoon), Mr. F. Duxbury; evening, Rev. J. Harrison.

London: Forest Gate.—The Rev. H. W. Perris commenced on Sunday the eighth year of his ministry at Upton Lane. At both morning and evening services he alluded to the fact, and expressed his appreciation at the increase in membership during the recent years, and the spirit of amity which pervaded the church. The Social and Literary Society re-opens its meetings next week, and the services of several eminent lecturers have been secured. On the philanthropic side, the periodic jumble sales, which will be held during the winter, will afford means of relieving, in some small degree, the terrible poverty in the district. The ladies of the congregation are zealously prosecuting their work in connection with a sale of work which will be held in the near future, and from which it is hoped to derive substantial benefit. The Sunday-school maintains its gratifying character, while the services on Sunday have been well attended.

London: Hackney.—A meeting to welcome the Rev. Henry Rawlings, the commencement of whose ministry we have already reported will be held next Friday evening, Oct. 13, when the Mayor of Hackney, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed are among those announced to be present.

London: Islington.—The Rev. E. Savell Hicks preached at Unity Church on Sunday evening on that silly book, "When it was Dark." Wednesday's Islington Daily Gazette devoted a column to a report of the sermon, which concluded with a vindication of the truth and the abiding religious worth of the spiritual resurrection of Christ.

Newport, Mon.—The Unitarian movement here was inaugurated on Sunday evening, October 1, under conditions which promise well for its future success. The Rev. W. Whitaker came over from Cardiff, and delivered an inspiring address on the subject of "Unitarianism, a Reasonable Faith," which was listened to with much appreciation. In point of numbers the audience more than realised expectations, and the interest which is being manifested justifies hopes of still better things in the near future. There being no other town in Monmouthshire where Unitarian services are held, Newport is, in this sense, isolated, and the chief difficulty to be faced will be that of securing preachers to conduct services until such time as a congregation can be gathered together. Any ministers or lay preachers visiting the district who would be willing to assist by taking a service are invited to communicate with the Secretary, Mr. W. Sutherland, 29, Waterloo-road, Newport, Mon.

Selby.—The second anniversary of the opening of the new chapel took place on Sunday, Sept. 24, when sermons were preached by the Rev. John Fox, of Leeds. On the following Thursday evening there was a social tea and public meeting; at the latter the chair was taken by Mr. Henry Lupton, of Leeds, a trustee of the Beatrice Bacon Trust and president of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, who was supported by the Revs. E. Ceredig Jones, John Fox, and John Dale, the resident minister. The Chairman alluded to the recent successful sales of work, and called upon Mr. Dale to read the balance-sheet setting forth the receipts and expenditure for the internal furnishing of the new chapel. The receipts were £60 2s. and the expenditure £59 0s. 8½d., leaving a balance in hand of £1 1s. 3½d. That, Mr. Dale said, did not represent the full value of the fittings. Gifts had come in to the amount of £14, making the total cost of the outlay £73 0s. 8½d. The chapel is now free from debt, and Mr. Dale, acknowledging the recognition which was made of the success of his efforts, said he was very grateful for the kindness which he had received, not only from their friends but from people not connected with their faith. He was thankful to say that a man with such a broad, kindly disposition had come amongst them as the Vicar of Selby, who had shown that differing as they did in faith there was nevertheless room for Christian courtesy. He was glad that such a spirit existed, and hoped it would long continue. The Revs. E. C. Jones and J. Fox then made encouraging speeches. Unitarianism, Mr. Jones said, had a great message for the world, and he believed that there was a great future before the church at Selby; he felt sure they were beginning an era of prosperity such as they had never known before. The votes of thanks and the singing of the doxology brought a very successful meeting to a close.

Stannington.—On Sunday, Oct. 1, Mr. Thurstan G. Turton, hon. sec. of the Sheffield branch of the Yorkshire Unitarian Lay Preachers, occupied the pulpit, and before entering upon his sermon, spoke with much feeling of their late minister, and the influence of his long and devoted life. "The Rev. Iden Payne," he said in conclusion, "has passed away, but his words, his works, his efforts will live, his memory be revered, and the example of his saintly life remain in many hearts—a lasting tribute to him and his work in this place."

Stockton-on-Tees (Appointment).—The Rev. Reginald H. Maister, of Manchester, has accepted a unanimous invitation to become the minister of the Stockton Unitarian Church.

A LETTER on "Rationalism" from Mr. O. A. Shrubsole, we shall publish next week.

TRUST in God, but tie your camel.—Sayings of Muhammad.

THE more spiritual is a man's religion, the more expansive and broad it always is. —Phillips Brooks.

TRUE love is that which uplifts to nobleness; and apart from integrity and purity of heart, love cannot be known in its fulness. That the power who created loves us with this love, the very difficulties and trials of life, bring sublime evidence—since by means of them strength of character may be gained. Nothing happens to us that cannot help to make us better.—H. W. Crosskey.

I READ in the Scriptures the praises of meekness. But when I see a man meek or patient of injury through tameness, or insensibility, or want of self-respect, passively gentle, meek through constitution or fear, I look on him with feelings very different from veneration. It is the meekness of principle; it is mildness replete with energy; it is the forbearance of a man who feels a wrong but who curbs anger, who though injured resolves to be just, who voluntarily remembers that his foe is a man and a brother, who dreads to surrender himself to his passions, who in the moment of provocation subjects himself to reason and religion, and who holds fast the great truth, that the noblest victory over a foe is to disarm and subdue him by equity and kindness—it is this meekness which I venerate, and which seems to me one of the divinest virtues. It is moral power, the strength of virtuous purpose, pervading meekness, which gives it all its title to respect.—Channing.

"Never writer wrote with deeper conviction than George Gissing; every sentence has come straight from the heart, and this fact alone, apart from its artistic merit, gives a poignancy and strength to his work which separates it at once from the common ruck of novel-writing. These books are terrible arraignments of life—their peculiar characteristic is this poignancy, this painting of life at its moments of unbearable crisis. Between misery and despair lies a whole world of difference; misery is what can be endured—despair is the unbearable, and George Gissing is the spokesman of Despair." —Jane H. Findlater, in the National Review.

"Fate set him for his life-task the study of the swarming miseries of our human ant-heaps and the pettinesses of our mortal nature. 'The Nether World,' 'New Grub Street,' 'Demos,' 'The Odd Women,' 'The Whirlpool,'—these are all monumental titles, mighty themes. None of his contemporaries in England—only Zola and Tolstoi anywhere else—even attempted to wrestle with such big canvases, and if Gissing did not always rise to the height of his great argument, the conception was at least Herculean."—I. Zangwill, in To-Day.

THE SECRET OF GENESIS.

AN ASTRO-RELIGIOUS RECORD OF EARLY PRIEST-ASTRONOMERS.

By GEO. ST. CLAIR,

Author of "Creation Records," &c.

To be published and supplied post free for 7s. 6d. if 250 copies are subscribed for.

The author finds that the narrative, from Paradise to the building of Babel, is a genuine ancient record and connected story, corresponding to the history embedded in the legends of Egypt and Babylonia.

He believes it is the first time the chapters have been interpreted on these lines systematically, though several writers have been "very warm" on the track.

Incidentally the Genesis and Geology controversy is seen to be without reason or basis.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE hope to publish next week the address by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter on "Christianity in the Light of Historical Science," at the opening of the session of Manchester College, Oxford; and also a full report of the proceedings at the opening on Thursday of Summerville, the new residence of the Unitarian Home Missionary College in Victoria Park, Manchester.

DR. PATON, formerly Principal of the Congregational Institute at Nottingham, who has just celebrated his ministerial jubilee, is one of those men who do not belong entirely to their own church, but are leaders in a larger sense. A man of original religious fervour and power oversteps the confines of his theology, whatever it may be, and we are glad to join in the congratulations which are reaching Dr. Paton from a circle far wider than that of his own denomination. The meeting at Nottingham, where his students and many others met him, was a memorable occasion, and this chiefly because Dr. Paton himself is still young in heart, ever quick to respond to new calls and to embark on fresh enterprises. His recent pamphlet on the unemployed is evidence of this. The congratulatory address presented to him appropriately referred to his services to the Home Reading Union, the University Extension movement, and other of the numerous good things which he is so active to forward.

THE Bishop of Salisbury (Dr. Wordsworth) presided over the Church Congress, which met at Weymouth last week. His presidential address dealt with "The need of loyalty and effort on the part of English Churchmen." The Church, they knew from the Creeds, the Bishop said, must be One, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic. But when they began to ask what that meant, a crowd of difficult questions sprang up. They need not, however, wait to answer all these before they settled what was their duty as English Churchmen. "That duty seems to be to make the very best of what we are, in order to help all parts of the visible Church, however much they may differ from us in answering these questions. Our conduct is not to be directed by considerations of taste or partial affection, as for instance, whether we admire the imposing polity of Rome, or the conservative atmosphere of the Græco-Russian Church, or the piety of Lutheran Germany, or the freedom of Evangelical Dissent. We have a duty to all whether we like them or not, and with whatever variety of affection or toleration we view them severally. We have a duty to be our best selves, and to make our Church its best self, in order to supply to all that passing glimpse or more settled vision of the glorious Church of God, which we are qualified to present."

DEALING later in his address with the reasonableness of liturgical freedom in the Church, and its necessary conditions, under Episcopal direction, the Bishop made the following interesting allusion to the "Athanasian" Creed:—"At a previous Church Congress—that of Brighton—I attempted to show in what directions and by what means this power may best be exercised. I will only add now an observation occasioned by recent debates—viz., that it is in the power of any National Church to alter the use of the Quicunque Vult, if it considers it expedient to do so. From 1549 to 1662 it was used as a second canticle after Benedictus and before the Apostles' Creed. The amount of use of it has also varied from time to time. In the Roman Church, it was introduced into the daily office much later than in Gaul, and its use was much restricted in the sixteenth century. In the draft breviary of Cardinal Tommasi, for lay use, there seems to have been no creed at all. There are, therefore, precedents for altering its use. But for altering its text I can find none, much as I wish that the composers of this striking hymn had adhered more closely to the language of Scripture in some of its verses."

THE importance of lay help in the Church was afterwards dwelt upon. The use of such spiritual gifts was part of the ideal portraiture of the Church, the Bishop said, both in Hebrew history and prophecy, and in the New Testament. The religious orders of the ancient and mediæval Church began as lay movements. The Society of Friends and the Methodists had shown how much could be done by such powers. They in the Church of England had been slow to follow in recent times, but the restoration of the office of "reader" in 1866 was a landmark in their history, and so was the foundation of the Church Army.

"The growth of the Church Army, with which I would couple the kindred work of the Navvy Mission, is one of the greatest evidences that we can have of the possibility of using the spiritual gifts of Christians of all ranks in the Church of England. In less than a quarter of a century the Church Army has reached an income of £178,000. It has now sixty-seven vans for itinerant work in the dioceses of England and Wales. It employs 514 men as evangelists and managers of labour homes, and 247 women as Mission-nurses and associates. It rightly claims to be a Mission to working people by working people."

AMONG the many subjects discussed at the Congress were "The Use of Wealth," "The Increase of Luxury and its Effects," "Temperance and Hygiene in Schools," "Intemperance as a Hindrance to the Spiritual Life," "Lay Work," "Apologetics: Christian and Non-Christian Religion and Ethics." Dr. Llewelyn Davies, in an opening address on this last subject, laid stress on two special features of Christian morality, of special importance, in his view, at the present time. The first rejoiced to accord a frank and cordial recognition to all extra-Christian goodness; the second made much of the principle of progress in the ordering of human life and conduct, thus alike explaining ethical advance in the past and labouring for it hopefully in the present and in the future.

AT the Autumn Meeting of the Baptist Union, held at Northampton last week, he President, Judge Willis, took for the subject of his address "The Christian Pastor and his Claims." No office, he said, was higher than that of the pastor. Christ was his only superior. He must renounce the world, and find joy in a life of service. Preaching was a very important part of his work, but it must not overshadow the work of prayer and praise, and the calm, reverential, and, if possible, effective reading of Scripture. The pastor must learn to visit his people, not to saunter among them. He had known one, not an effective preacher, who held together a large congregation by the pure and sweet visitation of his people. At an evening mass meeting in the Corn Exchange Mr. George White, M.P., gave an address on "The Influence of Character," Dr. Clifford on "Courage," and Mr. Will Crooks, M.P., on "Sympathy."

THE great events of the Congregational year are the spring and autumn assemblies of the Union of England and Wales, but for the purpose of testing the trend of thought among the churches — or rather among the active denominational minorities—the proceedings of the various County Unions are perhaps even more interesting. Such a truism as that independency was made for man, not man for independency, could hardly have been heard two generations ago, and if heard would have had a quite different implication. At the present moment a County Union applauds the sentiment because it embodies the drift towards organisation, towards what is called Wesleyanising the churches. This movement from the obsolete independency of the Pilgrim Fathers is further illustrated by the frequent discussions on and criticisms of lay preaching. The extension movement demands a growing band of lay preachers; the organising tendency welcomes it, because lay preachers must be supervised, form a stage in a hierarchy, and enable the leaders to extend their work into many small centres. At the same time criticism is heard. The preaching of the "college" man is preferred, and the villages resent what they deem a suggestion of inferiority.

THE same movement towards a Congregational Church with a quasi-corporate existence and almost a personified love of the great memories of the past is reflected in the increasing attention to history. We have "Eras of Nonconformity," i.e., of evangelical Nonconformity, for, however closely these churches draw together, there is no narrowing of the breach with the Establishment. Then from time to time county histories appear. In them is a good deal of antiquarianism, and some history. The local interests of individual congregations are linked to wider national and religious causes. The small details, and obscure records are drawn into the rush of greater thoughts and personalities. So the strength of the past is garnered. With all this there seems to run also a consciousness that history is in the making. And these men are busy at the making of it.

IN one respect, however, these Union meetings and these histories do not reflect a change which is surely, if more quietly, going on in their midst. They applaud the "Evangelical note"—the new or the old evangelicalism; they speak of the importance of revivals. Somehow or other, the large number of men and churches which do not "Revive" are less heard of. But they do their work, and some day or other, when the present revival fashion has passed away, there will be an awakening to the profound alteration which is at present taking place in the theological thought of ministers and of congregations. For it is not always the minister who is too "advanced." Congregations also patiently bide their time, half, or more than half, conscious of their need of a broader gospel.

THE approach of the autumnal meetings of the Congregational Union rouses a good deal of anticipatory excitement among its members. Among other ends which it is hoped may be furthered this week at Leeds we gather that a fresh Revivalistic outbreak is one. A lengthy and warm-hearted correspondent of the Examiner connects the recent Welsh revival with the meetings of the Union in Cardiff, and wishes for a repetition thereof in England. Another hoped-for outcome is a new lease of life to one of the derelict churches of central Leeds. It was arranged that a meeting of the Assembly should be held in Belgrave Chapel, to consider "Institutional Churches," and it is hoped that this ancient chapel situated on one of the busiest Sunday promenades in the city, may itself become "institutional." For a few years it was pretty much this, but the man who filled its seats and exerted so great an influence over the working men of Leeds was too broad for the diaconate, and his work came prematurely to a close.

THE meetings have not been behind previous sessions in interest. The muster of ministers and laymen from all parts of the country has been large. Sermons have been preached, conferences held, papers read, speeches delivered. Public questions have been discussed, matters social and theological have been considered. Of Dr. Forsyth's address as chairman, on "The Authority of the Church," continuing the subject of his spring address, we may have more to say next week.

The Bishop of Southwell (Dr. Hoskyns), who has succeeded the late Dr. Ridding, the first Bishop of the diocese, delivered the inaugural address at his first diocesan conference, at Derby, on Tuesday. His plea was for peace in the Church, and charity of judgment. "If there is to be true, lasting, and energising peace, then we must at once learn the elementary lesson that peace does not lie along the line of unreasoning uniformity. It is too late in the day to demand in detail a rigid uniformity in language, dress, methods, which leaves no room for originality, development, or adaptation." "If we are compelled to enter into controversy for the truth's sake, let us go into it with clean hands, and with a longing desire to magnify the good in others rather than the evil."

IN the latter part of his address the Bishop dealt with the duty of the church in social problems. The clergy, he said, have intimate knowledge of their people. Both in village and in city slum they must do all in their power to secure wholesome conditions of life. It must not be beneath their dignity, he said, "to analyse the water or encourage the love of flowers, and in the city their aim must be to mitigate the overwhelming strain of mere living. Time would fail, the Bishop said, to deal with that vast subject in all its branches. He merely noted two ways in which their duty was clear:—"(i) The Church must not allow the office of the prophet to be abolished. Fearlessly, wherever flagrant injustice is found, the Prophet must utter in the name of God, denunciation. Thank God for it, we have in this diocese not a few large landowners and owners of property who do their utmost for the health and comfort of those whom they employ, but this is not so everywhere. The growth of large combines and companies shifts the burden of responsibility; open spaces vanish; families are herded into two rooms; there is no one to care. Streets are run up in a few weeks, and the pastor who grappled with his 1,000 parishioners, breaks down under the strain of the 5,000 when all sympathy is denied him. (ii.) Let us not forget our message to the nation of mercy. The tendency is more and more to rely upon law, upon statutes. If it is duty to preserve a conscience it is also our duty to keep the heart warm. Wealth, luxury, pleasure, allow but little room for the real care of our people. The world, filled with the disease of avarice and hurry, would do great deeds by strokes of the legal pen. But, depend upon it, that there is nothing equal to the inspiration of the Spirit of God to arouse and make permanent that compassion which must be at the base of reform. As I think of the work of the Church Army, with its care for the unemployed and its sound principles—or of our delightful Homes for Waifs and Strays up and down the country—if I think of that vast organisation named after the young medical student—Barnardo—or if I think of the social side of the Salvation Army, I find how that the country fails to grapple with social problems, save through bodies impelled by a motive power from above. Every social question when probed to the bottom is a moral question, and our duty it is as churchmen to realise this and to preserve the balance of justice and mercy."

THE King has shown his sense of the importance of the problem of the unemployed, and sympathy with the sufferers, by agreeing to receive an address on the subject, and commanding that it shall be presented during the ceremony of the opening of Kingsway on October 18. This he has done in response to a request sent to him by the Poplar Borough Council. The Queen will be associated with the King in the receiving of the petition. It is understood that precedent alone prevents his Majesty from welcoming deputations of unemployed men at Buckingham Palace.

ON Wednesday afternoon, Lady Tate presented the Brixton Oval to the Lambeth Borough Council as a memorial of the late Sir Henry Tate. The ground, which is in front of the Free Library, one of Sir Henry Tate's many public benefactions, is to be known in future as the Tate Library Garden. A bust of Sir Henry by Mr. Thomas Brock, a replica of that in the Tate Gallery, erected by public subscription in the gardens, was at the same time unveiled by Mr. Evan Spicer.

STUDIES IN STOICISM.

I.

THE INTERPRETATION OF LIFE.

"Stoicism," writes Professor Pfleiderer, "was, next to Platonism, the most important preparation for Christianity itself." Christianity commenced as religion, and developed into a philosophy as well. Stoicism began its career as philosophy, but developed into what was practically a religion. When the two came together there was not an adjustment of two more or less antagonistic kinds of force—the one issuing from the intellectual, the other from the emotional and religious life. The phenomena presented by the one are very similar to the phenomena presented by the other. Each is a religion with its basis in philosophic thought, one might say in speculation.

Dr. Hatch, in his Hibbert Lectures, declares that "The basis of Christian society is not Christian but Roman and Stoical." There is here an implied conflict and a victory, a contrast and a clash between two sets of ideas, sentiments, and practices. There was, as a matter of fact, comparatively little contrast and no conflict at all. Of this one may convince himself by trying to single out any idea or sentiment that is important in original Christianity, and which has no counterpart in Stoicism, and vice versa. The two are not identical by any means. There are large differences of emphasis. But the two are so similar that Christianity won its way in the thoughtful and earnest section of the Roman world, not in opposition to, but through the aid of Stoicism which had gone before it, making straight the way.

In this short series of articles I purpose doing nothing more than touch upon a few of the aspects of the great question that thus opens up. And in the first place I would consider the Stoical interpretation of life and its meaning, in which we see affinities with Christianity revealed step by step. To do this it is best to take a representative Stoic of the later Roman school, say Seneca, and make his ideas the principal basis of discussion.

What is the worth of the individual life, and what gives it that worth? In what consists its realisation, and what is the meaning of the apparent obstruction of its realisation in evil, pain and death? I suppose if one were to sum up briefly the Christian thought of the end towards which life should ever consciously tend, which in and for itself is supremely worthy, and which in so far as it is realised gives to life its worth, one would speak of it as unity with God—unity of purpose and will, unity of inner spiritual life. We may express this further as the Divine dwelling in the human, the God-Spirit uttering itself in and through the man-spirit (Romans viii. 9 and 11, &c.), or as the human coming into harmony with the Divine, man relating himself rightly to God (cf. Romans xii. 1). In early Christianity there is apparently no consciousness of a distinction here. But it is this fact of being linked to the absolute Spirit, and the capacity for entering into an ever deeper, more complete, more unifying relationship with Him that gives to a human life its reality and meaning and worth. This is the goal of Christian endeavour, involving all duties, all loves, all endurances. But there is no idea in all this that is foreign to Stoicism. Seneca speaks of God as Father, as near us, with us, and within us. He teaches, indeed, that true happiness is the great goal of man's wishes and designs. But true happiness to him consists precisely in this right relating of life to God and (Seneca adds very much as Christianity does too) to man. (cf. "Happy Life," chap. i.)

Had a Christian and a Stoic discussed this topic together, they would have been conscious of very little divergence of thought. There would have been little difference in ideas. But they would have been conscious that there was a difference between them for all that—subtle, undefined, but very real. The difference would have been one in depth and intensity of certain great sentiments. Christianity is essentially mystical. The fact of conscious communion with God is basal, and in importance outweighs all other elements. That is to say, that a fact of feeling and not a mere explaining idea is at the foundation of Christianity. Relationship to God was therefore a direct experience, not an interpretation of experience by the aid of thought.

Now all the sentiments that produce mysticism are undoubtedly there in Stoicism. But they are at a very different pitch of intensity compared with Christianity. There is no fact of feeling that is basal in the same way. Consequently, Stoicism tended not to the cultivation of this "relating of life to God" as an experience, but to construing it as simply a process of ethical development. Christianity, in coming in contact with Stoicism, though it thus brought with it little in the way of fresh ideas, or new explanations of the great mysteries of life and death, did bring with it a great quickening of sentiment—sentiment that was always latent in Stoicism. Its emphasis fell on the mystical and devotional elements, and it intensified all that we mean by "spiritual experience." Let us illustrate this by turning to Seneca. We cannot imagine Jesus teaching that philosophy is the true guide to life, even philosophy interpreted in the broad way it was in Rome. But this is a dictum of Seneca's, although the ideas of Seneca respecting God and man are so nearly akin to those of Jesus. One grasps that there is a difference here, and a great one; but when one tries to explain what that difference is he finds it impossible to locate it in specific conceptions, and has to fall back on the broad fact of a difference in intensity of spiritual experience. Philosophy did not guide Christ to Calvary, nor inspire the prayer "Not my will but Thine be done." One has to seek the causes of these, not in a perfected system of self-culture, but in a vivid consciousness of God, and a passion of surrender to Him. These we find in Christ. And the greatest effect of the example and teaching of Jesus was to stimulate a similar consciousness and passion. Now, here was the weak spot in Stoicism. Seneca, in discussing how to attain the true life, does once or twice refer to "speaking to God." But one misses that great emphasis on prayer, and that exalting immediate consciousness of God that one finds in Jesus. Something of this Christianity carried with it wherever it spread. It carried it to Rome and into the world of Roman thought. This was the secret spring of all its power. And though Stoicism possessed this but in small part, it aided its spread in large part, because it went before laying the philosophic basis of what was to come, and because it carried in itself the seeds of what in Christianity had become flowers and fruit.

This unity with God, conceived of largely as attained by the adoption of principles of conduct by the Stoics, but interpreted always more mystically by Christians, was thought of as an easily attained end by neither. Human life, in developing towards its goal, encountered apparent obstructions in the shape of evil, suffering, and death. And the affinity between Christianity and Stoicism is again shown by the similar explanation given of these obstructions, and the way they are in both taken up and shown to be in essence not really obstructions, but aids to the one great end.

Christianity glorified suffering. Jesus himself, so far as we can gather, regarded it as having a legitimate function in spiritual education. He who would not take up his cross daily and follow him was not worthy of him. But it was not through Christ's teaching so much as through his example that suffering came to be looked upon as the glorious and divine means of salvation. It behoved Christ to suffer ere he entered into his glory. Not less would be required of his followers. Such was the general Christian sentiment. And if one asks why this should be so, one gets as answer not merely that it is a part of the government of the world, but that it is a part of a government that is good and loving. The Christian's attitude to suffering was thus not as to something evil, but as to something essentially good and making for good, not as to something to shirk and lament, but as to something to embrace with joy when occasion came and to glory in for the ends it procured. This sentiment and conviction runs through the Epistles of Paul, of Peter, and the Epistles to the Hebrews. "If we suffer we shall also reign with Christ," writes Paul "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross." And again, "I reckon that the sufferings of the present time are not to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed to us-ward." In the Epistle to the Hebrews the conviction is plainly expressed that Christ was made perfect through suffering, and that he endured the cross because of the great end in joy set before him (Heb. ii. 10 and xii. 2).

This was to the early Christian the lesson of the Passion and Death of Jesus. Jesus was an example of suffering (James v. 10). And it behoved his followers to make themselves obedient to the same Law of the Cross (c.f. Philipp. i. 8). The temporal affliction is to be borne because "it worketh for us more and more exceedingly an eternal weight of glory." The Christian solution to the problem of suffering is that it is the divine means to a great spiritual end, and one that is welcomed the more clearly that end is discerned. This is the secret of that willingness to suffer and to die, if needs be, that characterised the early Christian, and which so kindles our admiration and amazement to-day.

The same general view of suffering was reached by the Stoics, quite apart from any knowledge of Jesus and his tragic end. To turn again to Seneca, a few quotations will show how identical are the underlying ideas. Suffering is only an evil regarded in its outer aspect. Seen in its true bearings, it is part of the good government of the world, and is the divine means to a glorious end.

In "De Providentia" Seneca lays it down that "everything is ordained and proceeds according to a law that endures for ever." This eternal law does not decree evil, though what appear to be evils come to pass. But "what appear to be evils are not so—they are to the advantage of those to whom they happen and to all mankind." Then he quotes with approval a sentence of Demetrius: "No one seems to me to be more unhappy than the man whom no misfortune has ever befallen." Thus Seneca argues from the existence of suffering to the good and loving government of mankind. The former helps to prove the latter. Suffering is a means to the divine end, and as such should be encountered and even welcomed. "God bears," he writes, "a fatherly mind towards good men, and loves them in a manly spirit. Let them, says He, be exercised by labours, sufferings, and losses, that so they may gather true strength." And this principle he again expounds thus:—"Why does God afflict the best of men with ill-health or sorrow or other troubles? Because in the army the most hazardous services are assigned to the bravest soldiers. No one of these men says as he begins his march, 'The general has dealt hardly with me,' but 'He has judged me well.'" "I do not know what nobler spectacle Jupiter could find on earth," he writes again, "than that Cato, after his party had been more than once defeated, still standing upright amid the ruins of his commonwealth."

The common conception of the Stoic as a man capable of blind, stolid, reasonless endurance, one able to preserve equanimity amidst all vicissitudes and defy fate, is largely false. Suffering, to the Stoic, had a function in a scheme of education that was rational, beneficent, divine. It was, in essence, good, and led on to what was advantageous to man. The Stoic was obedient to the "law of the Cross" for very much the same reason as the Christian was.

There are differences, however, here too, arising largely out of the more mystical nature of Christianity. But these I reserve for a later article.

J. Worsley Austin.

It is the office of the soul to be a discerner of the hidden meanings of all that is addressed to the other senses, as well as the organ to which God speaks directly; a decipherer of the great realities that stand behind their signs; the true sense of the man, the perfect eye and ear, to which the other faculties are ministers and inlets of an inward life, quite personal and individual, known only to itself and to the All-knowing.—John Hamilton Thom.

A NEW HYMNAL.*

Words and Music.

"This book," we read in the Preface to this new Hymnal, "is offered to the Broad Churches of Nonconformity, in the hope that it may provide an adequate selection of hymns and tunes for public and family gatherings on the part of adherents of Liberal Christianity. It is now more than thirty years since Dr. Martineau, in the Preface to his Hymns of Praise and Prayer, remarked, in justification of a new selection of hymns, that a third of a century had passed since the publication of his previous selection, entitled Hymns for the Christian Church and Home. In that time, he said, not only had religious literature been enriched by many new hymns, 'but in passing through a generation remarkable for rapid change, Christianity itself, notwithstanding its essential permanence, had insensibly modified its complexion; and in its truest moments resorted to other centres of meditation, and spoke in other tones than those which were natural to our fathers. Another generation has passed away since these words were written, but they apply to-day as they did yesterday, and suggest the same conclusion—namely, a new selection of hymns which shall be more suitable for the needs of a new time, and more adequately express its changed complexion of thought, while preserving the continuity of religious devotion. For while the essential things remain, the emphasis is different.'

"The change noted by Dr. Martineau is made manifest by the absence of hymns from his later selection based on miraculous stories and objective incidents, either in Biblical history or Apocalyptic representations of the future. It may be that Dr. Martineau, in excluding any direct provision for the familiar seasons of the Christian Year, carried his principle too far. Certainly many have felt the want of a sufficient number of hymns appropriate to Christmas, Easter, and other memorable features of the Gospel story, and this omission the compilers of the present book have endeavoured to repair. But the changed emphasis, for which he found expression in the new book by including a much larger number of hymns belonging to the inner life, to the exclusion of many based on history and mythology, was a remarkable instance of true poetical and spiritual insight.

"The change of emphasis, or rather, the enlarged scope of the book now offered, is chiefly in two directions: It is due on the one hand to the emergence into clearer light of the great mystic conception of the Divine Immanence, and, on the other hand, to a growing sense of the divinity of human duty. The first of these is affecting the theology, and therefore the psalmody, of all the churches. The second is a much more potent factor of the religious life than of old, so that all modern hymn-books give a larger space to labour, joy, life, and living, than to sorrow, sickness, death, and dying.

"And if Dr. Martineau felt, in addition, the great desirability of including in the praises of the Church the beautiful hymns of modern authors, we also, after another generation, are in the same happy position. It is no less desirable for us that our worship should contain the more recent utterances of our own times; whatever the merits or demerits of books now in use, it is felt that there is room and need for a book which shall cover a wider range of life and devotion than most existing hymnals represent. An effort is here made to provide a book as broad and inclusive in its tone as the outlook of Liberal Christianity and as the conditions of our Free Church life."

So far, the Preface of the New Hymnal, and the editors add that their book is not "specially representative of any one school of thought amongst us, but endeavours to provide expression for the wide range of differences which mark our churches, and for the whole area of religious life and experience."

The book is thus offered as a successor to Dr. Martineau's two volumes, which have had, each in its generation, so wide an acceptance in the community of our churches. How far it will justify its claim time and use alone can show. One great point in its favour is not mentioned in the preface to the "Words Only" edition, and that is the fact that there is also an edition with music, every hymn being provided on the same page with an appropriate tune. This adds very greatly to the value of the book, both for congregational and for home use. In a brief preliminary notice on August 12 we called special attention to this fact.

No further guidance as to the origin of the "New Hymnal" is given within its covers to inquiring readers, except such as the internal evidence of the selection and editing of the hymns affords. From this it appears that the book is Unitarian in its general theological tone, although the endeavour to be inclusive has led to some curious results. But, from a circular which has been issued, announcing its appearance, we learn that the book has been "compiled by a few friends for use in churches of the Liberal Faith," and that of the little company of compilers the Rev. Joseph Wood, of the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, was the Chairman, Mr. G. H. Leigh, of Monton, the Treasurer, and the Rev. Henry Gow, of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, the Secretary. They have accomplished an arduous task, and if a little more care in the final editing might have saved the book from some palpable defects, it is so good that we must hope for a speedy opportunity for a second edition, at least of the "Words Only," to make it still better.

The first comparison, which those who are interested in the hymn-books used in our churches will naturally make, is with the Revised Essex Hall Hymnal.

[In the following notes, for the sake of brevity we will use these symbols: For Hymns for the Christian Church and Home, M. 1; for Hymns of Praise and Prayer, M. 2; for the Essex Hall Hymnal, E.; for the Revised Edition, E.R.]

Reference to the Year Book shows that whereas in 1880 M. 1 was used by 198 of our English congregations, and M. 2 by 16, and ten years later M. 1 by 137 and M. 2 by 69, in 1893, two years after the appearance of E., 46 congregations had adopted that book, while 105 used M. 1 and 64 M. 2. Now, when E.R. has been out for three years, E. is used by 101 congregations and E.R. by 51, while only 32 use M. 1 and 51 M. 2. Thus it is clear that, save for some more acceptable book to come, E.R. holds the promise of the immediate future. (The figures are approximately correct.)

It will be interesting, therefore, to make some comparison between the New Hymnal, M. 2, and E.R. (For the New Hymnal we will now say N.H.) N.H. has 658 hymns, M. 2 has 797, and E.R. 534. Of the hymns in N.H. over 200 are common to all three books. Another 58 are common to it and M. 2, and another 156 to it and E.R. Some 230 hymns are new in N.H., so far as these three books are concerned. They are, however, by no means all modern hymns. Some are old Latin hymns, 8 are by Charles Wesley, others are by such writers as Baxter, Herrick, Byrom, Blake, Luther, Lyte, Anne Brontë, and Hartley Coleridge. Among the authors whose names do not occur in the other books are Kingsley, Ruskin, George Macdonald, and Rudyard Kipling. Mrs. Browning, Ebenezer Elliot, and Phillips Brooks are also in N.H., and of the fresh hymns 8 are by Whittier, 8 by Stopford Brooke, and 6 by T. H. Gill.

The chief contributors to N.H., with the number of their hymns, are: Charles Wesley 29, Whittier 23, Samuel Longfellow 19, Hosmer 18, Montgomery 16, T. H. Gill 16, Stopford Brooke 14, Faber 12, Watts 10.

These may be compared with E.R.: Samuel Longfellow 25, Hosmer 20, Charles Wesley 17, Montgomery 15, Whittier 14, Gill 10, Conder 8, Brooke, Ellerton, Faber, Hopps, Emily Taylor, and Watts 7 each. Whereas in M. 2 the chief are: Montgomery 67, Charles Wesley 58, Watts 49, Doddridge 34, Cowper 21, Heber 17, Faber 16, Barbauld 15, and Lyte 15.

It will thus be seen that N.H. is a distinctly modern book, which yet draws from old as well as new sources of hymnody in its endeavour to be "a really representative book." It contains a considerable number of children's hymns, which is a welcome feature both for congregational and home use, and a careful examination of the collection will show that there are aspects of devotion here brought to expression which have not hitherto been so clearly represented in our books. Omissions, of course there are—one or two quite unaccountable, which doubtless will be made good in the next edition. Others, perhaps, will be considered open to question as mere matters of taste. Here are some of the omissions we have noted:—

Frothingham's "Thou Lord of Hosts, whose guiding hand."

Miss Waring's "My heart is resting, O my God."

Cowper's "God moves in a mysterious way."

Stopford Brooke's "Let the whole creation cry."

Charles Wesley's "Happy soul that free from harm" and "Lord, we believe a rest remains."

Mme. Guion's "O Thou, by long experience tried."

Whittier's "To-day beneath Thy chastening eye."

Bernard Barton's "Walk in the light! so shalt thou know."

Hosmer's "Unto Thee abiding ever."

Bulfinch's "Hath not thy heart within thee burned" and "Lord, in this sacred hour."

There are many more than twelve hymns in N.H. which we could have gladly spared for the sake of including these. But so it will be with every collection that is made, and while reserving further points for another occasion, we will conclude this notice by reproducing two of the hymns which in our books, so far as we are aware, are new to N.H. They will serve to illustrate the remark made above of the fresh notes of devotional utterance to be found in this book.

The first is by the late H. R. Haweis:

Watching all through the weary night,
In darkness, lonely and forlorn,
I hail the blessèd morning light,—
Thy love is brighter than the morn.

Praying, but tempted and cast down,
Tried from without and from within,
I fail, and fear to lose my crown,—
Thy love is stronger than my sin.

Waiting to draw my dying breath,
No arm to stay, no art to save,
I shudder to belong to death,—
Thy love is deeper than the grave.

Oh Love! so bright, so deep, so strong,
When this brief span of life is o'er,
Teach me to sing the heavenly song,
And lead me to the shining shore.

Another new hymn in our books, except that it is in the Manchester College collection, is Dr. Walter C. Smith's—

"One thing I of the Lord desire."

Two of George Rawson's hymns are in E.R., but this other is new to us;

Come to our poor nature's night,
With thy blessèd inward light,
Holy One the Infinite,
Comforter Divine.

We are sinful—cleanse us, Lord,
Sick and faint—Thy strength afford,
Lost,—until by Thee restored,
Comforter Divine.

Orphans are our souls, and poor,
Give us, from Thy heavenly store,
Faith, love, joy, for evermore,
Comforter Divine.

Like the dew, Thy peace distil;
Guide, subdue our wayward will,
Things of Christ unfolding still,
Comforter Divine.

Gentle, awful, holy Guest,
Make Thy temple in each breast;
There Thy presence be confessed,
Comforter Divine.

In another strain are Rudyard Kipling's Recessional, Julia Ward Howe's "Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord," and Ebenezer Elliot's "When wilt Thou save the people?"

What we have now said will, we trust, induce those of our readers who care for hymn-books, to procure a copy of this new book and examine it for themselves.

CHRISTIANITY is not a theory or a speculation, but a life.—Coleridge.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

IN this month's Independent Review there is a stirring article by Mr. C. F. G. Masterman on "The Outlook for Social Reform," after which comes "A Vision of England," by Mr. C. R. Buxton. "The awakened conscience of the people," says Mr. Buxton, "is shocked at the spectacle of visible suffering and wrong. The nation is beginning to know the sense of shame. The individualist of to-day is fighting against the sentiment of national self respect. The demand for justice has superseded the demand for charity." The Master of Dulwich writes on "English Ideas on Education," deprecating excessive interest in games, and noting an improved tone in the general demand for wholesome education. "Englishmen certainly are beginning to desire that boys should issue from their several schools trained to view their civic duties properly, and trained to perform usefully and cheerfully those duties that are binding on every citizen." Mr. H. W. Garrod, who wrote in the April Hibbert on "Christian, Greek or Goth?" has an article here on "The Religion of all Good Men," for the benefit of those who can no longer accept "Christianity."

Dr. Forsyth, Chairman of the Congregational Union, who has this week been dealing with the subject of authority in his address to the Autumnal Meeting of his Union, contributes to the Contemporary one of his elaborate dogmatic articles on "The Evangelical Churches and the Higher Criticism." The true authority in religion, he there declares, is neither the Bible nor the Church, nor even the person of Christ, as such, but Christ as recognised in the historic act of Redemption. Thus, "the Gospel" in a strictly evangelical sense (not the Gospels) is the ultimate authority, and of this Paul appears to be regarded as a better witness than the Gospel records. "The Epistles are essential, nay, normative, to the Gospels." "All we possess is the evangelical Christ common to Paul, the other apostles, and the first Church." "The Charter of the Church is not the Bible, but the Redemption." This is the doctrine which Dr. Forsyth urges upon the Evangelical Churches with great insistence, as above criticism and essential to the life of religion. He does not persuade us of its truth when tested by the realities of life, and, above all, the reality of the life of Jesus himself.

To the same review Dr. Emil Reich contributes a first article on "The Crisis in Hungary," and there are two valuable social articles, the one by Sir Edmund Verney on "Iniquities of Poor Law Administration," the other by Mr. W. H. Dawson on "The German Working Man and Protection," a striking object-lesson on the evil of the taxation of food.

In the Nineteenth Century and After we note Sir Alexander Baird's brief article on "How Poor-Law Guardians Spend their Money in Scotland" and the earnest plea of Miss Violet Markham's article, "The True Foundation of Empire: The Home and the Workshop."

Mr. C. L. Hind continues in The World's Work and Play his story of the "Education of an Artist," taking him to Florence and other Italian cities. There are a number of very interesting illustrations. In this same number will also be found an answer to the question: "Might we eat much less and be better for it?" The answer is chiefly "Nuts," but other things also of Food Reform.

MUSINGS.

By A Minister.

XXIX.

"Babbler," in our version, does not say all that the Athenian philosophers may have meant by their own Greek word, when they gathered round the apostle with his "new teaching" in their market-place. "Seed-picker," given at first to grain-loving birds, was a common name for any picker-up of unconsidered trifles. If I remember rightly, it was used of pilferers, hanging round the altars at the time of sacrifice, and this would add another sting to the use of the word on this occasion. In any case it had come to be a nickname for those whose brains, it was thought, could only be furnished with stray grains of learning. "Dabbler" would be nearer to the sense, perhaps, than "babbler."

The smatterer has always been an offence to scholars, and they have been careful to keep him at right distance from themselves. Thus he was once the literator, as distinct from the literatus—as we might say, a literate, not a graduate—or the grammatista, not to be confused with the grammaticus, just as in later days he has been marked off as a gobemouche, a dilettante, a sciolist. It consoles him, however, to know that scholars have in their turn been the sport of wits, and have not been allowed to be anything more than pedants, pedagogues, book-worms. Bentley himself, greatest of scholars, has been spoken of as a scholiast,

> Mighty scholiast, whose unweary'd pains
> Made Horace dull, and bumbled Milton's strains, and the Reverend Doctor Dryasdust would never have been invented, if it had not been felt that learning may be both venerable and ridiculous.

I am myself a proudly humble member of the fraternity of smatterers. Is a little learning, after all, so dangerous a thing? There are time-honoured Latin jests about smelling slightly of philosophy, touching knowledge with the tip of the tongue, and so on. They affect us not. We are content to open our beaks to the grains that come within our reach. We move round the outer circle, too weak for the inner fray. I am not sure that ours is not the better portion. To borrow a phrase from Elia, we have the four quarters of the globe on our side, at the least computation, and we have amongst us birds of as fine a feather as eye would wish to see. Elia himself is one of us, and—dare I say it?—Shakespeare also, the great untaught, whose biographers are never tired of telling us how many things he only slightly knew. A little learning is dangerous, and wrong besides, if we pretend to have devoured, when we have only tasted; but it is harmless enough if, as long as it is little, it is made little of. To dabble is not necessarily to babble.

But, in St. Paul's case, how far was this sneer of the "Epicureans and Stoics" justified? It could not have come from observation, for the apostle had only just appeared amongst them. Nor, from our study of him now, should we say that he had ever been superficial. Gamaliel's pupil, if he knew little, knew that little thoroughly. We may take it that he speaks truly of himself when he says: "Though I be rude in speech, yet am I not in knowledge." "Touching the law, a Pharisee"; "Instructed according to the strict manner of the law"; these are his testimonials, so far as the learning of his own country is concerned. If his acquaintance with Greek literature is not very deep, he at least makes no display; there are but three classical quotations in all the writings ascribed to him; though his student days in Tarsus, and his sojourning in many cities, must have made him familiar with many more. "Seed-picker," in this instance, is most likely one of those terms which, losing their first connection, are terms of abuse, and nothing else.

As for the apostle's critics, they too were criticised, and, oddly enough, in Roman criticism Balbutit Epicurus, Balbutiens Stoicus, are the very words used. In plain English, they also, in some things, were thought to be "babblers." As for St. Paul, he gloried in hard names, and could think without shame of the "foolishness" of preaching.

A UNIQUE EVENT.

What may fairly be described as a unique event in the life of our scattered congregations occurred on Saturday, the 7th inst., when upwards of twenty members of one of our Lancashire churches journeyed a hundred miles to pay a half-day visit to the members of a sister congregation, worshipping in the great industrial centre of "leafy Warwickshire." It came about in this wise: as all the (Unitarian) world knows, or ought to know, the congregation at Ashton-under-Lyne is about to provide itself with a permanent religious home, in place of the temporary corrugated iron structure in which it has worshipped for the last four years. Now it happens that the accepted design of the building that is to be follows almost exactly that according to which the Waverley-road Church, Small Heath, Birmingham, was erected. By what cannot but be regarded as a singular combination of circumstances, Rev. W. C. Hall, who had ministered at Ashton for upwards of seven years, on relinquishing his charge there six months ago, took up the work at Small Heath. What was more natural, therefore, than that the members of the Lancashire congregation should wish to see, in actual brick and stone, the prototype of their own projected sanctuary, and have the added pleasure of a meeting with their old pastor and friend? And what was a railway journey of a hundred miles—even in view of the midnight homeward ride, and the return in the still, "small hours"—to a band of Lancashire enthusiasts? The interest aroused in the novel idea culminated in the visit paid on Saturday last, when, accompanied by their minister (Rev. H. Kelsey White), twenty-three members of the Richmond-hill congregation undertook the long journey to the Midland church. Nothing could have exceeded, in warmth and cordiality, the welcome which minister and members extended to the Northerners on their arrival. Of the sumptuous repast generously prepared for them by the Waverley-road ladies; of the speeches—ministerial and "lay"—expressive, on the one hand, of the open-hearted hospitality of the entertainers, and, on the other, of the gratitude of the guests; of the pleasant evening spent in the schoolroom in the enjoyment of the impromptu concert; of the characteristic keenness of the interest displayed by the shrewd Ashtonians in the minutest details of design and workmanship when the church came to be inspected; and of the hundred-and-one questions, criticisms, and suggestions to which the architect (Mr. Grew) found himself called upon to listen; of the fine spirit of camaraderie and good fellowship which prevailed throughout; of all these things space forbids us to make more than this brief mention. Reference, however, must not be omitted to the beautiful devotional service held in the church immediately after tea, and in the conduct of which the ministers of the two distant congregations who had thus, for a few minutes, joined hearts and voices, took part.

What might otherwise have proved the tedium of the homeward journey was happily dispelled by the excellent arrangements which the secretary of the visiting congregation (Mr. S. Wilkinson), assisted admirably by the ladies, had made for the comfort and convenience of the party. And though they were rather a sleepy band that alighted at Ashton long after midnight had chimed, all agreed that it had been a most enjoyable and inspiriting experience.

OBITUARY.

MR. RICHARD STEPHENSON.

On Friday, September 29, passed away after a long sickness, heroically borne, Mr. Richard Stephenson, of Rochdale-road, Todmorden, foreman joiner and clerk the works to Messrs. Fielden Brothers. He was a man of wide interests, and varied service. As a zealous co-operator, Forester, member of the Free Library Committee, and of the Council of the Liberal Club, he did useful and much appreciated work. Brought up in the Unitarian Sunday School, he saw the building of the present fine church, and the enlargement of the school on two occasions. He was a faithful and hard-working supporter of both. For nearly twenty-three years he was Secretary of the congregation, in which office his shrewd business capacity and wise counsel were of much help in difficult times. He was Superintendent of the school for a period of three years, and at his death he was still an active member of the Church Committee. When he retired from the secretaryship of the church some years ago, he received a handsome presentation in acknowledgment of his faithful and devoted services. His funeral took place on October 3, which was atended by a representative body of citizens, which showed the esteem in which he was held. Most of the institutions mentioned above sent delegates; the firm for which he worked so long and faithfully, was represented by its manager and secretary; the Mayor, with others, represented the Co-operative Society; and the Librarian, with several members of the Library Committee, attended on behalf of that institution. The Foresters also sent delegates, while the flag on the Liberal Club hung half-mast high from the time of his death until his burial. On Sunday, October 8, a memorial service was held in the Unitarian church, which was attended by a large and representative body of citizens. The minister, preaching on "A man skilful in his business," recalled the many services of the deceased to the town, and to the church and Sunday school. At the close of his address, the "Dead March in Saul," was played with deep feeling by the organist of the church. Mr. Stephenson's loss will be severely felt by the many bodies which he served so well; by none more than by his old friends of the Unitarian church and school, for whom he worked so hard, and to whom he was so dear.

It will be a source of deep regret to many who have visited Hull in recent years in connection with Park-street Church to hear of the severe loss the Church has suffered by the sudden death of its honoured Treasurer, Mr. Donald Wilson. There will be very few who have not stayed at his hospitable house or experienced his thoughtful interest and unwearied solicitude on their behalf. We mourn the loss of one who showed forth in strong simplicity the beauty of the religion he professed. He was the very type of a Christian gentleman. Condemned on ordinary standards to a life of inactivity, through an accident in childhood, he yet devoted his abilities and education (he was a graduate of Lincoln College, Oxford) unsparingly and ungrudgingly to his church and city. With entire self-effacement and suppression of his suffering he carried his gospel of Oxford culture and Christian faith into all he did, whether as teacher in the Sunday-school, or treasurer of the church, or secretary of the town's literary club. He was ever busy in good works, so cheerily that he compelled you to forget his pain, so courageously that he made you oblivious of his weakness, so unobtrusively that few can tell of half his deeds, and so graciously that you felt the presence of the Master's spirit and the power of the Father's love.

A large and representative gathering assembled on Monday last at his graveside, testifying to the widespread appreciation of his character and work. It was fitting that among the many letters of condolence received by his sorrowing mother there should be one from the Mayor of Hull expressing, on behalf of the citizens, the loss which the city sustained by his early death.

The doctrine of development is an endeavour to explain the method of creation, and can no more be held to dispense with a creator than an explanation of the metre of a song can be construed into denial of the existence of a poet.—H. W. Crosskey.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

In the stories last week of the lost kitten and the lost lamb, disobedience brought its own punishment. Both the kitten and the lamb were very miserable before they were found and taken back. And I used to imagine that they were both sorry for having run away. But I felt a difference. Though I could not explain why, I liked the lost lamb better, and felt that it was more sorry than the kitten. I have wondered about it since when showing the pictures and telling the stories to one child after another. This is how I explain it now, and even if it is not true of kittens and lambs, it is perhaps true of ourselves.

The kitten was sorry because it was miserable. It had been scared by a big dog. It had fallen into a milkcan, and been beaten by the milkman. It was tired and hungry and felt strange and lost and wished it had not run away. It was sorry because it was miserable—very sorry for itself.

The lamb, too, was miserable. It was hungry and weary, and scared, and felt lost and alone, and wanted its mother. It wished it had not run away and was in some vague way ashamed of having been disobedient—sorry for its own naughtiness.

They both learned something of the dangers of the world and the safety of home. In the story of the lamb we think much of the mother sheep's distress, the shepherd's tender care, and the glad welcome home. Even if we do not imagine the lamb itself coming home ashamed and sorry, we know that in the lamb's place we should ourselves feel ashamed of our disobedience.

It is a poor sort of regret that makes us only sorry for ourselves. It is only when we are sorry for our own naughtiness that we are truly ashamed.

"Do you love me, mother?" once asked a little boy. "Yes," was the answer. "Even when I'm naughty?" "Yes."

Another day came the same question, the same answer. "Do you love me, mother?" "Yes." "Even when I'm naughty?" "Yes." And again it came, as if the child wanted to be quite, quite sure, and could not hear it too often.

The love that loves us even when we are naughty—that is what makes us most ashamed of being naughty—the love of our parents, the love of our Father in Heaven. How can we grieve and disappoint the love that loves us always, loves us even when we are naughty?

Other people may not like us if we are cross, careless, unkind, or selfish. What they think of us may make us ashamed. But it is the thought of the home love and of the Divine love that makes us most truly ashamed. It makes us so sorry for having been naughty, that any misery to ourselves seems only what we deserve. We want to own up, to say how sorry we are, and that we will try not to be naughty again.

And it is not enough to say how sorry we are. We need to show it by going on trying, by remembering. What is the good of saying, "Oh, I'm so sorry," and then forgetting all about it and doing the same thing again?

Two little girls were coming out of school one day, and whilst the mother of the very little one stayed behind for a minute to speak to the teacher, the two children were alone in the road. The elder one thought it would be great fun to go off by themselves. "No," said the little one, "Mother would be frightened." These two had run away together once before, and whilst one of them had forgotten the other one remembered, for she had been trying very hard day by day to be good.

It is the remembering that is so difficult. Most of us want to be good. If we are cross to those at home, or to our companions, if we are rough or unkind to anyone, we feel ashamed. But how often do we forget and do the same again? It is the love that loves us even when we are naughty, that helps us to remember, helps us to go on trying day by day.

Did you ever hear of the great Italian poet, Dante, who lived 600 years ago? He was banished by enemies from his native city of Florence, and was never allowed to go back. So he spent his life as a lonely wanderer, thinking of Florence and longing to return.

Dante considered shame and obedience to be two of the things most needful in young people.

He wrote a great poem in which he tells how he himself had been made to feel ashamed, and how he was helped to remember.

He tells how he had gone astray from the right path, and was lost in a dark wood, where he was very miserable, till at last a gentle guide came to lead him back to the path of right. It was a long, difficult journey, and on the way they saw many people bearing pain and punishment of different kinds.

First they came to a dark, dark place, shut out from the light of day, and from the stars by night. Here are those who are not ashamed, who are only sorry for themselves, and for the misery of their own punishment. Everything about them is ugly, like the faults to which they still cling. The angry people go on being angry, the violent ones are still violent, the sulky ones are still sulky; and they are none of them ashamed, none of them sorry—except for themselves. So they go on being violent or angry or sulky, and grow no better; but this is only the beginning of the poem.

Dante then tells how his guide takes him out again into the light, and they together visit the people who are ashamed, sorry for their wrong-doing, and anxious to learn better. They do not escape punishment—they do not even wish to escape punishment; for they feel the love through it all, and know that it is helping them to remember; helping them to turn away from the wrong and cling to the right.

Here the proud are willingly carrying heavy loads, bowed down with the weight, sorry for their past pride, and learning to be humble. The greedy are gladly bearing their punishment of hunger and thirst. The angry are living without complaint in a cloud of smoke; in sorrow untying the knot of anger; getting rid of the angry smoke in their own hearts.

They are all sorry, they are all learning to remember, and they are all growing better, growing nearer to the Divine love that is with them through all—the love that loved them even when they were disobedient.

IN RELIGIOUS FELLOWSHIP.

THE call to service, which comes at this season of the year with special urgency, bids us seek not only a more strenuous faithfulness in active work of whatever kind that makes for the common good, but for a larger measure of the true spirit, in the strength and calmness of faith, with better wisdom and a deeper insight, in the happy union of worship and brotherly fellowship in the Church. This is always an essential need, when we look out upon our work and consider the equipment we have for its accomplishment, that we should keep the sources of our inspiration fresh and pure; and this we must do both in the secret places of our individual life, in our homes, and in the religious union of the church.

In the hurry and stress of life we are too often apt to forget or to neglect those sources of our strength. Let this new season of our work find us all guarding with greater faithfulness and more earnest purpose the quiet times of our communion, doing more to strengthen that fellowship in the deeper life, that so we may receive the greater gifts and be better fitted for our work.

There is a perennial freshness in that thought of our fellowship in the church. We are there, in touch with the Eternal. There is no stint in the flow of the waters of life, if only we are there with open heart, with quiet receptive spirit, with surrendered will — there, in the presence of GOD, to let Him speak to us, that His strength may flow through the channels of our dutiful endeavour, and the vision of eternal things may be granted us. We can always go back to the quiet places of our fellowship, however poor our service in the past has been, however dry and barren the land has seemed to be, where we have been forgetful of the things of GOD. We may go back, and know that now there may be a new spring of life in us; with a new spirit of faithfulness and reverent, earnest seeking we may do our part to make the place of prayer purer in the quiet atmosphere of devotion, filled with a new gladness in thanksgiving, with more sincere affection and the joy of human brotherhood, resting in the constant sense of the Eternal Goodness.

We must come, and give ourselves Come with earnest and persistent seeking, asking nothing but that the FATHER'S will may be done, in us and through us, and that we may be permitted to drink of the living waters and be used according to our strength in some unselfish service.

With each new year it can be as with the exhilaration of a new adventure, because we know that GOD "hath yet more light and truth to break forth from His Word," and it is a universe divine and filled with the promise of life in which we have our home. So we may trust and worship and rejoice, but always in the strength of faithful service.

When we speak, of the exhilaration of a new adventure, that does not imply a mere running after novelties. The Eternal is in the old truths and in the old simplicities of duty and affection, no less than in any fresh unfolding of truth that may be revealed to us, and we are to seek the new adventure of a deeper, more rejoicing life as much in a more perfect obedience to the old truths in which there is the strength of the Eternal, and in the old sympathies and affections—only, at last being really true to them, and in the simplicity of child-like confidence and the home love, in our common brotherhood, living together with God in the world.

Might there not be a wonderful renewal of life in our fellowship, if in every place of prayer all the people whose home was there came with a common purpose, if there was truly united worship and rejoicing in the hymns of praise, if all things were done with a new simplicity and earnestness, if the prayers were not merely read, but prayed, by the minister and by the people all together, if the great prophetic words of Scripture were read, not by a clerical voice, but by a man with natural utterance, with the sincerity of clear insight and genuine conviction, if the preaching was more largely of what touches deepest sympathies, kindles aspiration and endeavour and ministers to human needs, if when a stranger came in he felt at once the presence of a worshipping spirit and the restfulness of sympathy and brotherly kindness? All this, and much more, each one in his own place, whether minister or other member of the congregation, may help to give to the fellowship of his church, and in giving receive the greater blessing.

JOHN EDWARD TAYLOR.

"HE never swerved in his ideal of the true function of a great newspaper. To him his paper was much more than a property; it was a public trust, and its reputation was as dear to him as his own." So it was written in the Manchester Guardian of Friday week of Mr. JOHN EDWARD TAYLOR, who died at Eastbourne on Oct. 5, the son of JOHN EDWARD TAYLOR, the elder, the founder (in 1821) of the Manchester Guardian, and himself its proprietor to the end of his life. "It is to the lasting honour of Mr. TAYLOR that from earliest manhood to old age he held steadfastly to a high ideal of public duty; that he sought, so far as in him lay, to keep his paper sound and wholesome; that its quality, its character, its reputation were for him ends in themselves, quite apart from any material advantage which they might bring. For him, unless a paper could be carried on in the spirit of an honourable gentleman it was not worth carrying on at all. So much we may perhaps be allowed to say, not in self-praise, for it may well be that performance has not kept pace with promise, but in justice to one who in life was content to ask for no public recognition, but who in death should not be denied his due."

A grandson of the Rev. JOHN TAYLOR, of Ilminster, who afterwards became a member of the Society of Friends, and on his mother's side of the Rev. RUSSELL SCOTT, of Portsmouth, Mr. TAYLOR was born at Manchester, Feb. 2, 1830. Of the schools he attended, one was the Rev. J. R. BEARD'S, another, University College School, London. For some months, while engaged on his father's paper in 1848 he attended lectures in Manchester New College, where JAMES MARTINEAU and FRANCIS W. NEWMAN were then lecturing. His father had died in January, 1844, and in 1849 the death of his elder brother brought upon his shoulders the heavy responsibility of the Manchester Guardian. The rest of his life, though during the greater part of it he lived in London, was closely identified with the prosperous and influential career of that paper.

For fifty years Mr. TAYLOR had been a trustee of Manchester College, and he was one of the early supporters of Owens College; he took a deep and practical interest also in elementary education. He was a staunch Free Trader and a generous friend of Art. "In later life," we quote again from the Manchester Guardian, "MR. TAYLOR took a deep and abiding interest in another great question affecting the lives of the poor—that of temperance—and his strong feeling on this subject helped to stimulate and deepen his convictions in the whole range of domestic politics. Indeed there took place with him a process the converse of that commonly attributed to advancing years. Age brought to him no weakening of popular sympathies, no narrowing of the outlook upon life; above all, no tolerance of high-handed wrong, whether committed by others or by ourselves. To the modern materialism, to the new assertion of the ancient doctrine that might is right, to the plea for national selfishness as the true guide of the policy of States he remained irreconcilably opposed, and in the strength of this antagonism he was fired in his age with something of the ardour of youth."

Those who through many trying years have read and been grateful to the Manchester Guardian, and we count ourselves among their number, will honour this man's memory.

THE REV. SAMUEL A. ELIOT, D.D.

DR. ELIOT, who has been for some years President of the American Unitarian Association, has been invited to succeed the Rev. James Eels as minister of the First Church in Boston. This, we suppose, is the most honourable position in the Unitarian ministry in America, which it must have been very hard to decline. Dr. Eliot's many friends in this country will be glad to see his reply, and will honour him for it:—

"There is no church that I would more gladly serve than the First Church in Boston. My ancestors were among the founders of the society. The names of its ministers are writ large in the history of the city I love best. They are names which stand for the primacy of religion among all the interests of the Commonwealth, for the dignity of the ordinances of Christian worship, for freedom, toleration, and public serviceableness. I particularly value just such traditions and associations as you ask me to perpetuate. I recognise, too, the opportunity to make the First Church the centre and dynamic of the forces in our community that promote pure religion and civic righteousness. Nevertheless, I am reluctantly constrained to the decision that I cannot accept the invitation with which you have honoured me, and the duties which are to me particularly congenial and inspiring.

"I have not yet completed the tasks which I undertook when my fellow-workers in all our churches called me to the office which I now hold. I am engaged in enterprises for the promotion of religious liberty and Christian efficiency in this country from which I cannot honourably withdraw until they are proved to be either impracticable or assuredly successful. Generous friends have entrusted to me the administration of funds for these causes. Brave comrades in all parts of the country look to me for sympathy and support. Unfinished undertakings challenge my pluck and patience; and I cannot bring myself to believe that it is right for me at this time to abandon these adventures for the honours, the emoluments, the more delightful duties of the minister of the First Church."

NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE anniversary of this Association was held on Sunday and Monday, the 1st and 2nd inst., in the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle-on-Tyne. The annual sermons were preached by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesbrough, President of the Association: in the morning on "Can we outgrow Christianity?" and in the evening on "What Unitarianism stands for."

At the annual meeting on Monday afternoon the annual report was presented by the Secretary, the Rev. Francis Wood, of Sunderland, and told of a good deal of earnest work done during the year, under conditions of more than usual difficulty and limitation. Particular mention was made of the resuscitation of the District Lay Preachers' Association, mainly through the enthusiasm and energy of the President. Special reference was made to the churches at South Shields, Choppington, Byker, and Barnard Castle, to whose needs the Committee had given a great deal of attention and the hope was expressed that the first-mentioned congregation, in particular, might see its way to secure the services of a regular minister. Grateful tribute was paid to the memory of members of the association who had passed away during the year; especial mention being made of the late Miss Mary Lambert, of Newcastle, who for many years had served on the Committee, and after whose decease the Association had received the sum of £25, a joint gift from herself and her surviving sister, Miss Lambert. Mention was also made of the removal of the Rev. H. Cross from Stockton, to take up the duties of Assistant Missionary to the Yorkshire Union, and of the recent settlement of the Rev. A. Thornhill at Carlisle, and the Rev. R. H. Maister at Stockton. The financial statement showed a balance of about £30 in the hands of the Treasurer.

A good deal of the time of the meeting was taken up with the consideration of a new constitution which a resolution of the last annual meeting had directed the Committee to prepare, and the object of which was to give the Association a more distinctly democratic and representative character. There were some members of the meeting who felt bound to protest against any change, and to plead for the continuance of the form of organisation which had served so long, and, it was urged, so well. But the bulk of these present were in favour of the alteration—the idea of which, indeed, had been in the air for some years—and eventually the new Constitution was adopted by an almost unanimous vote. The name of the Association will now be "The Northern Counties' Unitarian Association."

At the public meeting in the evening the chair was occupied by the President, Rev. W. H. Lambelle, who was supported by the Mayor of Newcastle, Ald. J. Baxter Ellis, J.P., the Rev. C. Hargrove, of Leeds, representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Revs. F. Wood, G. A. Ferguson, A. Thornhill, R. H. Maister and Mr. F. Martland, Financial Secretary.

In his opening address the Chairman spoke with thankfulness of the work which the Association had been able to accomplish during the year. The Mayor of Newcastle extended a hearty welcome to the Rev. C. Hargrove, both in his personal and representative capacity, and Mr. Hargrove, in responding, referred to a recently expressed opinion of the Rev. R. J. Campbell's that "Unitarianism to-day is a spent force." That, he said, depended entirely on what was meant by Unitarianism. If all that was meant by it was the negation of certain now generally discredited dogmas, the statement might be accepted as correct, though it should not be forgotten how much Unitarianism had done in combating and refuting these dogmas; but if it meant an open mind towards all the advances of modern knowledge, then it was by no means a spent force, for it was just that spirit of open-mindedeness which was needed to deal satisfactorily with the problems of present-day thought. Until those problems were solved, and solved in such a way as to satisty alike the intelligence and the heart of mankind, there was still much work for Unitarianism to accomplish. Unitarianism stood for three prime principles: Liberty, intellectual honesty, and religion; for those deep instincts and impulses of the spirit, those aspirations, affections, and hopes, which carried in themselves their own authority. Although their chapels and churches were never crowded, Jesus had said, "Where two or three are met together, there am I in the midst."

Rev. F. WOOD moved, and Mr. C. M. SLATER seconded, a vote of welcome to the two new ministers of the district, the Revs. A. Thornhill and R. H. Maister, to which they responded.

The usual vote of thanks, moved by Rev. G. A. Ferguson, and seconded by Mr. E. H. Coysh, and the singing of "Nearer, my God, to Thee," brought the meeting to a close.

NORTH MIDLAND PRESBYTERIAN AND UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of this Association, the hundred-and-seventh anniversary of the District Association of Presbyterian Ministers, and the forty-eighth of the North Midland Unitarian Association, was held on Monday and Tuesday at Mansfield. The last occasion when the Association met at Mansfield was in 1901, when the centenary of the Old Meeting was celebrated. At that meeting Mr. J. Harrop White was elected President, and on Tuesday he resigned the office into other hands, after a tenure of four years, which has been of eminent service to the churches of the district.

On Monday evening the members of the Association and friends were hospitably entertained by the President and Mrs. Harrop White at a Conversazione in the Town Hall. The attendance numbered about 150.

After the reception of guests, the President, on behalf of the Mansfield congregation, extended a cordial welcome to the visitors. They had in Mansfield, he said, a church of old foundation, and of not uninfluential character, a church which was in friendly relations with other religious bodies in the town, but many congregations in the Association's district were not so fortunately situated. They were isolated, small, and struggling, and it must be of very great advantage to congregations such as those to have an opportunity of meeting with other churches upon an occasion such as they had that evening, where, in mutual intercourse, they could gain strength, and go back to their work with renewed vigour, a better spirit, and a greater hope. They met there under circumstances which were somewhat sad. There were some whom they missed, and they especially thought of their friend, the Rev. E. W. Lummis, of Leicester, and regretted the serious illness which had overtaken him, and which had removed temporarily from the work of the district one of their most brilliant ministers. They hoped he would be speedily restored to health. The Mansfield congregation, he went on to say, met under the shadow of an impending separation, as their minister was shortly leaving them. Mr. Fripp's departure would be a very great loss to the town. There were one or two subjects for congratulation. They welcomed that evening, for the first time, delegates from the newly-established church at Shirebrook, a church in which he hoped the old Meeting House would take a deep interest. This new church afforded an opportunity for missionary zeal, especially on the part of the younger members of the Old Meeting, and he hoped they would rise to the occasion, and would feel that this church was a charge committed to their care, and that it was their duty to do all they could to help it. He was glad to hear from the secretary that the reports received from the congregations throughout the district were encouraging. Although they might not be many in numbers, and although they might be scattered, let them feel there was good work for them to do; let them go forward in hope, feeling that a sacred trust had been reposed in them, and that they had a duty to perform not only for their individual churches, but for all the churches in the district of the Association.

Mr. Gallimore, of Nottingham, in the absence of Mr. B. Dowson, responded to the welcome. A programme of music rendered by Mr. J. H. Allin's band and two soloists, added to the enjoyment of the evening.

The Religious Service.

A meeting of the Committee and of the Governing Body on Tuesday morning, was followed by a religious service in the Old Meeting, conducted by the Rev. W. H. Burgess, who has recently settled at Loughborough, with charge also of the Ilkeston congregation. The lessons were Isaiah xxxv. and passages from Rev. xxi. and xxii. The hymns included: "One holy Church of God appears," "City of God, how broad and far," and "Thou Lord of Hosts, whose guiding hand." The sermon was preached by the Rev. W. J. Jupp, of Croydon, from the text Rev. xxii. 1 and 2. "He showed me a river of water of life . . . . and the tree of life . . . . and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations." True life, and the wisdom of those who will seek it, was the subject of the sermon, which went straight to the heart and conscience of the hearers—a sermon of "transparent sincerity and the finest passion, very simple, and full of profound thought." So Mr. Fripp characterised it, in offering the thanks of the Association to the preacher at the subsequent meeting, and as we shall very soon publish the sermon in full (perhaps next week), no summary of it is attempted here.

The collection on behalf of the Association amounted to £5 6s. 5d.

At the conclusion of the service luncheon was served at the quaint old Swan Hotel.

The Business Meeting.

The annual business meeting was held in the chapel in the afternoon, Mr. Harrop White, the President, in the chair.

The Roll was called by the hon. secretary, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, who read a letter of regret for absence from Mr. Edwin Clepham, of Leicester, who was in the South of England.

The report of the committee, with the reports from the congregations of the district, had been previously circulated in proof, and were taken as read.

Mr. B. Dowson, the treasurer, presented the accounts, which, however, owing to the early date of the meeting and some delay in taking collections and sending in subscriptions, were not complete. A balance of 7s. 5d. had been brought forward from the previous year, and a balance of £45 13s. 9d. from the Missionary Fund had been transferred to the general account, as the special purpose of the former had passed into the work of sustaining the joint ministry at Loughborough and Ilkeston. Grants in aid of congregations received from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association amounted to £121 5s. He reckoned that by the end of the year they would have spent about £30 beyond their income, and he appealed to members of the churches to give to their work an adequate support.

The Report.

The Report of the Committee opened with the following passages:—

"The present position of the Churches of the North Midland district appears to be more secure than it has been for some time past.

"The scheme, referred to in our last report, for linking together Loughborough and Ilkeston was approved by the B. and F. U. A., and the two congregations are now under the pastoral care of the Rev. W. H. Burgess, B.A., late of Accrington. Mr. Burgess resides at Loughborough, but the railway facilities enable him to keep in more intimate touch with Ilkeston than was at first thought possible. The committee recognise the difficulties of the scheme, but they look forward with every confidence to the result of Mr. Burgess's labours.

"It was a pleasure to the Committee to receive the Free Christian Church, Shirebrook, into the fellowship of this Association. This church has had an interesting origin and growth, and during its development has shown much courage and enterprise. It has been fortunate in securing the personal advice and support of the President of this Association, and the active encouragement of the Mansfield congregation. It is hoped that in these difficult early stages the Shirebrook friends will sustain their enthusiasm and feel assured of the practical sympathy and aid of the North Midland Association."

Sympathetic reference was made to the death of the Rev. Arthur Harvie, of Northampton, and the Rev. Peter Dean, of Loughborough, and also to the illness of the Rev. E. W. Lummis, who has been obliged to resign his charge at Leicester. The retirement of the Rev. J. Kertain Smith, after long years of devoted service, was also noted, and the coming departure of the Rev. E. I. Fripp from Mansfield for Clifton. On the other hand, three new-comers to the district were welcomed, the Rev. T. J. Jenkins to Hinckley, the Rev. W. H. Burgess to Loughborough, and the Rev. D. J. Williams, of Merthyr, and formerly of Newark, to Belper. Cordial recognition of the services of the lay preachers was made, and the report concluded as follows:—

"Your Committee desire to say that they are gratified to observe many hopeful features in the reports of the congregations. They rejoice to notice the marked progress made at Bradwell, and the excellent spirit which animates that congregation and its lay minister, Mr. Smith. They recognise with admiration the fidelity of the weaker churches who labour under many and great disadvantages. They, no less than the stronger congregations, are consecrated to the great cause of Liberal Religion, and 'all service ranks the same with God.' All are united in one common duty and one common privilege to work bravely with undiscouraged zeal, that they may finally inherit the ancient promise: 'Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the Kingdom.'"

The President, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts and their circulation, together with the detailed reports from the congregations of the district, referred to what had been done to put the trust of the Lincoln Chapel on a proper footing, and their great disappointment at the action of the local trustees in deciding to keep the renovated chapel still closed until the debt had been paid off. He hoped that better counsels would prevail, and their friends at Lincoln would realise their responsibility, and reopen the chapel once more. He spoke hopefully of the prospects of the linked ministry at Loughborough and Ilkeston, and of the efforts of Mr. Lindsey at Christ Church, Nottingham, and Newark. For the maintenance of such work they needed a strong band of lay preachers, and he expressed their gratitude for what was being done on those lines. Of the work at Bradwell and Shirebrook he also spoke with admiration. Since the Association last met in Mansfield, four years ago, he reckoned that, counting Mr. Fripp as already gone to Clifton, only five of their ministers remained in that district in the same pulpits. He trusted that they might now be entering on a period of more settled service. Turning to finance, he pointed out how serious their position would have been, if it had not been for the balance of the Mission fund, and he emphasised the Treasurer's appeal to their friends to feel that the claims of their present work must be met.

The Rev. J. KERTAIN SMITH seconded the motion, which was carried.

A cordial welcome was then offered to the three ministers newly come into the district, the Revs. T. J. Jenkins, W. H. Burgess, and D. J. Williams, on the motion of Mr. F. W. Price of Leicester, seconded by the Rev. W. Stoddart. Mr. Jenkins and Mr. Williams briefly responded; and Mr. Dowson then proposed, and the Rev. G. von Petzold seconded, a resolution of welcome to the Rev. H. Gow, representing the National Conference, and the Rev. V. D. Davis, representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

The Rev. HENRY GOW, in responding, said it was a great pleasure to him to be among old friends again, and recalling his own experience as secretary of that association, congratulated them on the exceptionally hopeful reports which had been presented. As to the National Conference, he urged that members of their churches should take a keener interest in it. At present the Conference had no financial power, and he hoped the churches would feel that the fact that they could now get nothing out of it. but had something to give, ought not to lessen their interest.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS also responded and having referred to his early association with that district, to which he had come twenty-five years ago, he proceeded to speak of the work of the Association he represented, of their desire to sustain missionary efforts in different parts of the country, and of their publication of liberal religious literature. He asked the members of the churches to realise that such work was theirs also, that they must do their part in making the books known; they might do great good by putting the sixpenny reprints of such books as Mr. Armstrong's "God and the Soul" and Mr. Carpenter's "First Three Gospels" in the hands of earnest, thoughtful people. He spoke also of Mr. Armstrong's lectures on "Agnosticism and Theism" which had been delivered only a year ago at two centres in their district, and of the publication of that book.

Mr. FRANKLIN WINSER moved a vote of very cordial thanks to Mr. Harrop White for his services as President during the past four years. Both he and Mr. Lloyd Thomas, who seconded, spoke very warmly of the devoted work Mr. White had done for the Association, and especially of the personal attention he had given to the smaller churches, which he had visited, and where he had occasionally preached. Their thanks were also due to Mrs. Harrop White for the admirable way in which she had supported her husband's work.

The PRESIDENT, in responding, spoke with much feeling of his life-long connection with the Old Meeting and his desire to do something to serve the cause to which he owed so much. He and his wife had both grown up there, and if he had been able to go out and do some helpful work, he was very thankful.

He then proposed, and Mr Winser seconded, the election of Mr. William Moss, J.P., as President, and this being cordially agreed to, Mr. Moss took the chair and conducted the rest of the meeting.

The other officers were re-elected, Mr. Harrop-White's name being added to the list of Vice-Presidents, on the motion of the Rev. W. Lindsay, seconded by Mr. W. A. Vallance.

On the motion of the Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS, seconded by Mr. G. Bryan, an alteration of the rules was agreed to, by which the Lay-preachers Union became entitled to appoint a member to serve on the Committee.

A cordial vote of thanks to Mr. Burgess and Mr. Jupp for their services that morning, was passed on the motion of the Rev. E. I. Fripp, seconded by Mr. Charles A. Smith of Bradwell. The election of the Committee took place by ballot and a resolution of gratitude to the lay-preachers was passed. A final resolution of thanks to the Mansfield congregation concluded the proceedings.

After tea in the school-room a conference took place, over which Mr. Harrop White presided. The Rev. Henry Gow read a paper on "Free Catholic Christianity according to Dr. Hunter," giving an account of the sermon preached by Dr. Hunter at last year's meeting of the Association at Nottingham, and since published as a little book. An interesting discussion followed, in which Mr. C. A. Smith, the Rev. W. J. Jupp, Mr. G. Bryan, the Revs. W. Lindsay and V. D. Davis, Miss Gittins, the Revs. W. H. Burgess and E. I. Fripp, and the chairman took part. Mr. Gow having briefly replied, the meeting closed with the Benediction pronounced by Mr. Fripp.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

THE session was formerly opened on Thursday afternoon, October 5, when the opening address was delivered by the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., in the library of the new Collegiate Residence, Summerville, Victoria-park. Manchester. There was a much larger attendance than usual.

Colonel JESSE PILCHER, who occupied the chair, said that the session opened with 11 students in residence; and, in addition, two old students who were working for their B.D. degree—the Rev. J. H. Rossington, M.A., and Mr. MacLachlin, M.A., past and present Hibbert scholars respectively. Furthermore, Mr. Madgavkar, of Bombay, a member of the Brahmo Samaj, who is in England for the purpose of taking a medical degree, is admitted into residence as a lay student. They were extremely fortunate in securing the services of Miss Panton Ham as matron, and he was sure that there would be a readiness on the part of all to make her position as pleasant and easy as possible, and to lend her a helping hand, in any direction in which it may be required. With regard to the building, its sanitary, heating, and lighting arrangements had been entirely replaced on up-to date principles. They had furnished with an eye to strict economy, and equally with a view to fitness and durability. The £20,000 required had not yet been received, between £4,000 and £5,000 was still necessary; but he had no doubt whatever that when they got thoroughly to work, and showed their friends the eminent advantages of the change, the money would be raised. One of the aims of the college authorities would be to strengthen the link between the college and the churches, by affording intercourse between students, ministers, and laity, and thus promoting a feeling of brotherhood. They had never been remote from the life of the churches; but there they could strengthen the bond of sympathy. If they were to have strong churches they must have strong colleges. His prayer was that the divine blessing might rest upon their labour, and that they might all prove worthy of being labourers in the great cause they had at heart.

The Rev. J. E. MANNING then delivered his address on "Origen, of Alexandria, as Teacher, Apologist, and Biblical Scholar." It was listened to with marked interest.

Of the meeting held last Thursday to celebrate the opening of the new residence, a full report will appear in our next issue.

RATIONALISM.

SIR,—Mr. Lloyd is good enough to make a courteous reference to my brief note. He objects to the translation of the word "Tao" by "Reason." It is difficult, no doubt, to put it into English, but if we call it "Way" or "Direction" we do not get much further. As against this he quotes Pascal as saying: "The heart has its reasons which the reason does not know"—a sentence which, for confusion of thought, it would be difficult to beat.

I did not quote Lao-tze as an authority, but an illustration. Suppose we drop ancient writers and come to actual facts. And the question is this: Are there any powers in the human mind which are independent of the mind itself or supplementary to it? Mr. Lloyd says that "there are other faculties besides Reason which have contributed to the mental, moral, and social improvement of mankind." What are those other faculties? He says: "The greater part [of this work] has been done by sympathy, love, imagination, and, above all, by religion." This is indeed making the tail wag the dog; for can we set any store by irrational or unreasonable sympathy, love, imagination, or religion? All these are obviously special modes of rational activity. It is a truism to say that love is not logic, but it would be strictly correct to say that it is one of the noblest products of reason.

Religion, too, is a product of reason. All religions are, in fact, products of reason; but many of them are more or less temporary or imperfect. The Romish Church is a product of reason; but it now illogically but consistently opposes reason, because reason would be fatal to it in its present form. We, on the other hand, welcome reason, and appeal to it not only for controversial purposes, but as the guide of life. In fact, we have no other guide. We may neglect it or misuse it, but our choice is between that and nothing. It is ourselves. The ant is guided by ant-reason; the bird by bird-reason; we are guided by human reason. Existing in other animals, it exists in man to a great and noble degree, and in attacking it we attack not only Unitarianism but humanity.

Some of the R.P.A. writers may be feeble. I cannot say. Most of their publications appear to be reprints of well-known works. But there are feeble writers everywhere. Most of the world's literature descends into oblivion, and deservedly so. The Rationalist Press Association, however, has got hold of a grand name. Its object is said to be "generally to assert the supremacy of reason as the natural and necessary means to all such knowledge and wisdom as man can achieve." In that I entirely concur. If some Unitarians cannot concur in it they are a standing puzzle to me.

I look upon the R.P.A. as working on parallel lines to ourselves, and, therefore, as entitled to our fullest sympathy. We are not so numerous as to afford to dispense with them as allies, still less to call for fire from heaven upon them because they are helping us in casting out the devils of ignorance and prejudice.

I cannot see that Mr. Lloyd has quoted a single R.P.A. writer who limits reason to logic, or dispenses with love and sympathy. I have before me a specimen of the R.P.A. publications. It is called "Hymns of Love and Duty, compiled by Gustav Spiller" (1903). One hymn, written by the editor, begins :—

> Years are coming, years are going,
> Creeds may change or pass away;
> But the power of love is growing
> Stronger, deeper, day by day.

And again :—

> Rest not till within you
> Strength of virtue grow,
> Till with streams of kindness
> Heart and mind o'erflow.

There is much to the same effect, but not a word about "logic."

O. A. SHRUBSOLE.

STEPNEY GREEN CHAPEL.

SIR,—The somewhat enigmatic reference to the above in Mr. Tarrant's Provincial letter, will not, I fear, give much light to any reader interested in the welfare of our churches. Although the pulpit may not, from the strictly professional point of view, be regarded as filled, yet it has been occupied, and all the activities maintained, without any break since the time of the change last spring. No doubt the moment was critical, but it has passed. We are very short of workers, especially at the moment, owing to the removal of a devoted young lady who used to come from Enfield, on her spare Sundays; but the various departments of work are kept going, and plans for the next few months are matured. There are a fine class of girls and another of boys, both wanting a head. Last week our first social meeting was attended by about 40, and yesterday's attendances were morning, 35; afternoon, 70; evening, 25; Next Sunday is our Harvest Thanksgiving. The evening attendance, though small, is improving, and it must be remembered that the population around is largely alien. The workers, too, have other pursuits during the week, so cannot visit.

Stepney will not fail, unless a portion of the generous financial support accorded to other efforts is denied it.

I should like, if it were meet, to bear witness to the self-denying devotion of the ladies, who are the chief supporters of the work; owing to their generosity a batch of elder scholars of both sexes have enjoyed this summer a fortnight's holiday either in the country or at the sea-side.

I can assure any volunteers from other parts that they will find the environs of Stepney compare favourably with many other parts, e.g., the purlieus of Notting Hill, and their reward will be in their work; and not far away, across the borders of another parish, the social reformer may see any Sunday evening the six o'clock procession of hundreds of homeless men as they seek a night's free lodging in Medland Hall. The problem of brotherhood at Stepney, as elsewhere, looms large.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

THIS is the last Provincial Letter I shall have the honour to write to THE INQUIRER, and I do not want to be thought to be saying unkind things on the eve of my departure from this district; but I am only too sure that it will be generally admitted that some of our Manchester churches are in an unsatisfactory condition. A number of them are fairly holding their own, a few are distinctly growing in strength, but some are finding the fight for existence becoming harder year by year. Nor can this always be satisfactorily explained. One is bound to confess one's opinion that congregations do not always fearlessly search for the root cause, and even when it is patent to them they sometimes seem to shut their eyes to it. It is surely of the first importance that every congregation should, before all else, seek the true interests of the cause they profess to have at heart, and never to allow personal interests to dominate. Then, too, I am sorry to say that we are not so solid in Manchester as we once were. When some great effort is made, like the Great Bazaar a few years back, inspired and engineered by such an influential man as Mr. James Beard, there is a rallying of all our forces, and the thing is a success. But what we want in addition is constant and unvarying sympathy, encouragement, and support. We want the men of light and leading and resource amongst us to assure us in every possible way—by their presence at our deliberations, whenever practicable—that they join hands with all the rest in the main work our churches are endeavouring to do. Any man can raise an objection of some sort to almost every scheme or method other people propose; but what our churches want at the present time is a general re-baptism of the spirit, a frank, whole-hearted co-operation of the men and women of position amongst us, a practical, personal interest in our deliberations and our work, as in the old days gone by. We have many earnest, enthusiastic men on the committees of our various institutions, but they are sometimes driven to ask in a disappointed tone of voice: "Why doesn't So-and-So throw in his lot with us as he used to do a few years back?" Of course there naturally comes a time when the old warriors have perforce to take off their armour, and no one begrudges them their few remaining years of rest; but some of our erstwhile leaders retire uncommonly soon, and the only conclusion to be drawn is that they cannot appreciate the newer policy and methods which the times have made necessary—at any rate, from the point of view of the vast majority. I for one honestly believe that if only a sort of miracle could be wrought so that we, one and all, could be regalvanised, young and old, rich and poor, into determined and united effort to promote by all manner of means the interests of the faith we cherish, we should find, to our unspeakable delight, that a vaster opportunity is awaiting us than ever before in our history. My parting prayer is that soon there may be a re-awakening of real religious zeal, a sinking of all minor differences, and a self-sacrificing fraternal joining of hands in prosecuting the work which is pitecusly clamouring to be done.

Oldham-road, Urmston, and Heaton Moor are still without settled ministers, though it is hoped that the two former will soon be in a position to make appointments. The case of Heaton Moor is more serious; it has met with a series of set-backs recently, and is in a bad way. The few people, however, who remain attached, are earnest and devoted; and everyone hopes that better days may be in store for that church. Higher Broughton is still worked by supplies; but although it has been exceptionally favoured in the quality of its preachers, it fails to make material headway. Why, nobody pretends to exactly say. Perhaps it is not quite in the right place; but as it has not a permanent building of its own, a change in venue may sooner or later take place—that is a question for the future. The old chapel in Bridge-street, Strangeways, has at last been sold, and the proceeds are soon to be handed over to the District Association for the advancement of the cause somewhere in Salford or North Manchester. With all its past experience the Association will fully realise its responsibility therewith; and there is no fear of it putting this money too hurriedly into bricks and mortar.

The effort at Bradford is flourishing wonderfully. The increased accommodation afforded by the building of an adjoining hall and classrooms a year or two ago is none too great. The buildings are in constant use. The activities are of a most varied character, and every section of the surrounding population is catered for. The Rev. W. E. Atack has a genius for organising new methods for attracting and interesting the people; and this, in every respect, is a piece of work of which the Association may well be proud.

It is with genuine pleasure that I am able to announce that the Congregational Society in connection with Lower Mosley-street Schools has now been constituted into a proper congregation, so that in future it will be included within the District Association. The Rev. Cobden Smith is doing a splendid work there both in connection with the Sunday-school proper, and also in the building up of a Sunday evening congregation. It is not an easy post to fill, hence the success of the work redounds all the more to the credit of Mr. Smith.

Some time ago, mainly through the initiative and enthusiasm of Mr. Richard Robinson, the governing body of the Association appointed a Social Questions Committee, whose duty it is to keep itself well-informed concerning the various social questions of the day which are pressing for a practical solution. It has asked the constituent churches to show their sympathy, and to suggest any way in which mutual co-operation is possible. As a result the Committee of Cross-street Chapel has expressed a desire to have a series of Sunday afternoon addresses delivered in its building. Such subjects as "Physical Degeneration," "The Unemployed," "Gambling," "The Housing Question" are to be treated by men who are well-known as authorities on their respective subjects. Unfortunately, some little delay has arisen, so that it is not now possible to arrange for all these addresses on consecutive Sunday afternoons before Christmas. This will doubtless weaken their force as well as the interest they are likely to arouse; but when they are duly announced, the churches must do all they can to secure satisfactory audiences, and help in every way possible to give the movement public advertisement. Certainly the idea is a most valuable one.

The effort is still going on to raise money for the extension of mission premises at Willert-street and Renshaw-street. The work has already been prosecuted at Renshaw-street as far as it is at present practicable. About £1,000 more is required to enable the committee to complete its scheme. The additional accommodation is very urgently required. The folk themselves at Willert-street, led by the missionary, Rev. J. W. Bishop, had a strong and worthy desire to do what they could towards raising the necessary money. They organised themselves with a view to holding a sale of work down in Collyhurst. Some friends generously sent them subscriptions, others helped them with goods, while they themselves made a variety of saleable articles, and also put their pennies weekly in the bank in order that they might have something to spend when the time came. The Lord Mayor of Manchester, who is a churchman, opened the sale in order to show his admiration for the work which Mr. Bishop is doing amongst the poor, and Councillor Anthony Burgon took the chair for a similar reason. Altogether a sum of about £90 has been raised by this effort; and if only our well-to-do friends in and around Manchester could estimate the value of this effort, and realise what it meant to the poor people who engaged in it, they would not be long before they subscribed the remaining £1,000 that is required. The necessary land has been bought, but in view of the state of the mission's funds the committee dare not start building operations until the receipt of that sum is assured.

Before this letter is printed the opening ceremony will have taken place at the new residential and collegiate premises of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Summerville, Victoria Park. The proceedings will no doubt be fully reported in your next issue; but I may appropriately say something about the situation and equipment of Summerville. It stands in its own grounds of about four acres, most of which is beautifully wooded, with tennis courts here and there, and a capital kitchen garden. The house itself is commodious, and admirably adapted to the requirements of the College. It is a property which will do eminent credit to the group of churches to which it belongs. It has been very carefully overhauled in order to ensure that its sanitary arrangements should be perfect; the lighting and heating arrangements are all new and up-to-date, and much time and care has been spent on its furnishing, with a view both to economy and efficiency. The verdict of all who have seen Summerville is that in every way it is most admirable. Any visitor can be excused for falling in love with it straight away; and there isn't an old student who does not in his heart wish that he could have his course of study over again within that environment. The College has been particularly fortunate in securing the services of Miss Panton Ham as matron. She is an extremely capable lady, and her sympathies are with the work of the College; while behind her are both traditions and experience, which will make her a very suitable and efficient matron. The Unitarian Home Missionary College has always had a beneficial influence on the life of our northern Churches; but that influence will now be increased tenfold; and with its new and unique advantages it is bound to play an important part in all that pertains to their growth and development. It is now in the position to play the part of host as well as guest; and many, doubtless, will be the opportunities afforded to our Manchester Churches to foregather within its walls or under the shade of its beautiful trees.

This is already a long letter; but may I say one word more? I cannot leave this district without saying how hard it is to part with so many earnest ministers and laymen whom I have learned to esteem highly. During my seventeen years at Moss Side I have received much kindness from many people. In coming to London I cannot wish more than that I may find equally good men and true there (including women). My brother ministers have helped and encouraged me in every possible way. They are truly fraternal, and the longer one knows them the more highly one respects them. We have our differences of opinion, and sometimes we go at it hammer and tongs; but our friendly relations are always the same. I do not think you could find a body of men who were more anxious to help each other when the need arises. We consult each other unreservedly; we co-operate with each other in a variety of ways; we respect each other's claim for liberty and independence; we rejoice with each other when any success is achieved, though the effort to attain it may have proceeded on lines which do not commend themselves to our judgment. And when a man needs sympathy it is never long delayed. As for my congregation at Moss Side, no minister was ever happier in his settlement than I have been with them. I have the greatest admiration for their unflagging enthusiasm, for their dogged perseverance, and for their executive capabilities. That class of men and women would build up a strong and successful congregation anywhere. It is not an easy matter to break away from them. But I am coming to London with the firm belief that Unitarians are good and true and staunch everywhere; and that while I shall still retain my old friends whom I leave behind I shall have the privilege of making many new and dear ones in my new sphere of work Though I am transferring my energies and ambitions and hopes I cannot, nor shall I be expected to, transfer my affections; but I trust that my heart will be found large enough to hold as many staunch friends as I can find anywhere.

CHARLES ROPER.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Bedford.—It is thirty-three years this October since the Bedford services were started by Mr. Rowland Hill, who has been in charge from that day to this. On Sunday last the anniversary was celebrated, when the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter occupied the pulpit morning and evening. Before the morning sermon he publicly congratulated the friends on maintaining these services, at great odds and almost single-handed, for a third of a century, and he hoped their future history would be as helpful and even more encouraging. The sermon was based on the words, "What is truth?" In the evening Mr. Carpenter gave a lecture on "The Gospels, and how to read them," and held the augmented audience spell-bound as he showed the illuminating power of sympathetic criticism on the ancient writings.

Cullompton.—The Sunday-school anniversary was celebrated in connection with the Harvest Festival, on October 8, with great success. A party of twenty-four travelled by road from Taunton, which is nineteen miles away, to attend the morning and afternoon services. In the evening seats were placed along the aisles to accommodate the large congregation. The Rev. J. Worthington preached in the morning and evening, and Mr. J Duckworth, the head-master of the Taunton Memorial Schools, conducted the afternoon service.

London: Stepney.—A bright and well attended congregational gathering took place at College Chapel on Thursday, October 5, presided over by Mr. E. Capleton, who ever since last April has occupied the pulpit, very acceptably to all the congregation. In the course of the evening a resolution was unanimously passed expressing satisfaction that Mr. Capleton had accepted the offer of the chapel committee to continue to act as lay preacher at the Sunday evening services, to the end of the current year. A hearty vote of thanks to Mr. John Evans was also passed, thanking him for his long and faithful services as hon. secretary and treasurer to College Chapel. Miss Hill, who has succeeded him in this somewhat onerous office, read out the very full programme of winter's work, and asked for the earnest help and co-operation of all present in carrying it out, more particularly in the Adult Temperance Society.

Nelson.—On Sunday last the first anniversary of the establishment of the Unitarian Church in Nelson was held. Just twelve months ago the first sermen in connection with this movement was preached by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. Since then regular Sunday evening services have been held, and a flourishing Sunday school has been established, meeting morning and afternoon. A church has been organised, and about 60 members enrolled. The services on Sunday last were conducted by the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman, of Burnley. They were well attended and successful in every sense. The choir rendered anthems very acceptably, and the singing throughout was hearty and devotional. The collections amounted to £5. The new movement is full of life and promise. It owes much to the generous help of neighbouring churches and ministers, and to the practical sympathy of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

Newport, Isle of Wight (Welcome Meeting).—Advantage was taken of the quarterly meeting of the Southern Unitarian Association, which was held at Newport on 5th inst., to welcome the Rev. H. M. Livens to the ministry of the Newport Church in succession to Rev. C. E. Pike. The proceedings of the day commenced with a luncheon in the Masonic Hall, and after the business meeting of the Association a public tea was held in the school-room, which was well filled. In the evening a public meeting was held in the chapel, when a good attendance was presided over by Mr. E. Chatfeild Clarke, C.C., who was supported by Rev. C. C. Coe (President of the Association), the Revs. W. J. Jupp (of Croydon), a former minister of the church, H. M. Livens, J. Burton, C. A. Hoddinott, E. J. Wilkins, Adjutant Scott (Salvation Army), and others. A kindly letter of apology was read from Rev. T. Avery, (Congregational). The Chairman, on behalf of the congregation, extended to Mr. Livens a most hearty greeting, and welcomed him as one who came to them with the highest credentials, a record of valuable service, the gift of preaching the example of high character and an aptitude for teaching. As President of the Association, the Rev. C. C. Coe cordially joined in the welcome to Mr. Livens, whom he greeted as an old colleague and valued fellow-worker in the North. He was sure the Newport congregation had done well to invite him to their pulpit, and trusted that his ministry amongst them would be long and prosperous. Rev. J. Burton, on behalf of neighbouring churches, joined heartily in the welcome. Rev. W. J. Jupp expressed his pleasure at once more meeting so many old friends, and joined in all the good wishes expressed on Mr. Livens' appointment. They would find Mr. and Mrs. Livens faithful friends and devoted servants of all that was highest and holiest and best, and he begged that they would make the most of them. Rev. H. M. Livens expressed the hearty thanks of his wife and himself for all the kindly words said of them, and was glad to find in Newport that there was some measure of cordiality towards them on the part of members of other churches in the town. He was heartily glad to see Adjutant Scott amongst them, for in the many good works of the Salvation Army they all sympathised. The letter of the Rev. T. Avery, too, was very welcome. So far as his ministry was concerned, he would make no large promises. To be true to himself he would be bound to lay stress on the importance of simplicity of life. Veracity was a ruling principle in their fellowship, and they must be careful not to substitute casuistry for conscience, but to live more and more on the spiritual side of things. Mr. Hulse, of Brighton, (a member of Mr. Livens' former congregation), the Revs. C. A. Hoddinott and E. J. Wilkins, and Mr. Leslie Chatfeild Clarke, also joined in the welcome, and a very successful meeting was brought to a close by a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. F. Pinnock and other workers.

Pontypridd.—The Sunday morning adult class was to have commenced its winter work on October 1 with a lecture on "The Origin of Man," by Mr. Henry Davies, M.F., Organiser of Mining Education for the Glamorgan County Council, but at the last moment he wrote expressing his great regret at his inability to be present, at the same time hoping to do so later in the session. Mr. Howatt, B.A., Principal of the Collegiate School, an ordained minister of the Calvanistic Methodist Connexion, readily consented to fill the breach, and delivered a most interesting and edifying address on "Our Social Indebtedness." The members of the class thoroughly appreciate the kindness of these gentlemen, both of whom are members of orthodox churches.

Rawtenstall.—Successful church anniversary services were held on Sunday, October 1, the Rev. J. M. Whiteman, of Burnley, being the special preacher. On Tuesday, October 3, the Rev. M. R. Scott delivered a lecture on "The Teaching of Thomas Carlyle." The chair was taken by the Mayor of Rawtenstall.

South East Wales Unitarian Society.—The quarterly meeting was held at Merthyr on Monday, October 2, the president in the chair. The majority of the churches forming the Society were represented by their ministers and lay delegates. At the afternoon's committee, reports were read from the various churches, and these with one or two exceptions were bright and hopeful. Friends representing the new propagandist work at Newport were also present, and reported that the inaugural service on Sunday evening, October 1, was attended by nearly sixty persons, who seemed interested in the movement. An application from the Church at Cefn Coed to become affiliated with the Society was granted. The Merthyr friends hospitably entertained the delegates to tea. The evening meeting took the form of a farewell to the Rev. D. J. Williams on his leaving Merthyr for Belper. Mr. Williams has for eight years been hon. secretary of the society, and being an indefatigable worker the success attending the Society has been due in no small measure to his untiring efforts on its behalf. Members of the Society, and of his own church, bore testimony to the good work he had done as secretary of the one, and minister of the other; and he was presented with two purses of gold, one subscribed by the members of his own congregation, and the other by members of the Society. Mr. Williams, in reply, feelingly expressed his thanks for the presentations, and for the kind words spoken of himself, his wife, and their work.

Harvest Festivals.—Since last week we have received reports of harvest thanksgiving services held at fourteen other of our churches, and many more have been held.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

Chairman.—Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL.
Vice-Chairman.—Mr. G. H. LEIGH.

THE Mission Committee appeal to the generosity of friends of religious work among the poor.

They have been obliged to decide upon the extension of their premises at Willert-street and Renshaw-street on account of the constantly increasing work at the two Missions. They propose to enlarge the buildings at Willert-street at a cost of about £1,200 (the necessary land has been bought), and those at Renshaw-street at a cost of about £1,500 (part of this scheme has already been completed).

Owing to the increasing demands upon the funds of the society, and the loss of old and generous friends and subscribers, there is an annual deficit of more than £150. The Committee wish to pay off the existing debt, and to provide a sum for future needs. For these objects they require at least £3,500.

They acknowledge with gratitude the following donations:—

THE EVOLUTION OF RELIGION: An Anthropological Study.
By L. R. FARNELL, D.Litt., Fellow and Tutor of Exeter College, Oxford; University Lecturer in Classical Archæology, &c.

FROM THE PREFACE.—"Having accepted the stimulating invitation to give in the spring of this year a short series of lectures for the Hibbert Trust on some subject belonging to the department of Comparative Religion, I felt that it was desirable to avoid those topics that had been appropriated by former lecturers; and the Trustees, as well as the audience, also deserved that what the lecturer put forth should embody the results of some personal and original study. I finally selected for special discussion the ritual of purification, and the influence of ideas associated with it upon law, morality, and religion; secondly, the development of prayer from lower to higher forms."

A FAIRY PLAY IN THREE ACTS.

The Literary World says:—"Few methods of enjoyment yield more genuine fun to young folks than that of dressing up and acting before a friendly audience. The difficulty often is what to act. Here is a delightful child's play in three acts, that is simple without being silly."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

"ENGLAND expects every man to do his duty." On the centenary of Trafalgar and the death of Nelson we repeat those great words, thankful for all that was noble in that intrepid life, and for the true patriotism, based upon a sense of duty and willing self-sacrifice, of which those words are the symbol. And on this day of remembrance we repeat them with a special thankfulness, because we can do so with hands clasped in cordial friendship with our brethren across the Channel. Nelson's call to England must be repeated now, but it is a more difficult heroism, a more searching and far-seeing patriotism that it should kindle, in the conflict against social wrong, in brotherly co-operation with other nations in the paths of peace, in patient and devoted service for the common good.

THE Kingsway and Aldwych, the splendid new thoroughfare between Holborn and the Strand, was opened by the King and Queen on Wednesday under the happiest conditions of weather and popular rejoicings. The address presented by the Mayor of Poplar, on the subject of distress in his borough through want of employment, received from the King a most sympathetic reply.

FRIENDS of the Unitarian Home Missionary College throughout the country will be delighted at the successful opening of "Summerville," the new Residence in Victoria Park, of which we publish this week a full report. The speeches at the opening were admirable, and it is a great satisfaction that the occasion was marked by such sympathetic addresses as those given by the Vice-Chancellor of the Victoria University and Professor Peake. The whole of the proceedings, in fact, were eminently worthy of the occasion, and of the high hopes and ideal of the College.

WE publish this week Mr. Carpenter's address on "Christianity in the Light of Historical Science," delivered on Monday at the opening of the Session at Manchester College, Oxford. We make no apology for devoting so much space to printing the address in full, and will note here some of its chief points, as a kind of table of contents :—

I. The true principle of study. A Free Faculty of Theology.
Analogy in Ancient Greece.
Among Buddhist teachers.
II. Contrasted temper in the Thirty-Nine Articles. Idea of the Absolute in religion modified by historical study. Contemporary elements in the Gospel story. Truth of the actual Jesus to be sought.
III. Gospels to be read in the light of contemporary thought of the universe. Ideas common to Babylonia and Egypt.
Angels of the Presence.
Regeneration.
Circles of the heavens.
IV. Jesus as divine Healer.
Parallel in Æsculapius.
Seen by believing disciples.
Roman worship of the Emperors.
Parallels in Mysteries of Western Asia to Paul's doctrine of redemption.
V. Doctrine of Salvation in the higher faiths of India.
Forms of Buddhist faith in Japan.
Parallel to Evangelical doctrine.
VI. The same needs to be met to-day.
The task of the student and the minister of religion.
Example of the Salvation Army.
Personal power in religion.
The ideal of the Kingdom.

The address is to be published immediately by the College authorities, and in this separate form a number of valuable notes will be added.

DR. ELLICOTT, who had been Bishop of Gloucester since 1863, and only retired last March, died on Sunday afternoon at Birchington-on-Sea at the age of 86. He was a Cambridge man, and was Hulsean Professor of Divinity when Palmerston made him Dean of Exeter in 1861. He was a distinguished Biblican scholar, and acted as chairman of the Company of New Testament Revisers. It is recorded of him that in the heated discussions of that body he never once lost his temper. He was a man of true simplicity of life, greatly beloved in the diocese he served so long.

DR. FORSYTH'S address on "The Grace of the Gospel as the Moral Authority in the Church," delivered from the chair of the Congregational Union at the Autumnal Meeting at Leeds, on October 10, is issued by the Union as a threepenny pamphlet, similar in form to the Spring Address on "A Holy Church the Moral Guide of Society." It is said to have taken an hour and forty-five minutes to deliver, and it becomes somewhat wearisome in iteration, especially to one who has already seen Dr. Forsyth's articles in the Current Hibbert and Contemporary. But one can have no excuse now for not knowing what his position is. He demands objective authority for faith, and will have nothing to do with "the liberalism of mere natural religion with a Christian spirit," or "that natural and unconscious Christianity which is too often the liberal note." That authority he finds in the Atonement, "the moral act of the universe." Nothing else, he declares, can command the human conscience. In that supreme act, and there alone, we come to know "the Christ and grace of the holiness of eternal, atoning God."

YET Dr. Forsyth admits that "the Gospel of the Cross does not make its crucial appeal to human healthy-mindedness." Only those who have "descended into hell" can have the full measure of faith and know the true moral authority; for we live in "a world that lies in wickedness," subject to "the radical evil in human nature and the diabolical element in the soul." Dr. Forsyth apparently believes, as he says Jesus did, in a personal devil, and unless we will believe with him that God once for all conquered the devil by what He accomplished through His death on the cross, we must remain outside the circle of living faith and the true Christian church. Well, then, we must remain outside; and yet we shall believe that God has a better way of leading His children into the true life. We shall go on doing what work we can for the kingdom of God, and praying for "human healthy-mindedness in the companionship of Christ.

THE annual meeting of the Netherlands Protestantenbond is to be held on October 31 and November 1 at Bussum, not far from Amsterdam, where Mr. van Loenen Martinet, the editor of the Hervorming, is minister. He and the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz are to give two of the addresses, the former on the Geneva Congress, the latter on "Three Great Protestants: Calvin, Rousseau, and Vinet." The Rev. V. D. Davis is to attend the meetings as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

THE October number of the Mill Hill Pulpit begins the fourteenth volume of the monthly issue of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermons, and it contains a sermon preached on the twenty-ninth anniversary of his settlement at Mill Hill. "In Much Assurance" is the title, "a review of twenty-nine years' ministry." The first sermon he preached as minister of that chapel was on "Truth and Truthfulness," setting forth the supreme demand upon a minister, who, if he cannot claim to know the absolute truth, is bound to speak openly that which is truth to him. After quoting some of that old sermon, Mr. Hargrove went on to speak of the central facts of religion, as to which they had full assurance. First the fundamental truth of righteousness, then religion itself, as an abiding need, and the need of God; and the sermon concluded:—

"And fourth of undeniable facts is the attractiveness and the power of Jesus. Men differ in their beliefs and opinions about him, about his birth and life and death and nature and teaching. We may relegate much of the gospel story to the realm of myth and poetry. We may be unable to admit the authenticity or the accuracy of the records upon which others rely as inspired documents. But whatever we deny or doubt or assert the fact remains that Jesus of Nazareth is to this day a mighty influence in the world, the greatest of all spiritual influences. It is true whether we approve of it or not that his 'name is above every name,' that in his name to-day men 'cast out evil spirits and do wonderful works.'

"Here then are four certainties—rock, soil, grass, trees, as it were of the firm land we come upon amid the seas of doubt. The obligation of the moral law, the sense of religion, the need of God, the power of the Gospel of Christ. And with these we can be content. They are enough that from them the teacher should draw the grand conclusion 'that thy trust may be in the Lord'; not 'that thou may'st be able to answer concerning the life after death, and the nature of the Deity, and have authentic information about man's origin and destiny;' for these, and so many the like questions admit of no certain reply, were it otherwise men truthful and intelligent would not differ so widely about them. Sufficient for us that our trust is in the Lord, that we be assured of Wisdom and Power and Love, the One God, of whom we came, and in whose hands we are for time and for Eternity.

"So have I taught you 'in much assurance,' these twenty-nine years past. Wrong in many respects, I have been right in this; and if you have learnt so much of me you have sufficient, nor need seek for certainties in these things which are hidden from us and on which we can never be agreed."

A TERRIBLE indictment of the liquor traffic in this country is that contained in the sermon on "Drink, Greed, and Slavery," preached by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong in Hope street Church, Liverpool, on Jan. 17, 1904, and now published in the October number of Sermons for the Day. "So there we have it, this vast organic growth, corrupt and foul, which feeds itself upon the vitals of the nation, an organism born of the union of insatiable greed on the one hand and insatiable craving for drink on the other. Each ministers to each and gives it free course in the community. The craving for drink leads to every species of crime, and fills the calendars at the assizes, and pours its unceasing stream of victims through the gates of the prison, the asylum, and the workhouse. The craving for gain, more cold and cruel, is the other motive power in the driving of the car of Juggernaut; every consideration that appeals to the human conscience pleads before it utterly in vain, and the great criminal-makers, manufacturers of lunacy and creators of pauperism, hold high places of public honour in Parliament, on the Bench, in the social circle. No laws apply to their offence. No prosecutor arraigns them at the bar. No prison receives them. No poor-house or asylum is their doom. The craving for physical indulgence and the craving for inordinate gain stands equal in the court of conscience and of justice. The one is punished with unrelenting iteration. The other is held to be above all blame.

"Yes, there we have it, the monstrous organism, bred and fed by the craze for drink and the craze for gain. What are we to do? As members of the body politic, nay, as children of God, and brethren of mankind, is there not a deep and grave responsibility with regard to this matter laid upon you and me?" Let the whole sermon be read (it may be had for 1½d. by post from the Liverpool Bookseller Company, 70, Lord-street, Liverpool), and let the answer Mr. Armstrong gave to that question be earnestly taken to heart, as to what may be done personally, by each one, and in care for the children.

A NOTICE of Dr. Beet's book on "The Last Things" appeared in THE INQUIRER soon after its first publication. Of itself it would hardly require further notice. But some books, like some men, have greatness thrust upon them. Dr. Beet has been obliged to resign his position as a Wesleyan theological professor in order to re-issue his book and to gain that liberty of speech which the conference denied him. That fact calls special attention to the book itself. And when a Wesleyan newspaper in a leading article declares that "few, if any, of our ministers preach the doctrine that Dr. Beet controverts," and that the lay preachers who do preach it are generally though not always out of touch with modern Christian thought, it looks as if even from the Wesleyan point of view a grave injustice has been done. Another highly significant feature in the same article is that what once would have been called either a fair or an unfair appeal to the Word of God is spoken of as "a balancing of the texts of the first documents of our religion." It is not the work of a friendly neighbour to interfere in domestic disputes. But the book of Dr. Beet has a certain value beyond that of its immediate aim as a sign of theological movement and unrest in the Wesleyan body; the comments of so widely read and influential a paper as the Methodist Times show that the movement is wider and deeper than we should have been ready to assume.

DR. JOHN WATSON (Ian Maclaren) preached farewell sermons at the Sefton Park Presbyterian Church last Sunday, and so concluded his twenty-five years ministry in that city. He is fifty-five years of age. At the conclusion of the morning sermon be spoke as follows:—"Twenty-five years ago on the last Sunday of September I began my ministry in this pulpit, and I then promised that, according to my ability, I should preach Jesus Christ. As I review the years my heart is humbled by many shortcomings and by many mistakes, for which I ask your forgiveness; but I will plead that I have made Christ the standard of my thinking and the centre of my preaching. I have always treated the creeds, as my church requires, as subordinate standards, and have exalted the Bible above doctrinal symbols, and I have read the Bible itself in the light of Jesu's words. What Jesus did not teach I have refused to preach; what Jesus did not command I have not bound upon your consciences. I have done my best to present God according to the revelation of Jesus, and have preached the Divine Fatherhood. I have done my best to expound redemption according to the Gospel, and I have preached the Cross as the principle of life. If at any time I have spoken as if Christianity stood in the acceptance of dogma rather than of the living Christ, or as if any man were in a state of salvation who had not been saved from his sins, then my words have betrayed me, for that is not what I intended to teach. My last testimony as minister of this church is that there is one Saviour for the human soul, one Master for the human mind, and one Guide for the human life, and that is our most dear Lord. In His most merciful and mighty hands I leave you, bidding you be faithful and true; and in His name I thank you for the charity with which you have allowed me to declare whatsoever truth God gave me, for the patience with which you have borne with my imperfections, and the kindness, not only at this present, but during all the past, which you have shown to me both in my public work and in my private life."

SIR HENRY IRVING was happy in his death. He was at Bradford last week, and on Friday night played Tennyson's "Becket" to the end, with the closing words—

Into Thy hands, O Lord, Into Thy hands —— and before midnight, by a sudden call, he had passed away. He was a great actor, and a true man, with rare powers and of simple and most generous nature, who did much to dignify his profession. He was knighted by Queen Victoria ten years ago, and he was Tennyson's friend. It is eminently fitting that his ashes should rest in the Abbey, and that he, like Garrick, should have a monument there.

THE National Unitarian Temperance Association is arranging a conference to be held at Essex Hall on Wednesday next after the Council meeting of the B. and F.U.A. Mr. H. G. Chancellor and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant are announced as the speakers.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

OPENING OF SUMMERVILLE.

SUMMERVILLE, the new residence of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, was formally opened by Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence on Thursday of last week. The occasion aroused wide-spread interest in the Churches, as was indicated by the crowded attendance at the opening ceremony. The catholicity of religious fellowship in Manchester, and the intimate relations of the College with the academic life of the city, were also shown in the presence of ministers of various religious denominations and the presence and speech of distinguished representatives of the University and local Colleges and Halls. The proceedings were timed to commence at four o'clock, but some time before that hour the large libraries in which the ceremony was to take place were crowded to overflowing, and several hundreds of later arrivals had to be content to stand in the conservatory, the hall, and even outside the open windows. Altogether, between seven and eight hundred persons were present, and although not more than one half of them could hear anything of the speeches, nearly all remained for the inspection of the premises and tea, which followed the opening ceremony. The enthusiasm of the audience was equal to its numbers, and the speeches reached a high level of thought and eloquence. The Chairman opened in an address of much dignity and charm, which was followed by a generous tribute to the work of distinguished Unitarians by the Vice-Chancellor of the University. The Dean of the Theological Faculty eloquently vindicated the free, scientific study of theology, and Professor Carpenter testified to the need and value of a College in close touch with the actual life of our Churches. Principal Gordon, in a few impressive words, lifted the audience to a sense of personal consecration to the cause for which the College stands. Professor Moore and Colonel Pilcher spoke the fitting words of thanks to Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, and then the meeting was compensated for its disappointment in the inability of Sir Edwin to deliver an address by the gracious words in which Lady Lawrence replied on his behalf. Further words of thanks to the Chairman and speakers were spoken by Mr. W. Long, of Warrington, and the Rev. C. J. Street. The usual College hymn, and a prayer for Divine help and guidance in the great work thus inaugurated offered by the Principal, fittingly brought the ceremony to a close.

Tea was then served in the dining-room and conservatory, and the company dispersed to inspect the house.

Summerville is described in a local paper, as "the stately home of a late merchant prince of Manchester." Surrounded by its own grounds of over four acres, beautifully laid out and well wooded, very little alteration has been required to convert Summerville into a "stately home" for our Northern College. All who saw it for the first time were pleasantly surprised, finding it far in excess of their anticipation in dignity and suitability to the purpose for which it is to be used. Entering the hall the most striking feature is the large double library, opening into the conservatory, and with it occupying the whole south front of the house. On the other side of the hall there is a handsome dining-room, and on the ground floor there are also a spacious drawing-room and men's common room, besides the private rooms of the matron, kitchen, pantries, &c. Upstairs there are some twenty rooms, including lecture room, tutor's room, the Principal's suite of rooms, and rooms for the students. As at present arranged there is accommodation for fifteen students, and the session opens with only one short of the full complement. The house has been carefully and suitably furnished. The walls are already hung with many pictures and portraits; amongst which are two large portraits of Dr. Martineau, as well as portraits of the founder of the College, Dr. John Relly Beard, all the former tutors and many of the past students. The College is now equipped as its best friends would desire, and enters on its second half century with every hope and prospect of a useful and honourable career.

The Chair was taken by the President, the Rev. Charles C. Coe, F.R.G.S., and amongst those present were Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence; Dr. Hopkinson, Vice-Chancellor of the Victoria University of Manchester; Professor Peake, Dean of the Faculty of Theology; Professor Tout, Dean of the Faculty of Arts; Professors Hogg, Herford, Goodrich, Conway, J. Estlin Carpenter (Oxford), Philemon Moore (Carmarthen), Principal Gordon, Rev. J. E. Manning, Principal Graham (Dalton Hall), Principal Hopkinson (Hulme Hall), Mr. J. L. Paton (Head-Master Manchester Grammar School), Col. Jesse Pilcher; Messrs. J. R. Beard, William Long, F. Monks, W. H. Talbot (Town Clerk), Alderman Healey, Councillor Marsden, G. H. Pethick Lawrence, R. G. Lawson, David Martineau, F. Nettlefold, S. W. Preston, J. W. Scott, Grosvenor Talbot, Franklin Thomasson, F. Wrigley, A. W. Worthington, Edgar Worthington and others.

The PRESIDENT, in opening the proceedings, said he should content himself mainly with that word of congratulation which would express the feelings of all present. And first he would congratulate the old students of the College. He was proud of their gratitude to their alma mater for all the benefit which they had received from her teaching. He was proud, because they had been conscious that even the tenderest mother cannot always provide all that is wanted. Knowing the disabilities of the past they were anxious that their successors should not suffer as they did, and thus they had earnestly desired to provide these splendid surroundings for the College. He was glad, too, that they were anxious to move with the times, and to become more closely associated with the Owens College and the Victoria University. Moved by such feelings, they inaugurated the Jubilee movement with a charming confidence of success; started it with a zealous enthusiasm which went far to secure that success, and showed the reality of their enthusiasm by their self-sacrificing generosity. He congratulated next the professors of the College on their removal from disabilities which he had heard them pathetically describe, and which he hoped they would go on describing until all the money was raised. And then would come that sweet retrospect of memory when we only remembered the kind and tender things of the past; or, if the disabilities were remembered, it was only to boast of the good work done and the good men sent out in spite of them. He rejoiced in the added dignity and responsibility of the professorial office and on the great future which he believed lay before the institution. He congratulated also the Committee who took up the suggestions of the students so heartily, worked so faithfully to realise them, and had seen their efforts crowned with such great success. And the denomination also was to be congratulated on being brought into closer connection with the University and the Faculty of Theology. It would have been a sad thing if our denomination had not been in close touch with the University. In congratulating the present students, he might say a few words in the way of fatherly advice. There was brought home to them, in the advantages of to-day, their indebtedness both to the pious founders and the living benefactors. He thought that the young did not always realise this indebtedness to the pious founders. A great many people agreed to ignore them, or to forget that they ever existed; and some were apt to forget, also, the living benefactor. Most of his hearers would have read "The Newcomes," and would remember the touching scenes which described the relations of old Newcome and his son; how the two loved one another, the old man spending all that he had for the sake of his son; how the son took it all quite easily, spending what he got, and never paying due gratitude to the father's care. It might happen to some of the students as it had happened to him (Mr. Coe). He did not know that his parents had actually to retrench when they sent him to College; but they did all they could that he might receive the education of University Hall. And he drew attention to that passage from "The Newcomes" so that if there were any before him who knew that their parents had suffered self-sacrifice in order that their sons might attain the ministry, they might feel gratitude to the living benefactor. That ought to come home to them that day, surrounded as they were with the results of the generosity of our denomination. They inherited also the past traditions of the institution—traditions which were dear to many of them when they recalled the names of those who were educated in it, and who were its tutors—friends they had lost and friends still with them. Among those students he recalled one whom he characterised as a great genius; another who would have made a great financier and statesman had he gone into Parliament; another whose burning words of eloquence are still to be heard, whose heart is still young and vigorous as in the days of his youth. Those were great examples which the students of to-day might follow. But he would remind them that they had not only to reverence the tradition of the past, but to create a tradition for the future. Their conduct and their use of opportunity would establish a precedent, which their successors would find it their duty and pride to follow. The real success of the institution depended upon its product, and the students' success in their ministerial life would be the complete crowning of their success that day. He could say on behalf of the institution that the desire was to send forth men inspired with manliness, open-heartedness, courage to meet all difficulties, and fearless save in those things which all men ought to fear. It was obvious that with the ample preparation in that place and at Owens College they also desired to send forth scholars with a capacity to carry on their studies afterwards. And they desired to send out gentlemen.

> The best of men
> That e'er wore earth about him was a sufferer;
> A soft, meek, patient, humble, tranquil spirit,
> The first true gentleman that ever breathed.

A great many Christian virtues go to the making of the conventional "gentleman," but the true Christian gentleman is the embodiment of all the pieties and the moralities, the personification of all that is good, serving to remind us that the age of chivalry is not yet past nor its spirit dead. In turning out such men they produced the efficient minister. Of that ministry he would not speak, except to point out how absurd was the position of the inefficient minister—the teacher who could not teach, the preacher who could not preach, the ruler who, if he was called to rule, could not rule—the men who ought to exercise a subtle influence for good, putting forth no influence for good; the organiser who could not organise; the pastor who would not visit, or did not know how; the comforter who could not comfort; the sympathiser who could not rejoice with those who rejoice. There might be some who entered on that great profession with a view to the dignity and respect with which society views it, but who had not those personal virtues without which it is but an empty show. If there were such a man, knowing what he was and still continuing in the profession, he was not only most miserable, but also beneath contempt. He would have those who heard him save themselves from this outward contempt and inward unrest by taking care that in every branch of their work they should show themselves efficient ministers of the Gospel.

In concluding his address, Mr. Coe said that at the annual meeting of the College he had suggested a dual mode of dealing with the Jubilee Fund. "He who gives quickly gives twice." He suggested that he who had given quickly should give twice, and would himself make one if others would follow. He had read of an incident in the life of the late Dr. Barnardo. On one occasion an elderly lady called, desiring to see him personally, and after some delay secured an interview. It was brief and to the point. Handing one note for £1,000 to him, she said she gave that because he never turned a child from his doors; a second note for the same sum was because she approved the details of his methods; and a third was to mark her satisfaction that the children at Ilford were not made to assume a charity garb. Now, said Mr. Coe, I commend that example, and suggest the following form of bequest for the College:—"I give £1,000 for the sake of the past of this istitution, so full of sacred and tender memories to me. I give £1,000 for the sake of the new birth which this institution has undergone. I give £1,000 for the sake of its alliance with those of other faiths, trusting that its alumni, while maintaining the most faithful loyalty to the Church to which they belong, may have souls open to receive from other sources some thrill of devotion and some impulse to beneficence, which shall help them to realise the essence of all religion and morality—Love to God and Man."

Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, whose indisposition prevented him from addressing the meeting, then formally declared the building open.

Vice-Chancellor Alfred Hopkinson said that he could most heartily congratulate the Committee on the success of their undertaking on personal grounds. For, as a neighbour, he had peculiar satisfaction in seeing the College with its grounds attached in front of his own residence, instead of a number of streets and houses; but it was as representative of the University that he could say with infinite satisfaction that they were glad to see the successful opening of the College. It supplied one or two good things that some of those who agreed about that work laid stress upon. They found sometimes a difficulty in keeping up the social life of the students which was provided for in those halls of residence, where students, while residing together, would help to form each other's characters and promote intellectual growth. Anybody looking back to his old college days would know how much for both these good things had been done by his fellow students. There was another thing relating to the promotion of the views they held and the principles which were dear to them. It was of great importance in dealing with such a question that men should have learned to know each other in comparatively early youth, for they would then be far more efficient in working together afterwards in any great movement which might take place. In the history of the Wesleyan or the Oxford movement, or indeed any other, how often the results have been due to the effects of early and close collegiate associations. But it was not merely from that side that he looked as representative of the University with special satisfaction to the opening of that Hall. The new University had special reason to be grateful to the body from which his audience came. Where would the University have been without those who bore such names as Ashton, Rathbone, Worthington, and many others which he could mention, not omitting the kindly thought and support which comes from those who still bear the honoured name of Gaskell? But there was one new development of their work which caused him to look with satisfaction upon the existence of colleges such as that. In connection with the Theological Faculty there were two most important things to bear in mind. One was that they would never be false to the fundamental idea of their founder. They would never allow within their walls anything, directly or indirectly, in the shape of a religious test. They did not recognise that they wished to keep out religious or theological instruction; but it must not contain anything that was offensive either to the pupils or the parents of pupils. Next, if they were to do effective work in the Faculty they felt that while they were training men to some extent to become afterwards members of a particular profession, they could not give the whole of the professional training either for men of business, for engineers, doctors, lawyers, or for the Christian ministry. There would be members also of particular bodies, and they must be under the guidance of those bodies. But what they could do in the University was to provide a broad basis of common culture for all alike, so that men would be brought together to work with the highest ideals, engaged in the pursuit of truth and in the search for culture, apart from the specific work, profession, or business of later life; and it was the union of a College—definitely attached to a given body, and on which the social life of the students was secured—with a University which had no distinction and afforded an open door for all, that was going to be one of the most effective levers for progress of thought and for social progress in the future. Therefore, they heartily welcomed what had been done here. The new Faculty had men of all kinds of views, which need not be compromised or given up; but he had never known a more harmonious body of men, with different views, but agreed to work together in order to promote sound knowledge on theological subjects. They felt that they were working for the promotion of truth, and that if the ways to the summit of truth might be very different, they might still retain for each other the most complete mutual respect. He hoped that from the College, as reorganised that day, there would come men who, as students, would exercise a beneficial influence on the University, and who, in return, would be stimulated to better work than might otherwise have been possible.

THE DEAN OF THE FACULTY (PROFESSOR PEAKE) spoke of the pleasure with which all who were connected with the Faculty welcomed this new movement on the part of the College. He confirmed the Vice-Chancellor's remark as to the harmony of their body. They scarcely ever had any division in actual voting. They respected each other's opinions and had no wish that anyone should surrender his own dear convictions. Everyone in the University ought to have an equal place to right. The principle of absolute freedom from tests was splendidly realised in the Faculty. They had men of all shades of opinion, and one of the most valued of their members, and whose counsel they looked for, was their own Principal. They felt that it was as a tower of strength to them to have a man of such eminence and learning and wide culture as Mr. Gordon to represent his subject, and indeed many others. He called attention to a further fact. They had instituted a series of popular lectures during this session, and the names on the list would show how catholic and inclusive were their sympathies. Mr. Carpenter had been asked to be one of those lecturers, and at some considerable inconvenience he was willing for his name to be added and for his special subject and tendency to be represented. It was not his (Professor Peake's) fault that they were not even more catholic. He did his best to get Mr. Montefiore, in order that they might have the pleasure of listening to that gentleman, and also to show to the world at large that they recognised no distinctions of belief on the Faculty. He had never been able to understand why people fancied that theologians must hate each other more deeply than any other class of students. He did not know that philosophers and historians and political economists loved each other much more than theologians did. It was quite certain, at least, that animated as they were on the Faculty by a single love of truth and desire to get at the facts, they were determined to treat theology as historical science for investigation and teaching. To that principle not one of them would be consciously untrue. They did their best to treat every shade of opinion with respect. When it was his duty to lecture on a Bibical author to a class he saw members of every shade of opinion, at least in Protestantism, present. But he was never embarrassed by that fact, because they knew that what he sought was not to push his theological opinions, but to give a faithful interpretation of the author dealt with. There followed this happy experience, which was not quite usual for theologians, and which he prized very much, that when it came to examination questions, his students frequently, and with the utmost freedom, entirely disagreed with the views he put before them. That, instead of arousing irritation, only made him happy to think that the students were bringing an independent judgment to the subject, and trying to take their own view. Professor Peake concluded by again expressing his congratulations and those of the Faculty upon the new developments at Summerville.

THE REV. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER desired to supplement the good wishes of Principal Drummond. The College in Manchester was established upon practically the same principle as Manchester College, Oxford. The Home Missionary College also declined to impose, either upon tutor or student, adhesion to any prescribed formula of theological belief. Their very name was not to be taken as a warning-off against all others of any denomination from entering their doors. It was a name which, he was informed, might even, if the trustees or subscribers desired, be changed. It represented only the source from which they sprang, and the aspirations after liberty which had guided them to liberty and success that day. This principle was winning recognition on a wider scale than was commonly known. Only two months ago he ventured to appeal to the President of Harvard University—a Unitarian of the Unitarians—because in his annual address to the alumni of Cambridge he had declared that they were the only institution in the world founded on that principle. When he (Professor Carpenter) had the pleasure of being at Harvard eleven years ago, he lectured to at least eight different religious communions or denominations. Many more were now sending their students to that great divinity school, and the professors were chosen from various religious communions. President Eliot, however, was quite unaware that there existed in this country—on a small and obscure scale, it was true—colleges which had adopted that same principle long before Harvard had embraced it. When he had the pleasure to be at the Council at Geneva, he found also that the University of Geneva had organised its Theological Faculty on an identical basis. More than thirty years ago the churches of Geneva adopted a constitutional law by which no minister was compelled to subscribe to any particular theological formula, or even to use in his services any specific liturgical form. The University, organised on a similar basis, had in its Theological Faculty members of very various beliefs; and the result of this fraternal union between the representatives of different theological schools was, that not only were the rooms of the University freely thrown open to an International Conference, but the Cathedral also was set at their disposal by the clergy and laity of the City Consistory. That principle had spread through all the Protestant Churches of Switzerland, and it was in part the result of political advance as well as of religious depelopment. It is the principle of the future. It was adopted by the great University with which that College was connected, and it was quite certain that in the long run it would be the basis on which all theological study must be conducted, as it enters into line with the great studies of science and history, which are always open to progressive change. He believed that that College, serving a group of Churches of kindred aim and purpose in the Manchester district, had abundantly justified its existence by the services of the past fifty years, and he hoped that there would be an active and vigorous development of that collegiate life in connection with the Churches of our household of faith, which were so numerous in the neighbourhood around the city. Personally, he hoped that in coming years much more co-operation might be possible between Manchester and Oxford. It appeared to him clear that in Manchester they had opportunities in particular of practical training in the work of our Churches which were of the highest possible value. They had also now access to the splendidly organised Theological Faculty in addition to the resources of their own particular school. Still Oxford might also have something to teach, and he would heartily rejoice if it should be possible in the coming years to make some occasional exchanges of students. And why not also of lecturers? who might thus carry to the other the particular experience which they had found valuable in their own case. The College was organised on the basis of a common residence. That was a step forward in the College history which was likely to be of the greatest possible advantage. He knew that there was sometimes a dread that little groups of men, shut up by themselves and secluded from the world, would acquire the habits and temper of a clique, and might go forth stamped with the brand of a particular seminary. He had had, however, the pleasure of friendship with many of the ministers who in fifty years had gone from that College, had seen them in every variety of character, of individual and moral energy, and he did not fear that any seclusion in the agreeable retreat in which they were gathered was likely to diminish in any way the individuality of their students or to stamp them with a common mark. He appealed to the students themselves to remember that they were beginning a new era in their College history, and that under the new conditions they would be able to contribute in a way never before possible to each other moral and religious education. It was the great advantage of a common residence of that kind that in it the strong could help the weak, and that by the continuous intercourse and participation in common studies, discussion of common interests, and the cultivation of common aims, the springs of character could be strengthened and invigorated, and those who sometimes might otherwise be slack go forth stronger for their work. He called the students' attention to the description which the College still puts before them—that it is a Missionary College. There was, he thought, sometimes a danger that absorption in the higher intellectual interests of pure scholarship might dull and weaken the impulse which it was the original purpose of that College to cultivate and develop. All around them, in the city and in the villages and hamlets that had become towns, there were the ignorant, the suffering, and sinful, and the work of the missionary must always be primarily to carry the truths of the Gospel into the dark places of our sin and lust and shame. Through the immense strides which popular education has made in this country in the last generation, the great masses of the working people are often perfectly able to hold their own in theological and scientific discussion, and it was needful, therefore, that every teacher of religion should be able to give a reason for the faith that is in him, and present the teachings of Jesus in their simplest and most penetrating form. They had, therefore, to recognise this alliance between the higher types of scholarship after which they justly aimed, and that missionary work to which they were vowed. Depend upon it, the Churches that were not interested in saving others would find a terrible amount of difficulty in saving themselves. It became more and more important that the men who were going forth into the great warfare of evil—which was the whole meaning of their Christianity—should not only be well equipped in the latest devices of theological scholarship or the latest forms of philosophical theory, but that they should have also the passionate love of bringing men back from the turmoil of temptation, of giving them strength to fight with their besetting sins, and leading them into the example of Jesus and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit. May this College, Mr. Carpenter said, in conclusion, under so distinguished a Principal, with resources of teaching such as we all value very highly, with an open outlook towards the best forms of University culture, and with all the enormous interests of a great city at its doors—may this College enter on a career of usefulness such as it has never achieved before.

PRINCIPAL GORDON believed they must know that, if he had a heart at all, there must be struggling in it a full tide of joyful gratitude along with a heavy weight of new responsibility. They were grateful for the change that had taken place in their circumstances; but they would not be forgetful on that day for the past out of which they emerged. Some of those present were old enough to remember the first class teaching—not in class-rooms, but in the private chambers of the early tutors. Some again might remember the attic to which the students a little later climbed. All of them remember the old hall, and though they had had their quarrel with its angles, and its scantiness, and the various disadvantages it presented, they would say of it as patriots of their Mother Country, "Memorial Hall, with all thy faults I love thee still." They had not only to look backward, but forward also. They thought of those whose steadfastness in harder times than ours really made for them the liberties they now enjoyed. They remembered their faithfulness and their freedom. They would be unworthy of their place that day if they bated a jot of that heart of faith and trust in freedom which made their forerunners strong and brave and true. But they looked forward. That day they were placed in trust for those unborn. Handed on to them, frankly, were the traditions, the principles, the great ideas, which were the strength and beauty and glory of their historic past. They had to take care that nothing they did or thought or said should prejudice the unseen future that lay before them, so that those who came afterwards might not say that they had to look above their heads to those behind them, for the true principles of religious learning and religious liberty. That was why he felt that an enhanced responsibility rested upon them all, and he entreated those who were brought into the closest connection with him as fellow-workers and fellow-learners to remember that they could not live on the past; they might not live solely for the present; they had to look forward to the bearing of their efforts, and of their slackness, as well as their energy upon the future which awaited some of them, but would roll its ages on when those who stood there then were covered by the sod. Let them make the hopes which rested in their hearts to-day a help for them all when trials came, as come they would, when difficulties arose, when friction threatened, when temptation assailed. Let them remember with what heart, with what spirit, with what joyful anticipation they began. Again begin; always be beginning, doing so a little more toward that life which never ends. Let him remind their Irish friends, to whom they owed so much, that though they were in October, it was the 12th, "the glorious twelfth." May it be a day of pious and immortal memory

PROFESSOR MOORE proposed that the best thanks of the meeting be given to Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence for his kindness in declaring the building open. He expressed regret for the illness from which their friend had been suffering, and which had made it impossible for him to favour them with one of those vigorous and inspiring addresses which they always associated with his personality.

COLONEL PILCHER, in seconding, said no one knew better than he did how much the College was indebted to Sir Edwin for his generosity and his unfailing kindness and counsel in every way. In coming there again he had added to the debt they owed him. They were glad to welcome him and Lady Lawrence in that handsome room which they were so proud to possess, and he trusted there might be in it many future happy gatherings.

The resolution having been carried,

LADY LAWRENCE replied. It was, she said, a great pleasure for Sir Edwin and herself to be present. She had already heard from Principal Gordon of the beauty and magnificence of the new house. But she had no idea that it was such a fine building, and she congratulated them upon having acquired it. She joined with Sir Edwin in wishing to the Committee, the Principal, the tutors and students, God speed and all prosperity in the future.

Mr. WILLIAM LONG moved a vote of thanks to the Chairman and the speakers, and added his hearty congratulation to the Committee and all who had worked to obtain possession of that fine building. He hoped, emphasising the remarks of Professor Carpenter, that the two colleges of Manchester and Oxford—the one with a missionary spirit which could not be indulged to the same extent in Oxford, where they had no great city like Manchester—would work together for the good of their body and the dissemination of the truth which they held so dear. He hoped this might be the glorious home of the Unitarians of the district and of all those who liked to join them.

Rev. C. J. STREET seconded the resolution, referring especially to the admirable services which the President had rendered to the College for many years. He thoroughly believed in that College. Its managers knew what its principle was, and what they wanted. They were determined to get it, and were on the right lines in doing so. He had faith in the members of the College, its Principal and its management, and had therefore great pleasure in taking part in the proceedings. The resolution having been carried, a verse of the hymn, "Onward, Christian soldiers," was sung, and Principal Gordon closed the proceedings with prayer.

OBITUARY.

HENRY JOSEPH MORTON.

ON Friday, October 13, at his residence, 2, Westbourne-villas, Scarborough, an old and faithful friend of our cause, Mr. H. J. Morton, passed to his rest, being 80 years of age. We have not at the moment further particulars as to Mr. Morton's life at hand, but are glad to be able to publish the following "Appreciation."

Some years ago, when Mr. Morton was approaching his eightieth year, a ministerial friend of his of long standing sent a message to him in these words: "Say to him that he has only one fault, and that is that he is growing old." Those words expressed very fairly the experience of most of his friends, that such was the glow of his noble and generous impulses, the white heat of the strenuousness of his life of benevolent activity, that the spots on the sun could only be detected by too searching an inspection and through a darkened medium. He was given to hospitality. To think of him in this one respect alone, and to remember the childlike simplicity of the man joined with a kind of hilarity as of a generous-natured boy, is to be furnished with a standard of judgment of him that makes it almost possible to deny that there were spots on the sun, or that he had any fault but that of growing old. Like all men the foundation of whose character is impulsiveness, Mr. Morton presented the spectacle, at times, of volcanic outbursts of indignation. His very zephyrs were bracing north-easters; his gentlest breezes had a family likeness to hurricanes. Things were never dull for anybody when Mr. Morton was about. His memory will doubtless be kept green for many years, by the anecdotes that grow out of such a soil of character, freshened by such a breezy nature, even if there were any danger of his being forgotten by the thousand hearts that in some form or other, whether in private beneficence or public munificence, have felt the effects of his generous spirit. Strenuousness characterised every development of his life—his business, his "causes," his pleasures, his travelling, his play with children. "A clear fire, a clean hearth, and the rigour of the game"; this was his wish, too, and like the famous person whose wish this was, he, too, "loved the quadrate, the square." Not cards only, but all else was serious warfare, "the ends, the gain, with glory." He "fought a good fight, cut and thrust." "All people have their blind side—their superstitions; and hearts was his favourite suit," too. He enjoyed life, and loved to help others to try and enjoy it. His enjoyment was real. It radiated from his face. He had a wide knowledge of men. He was a much-travelled man. And one might say, considering his buoyant nature, he was a much-tried man; yet there was clearly a uniform determination in him to be a man and master of his fate. He bore with many kinds of human weakness with wonderful tenderness. He bore some of his own physical pains at times with an air almost bordering on jocularity. His county, of course Yorkshire, and his church, of course Unitarian, divided, or rather claimed, his chief admiration. It was his faith that the high qualities of the Yorkshire character and the purity, plainness, and simplicity of the faith of his church would carry all before them. He was an optimist, who sometimes borrowed the weapons of the pessimist to further his optimistic ends. His best oratory was not on the public platform, though effective enough there, but on his own hearthstone. There he forgot his audience, and often forgot himself; there his displays of tempestuous optimism were things to behold and to remember. No old man, surely, could see Mr. Morton without envying his perennial youth; no young man could see him without feeling humbled by the spectacle of such superb energy and address. The best business principles were incarnate in him. He had no mercy on the slipshod. At last he rests

As the wild waters rest,
With the colours of heaven on their breast.

All our better moods are prophetic of eternity for us.—W. Mountford.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

OBEDIENCE AND DUTY.

The beginning of all our learning is obedience. It is the first lesson of life—to learn to do as we are bid, and not to do what is forbidden.

Have you ever watched a baby learning by degrees the meaning of "No"? The lesson may begin with a shake of the head, and then pass on to the word itself "No." The child gradually learns to understand a warning and to obey it, to understand a command and to obey it. It is what we all have to learn, first at home, then at school, and in our work in the world. Even in our play we have to obey our leader, if we are to avoid quarrelling and to play happily together. There are other people to be obeyed too, policemen, judges, parliaments and kings. And you can think for yourselves of many more who have to be obeyed, either because they know better than other folk, or because it is arranged so for the sake of order. Only those who have learned to obey are ever fit to command when their turn comes to make others obey.

We never really come to the end of obeying, even when we are grown up. For besides the obedience we owe to those who are in any way set over us, besides the obedience due to the law of the land, which is made for the good of all, there is a still higher kind of obedience due from each one of us. The word of command spoken by the voice of conscience, the word of God in our own hearts, claims our obedience always, whether we heed it or not.

We may take no notice; we may say, like a little child, "I won't obedient you," and go our own way; but still we know in our own hearts that we ought to obey, and that if we disobey we deserve to be punished.

We know, too, that however far we stray from the right path, we still bear with us that inward voice, telling us what we ought to do, and what we ought not to do, urging us, warning us, approving or disapproving. Each one of us has this inward guide, and whatever we are thus bidden to do is our duty.

Duty means what is due from us, what we owe, what we ought to do. Duty is a debt that we owe, a debt that we ought to pay.

In some ways duty is the same for us all. There are some things that we all feel we ought to do. Sometimes duty is different for different people, and we each have our own duty or duties. You can think of examples for yourselves.

Perhaps some of you have guessed already why we are thinking of duty specially to-day—not only we who read The Inquirer, but English folk everywhere, on land and at sea, at home and abroad.

This Saturday, October 21, is Trafalgar Day. Just a hundred years ago, off the coast of Spain, was ought and won the battle of Trafalgar, when in the hour of victory, on board his ship the Victory, was killed our great English sailor, Nelson.

We English love the sea and we honour our great sailors. Why should this sailor, this Admiral Horatio Nelson, and his victory at Trafalgar be specially famous?

Partly, perhaps, because this sea-fight, together with other victories of Nelson's, saved England from a great danger. The tyrant Napoleon, having made himself master of France, next tried to make himself master of all Europe. England tried to stop him, so England was his special enemy, and he considered the invasion and conquest of England as the most important step in his plan of conquest.

So much did the safety of England depend on her ships and her sailors, that it was no wonder her bravest sailor, her greatest admiral, was honoured as a hero by the whole nation, and his name remembered with gratitude.

Nelson's last message to his sailors—to the whole fleet—before the battle is more famous than the battle itself:

"England expects every man to do his duty."

This signal was made by means of flags, with numbers standing for letters, run up one after the other to the mast-head of the admiral's ship—the flag-ship it is called.

Officers and seamen under Nelson were used to follow him into any danger, and the lesson of his life had been obedience to command, faithfulness to duty, loyalty to England. It was no wonder that when he spoke to them all thus in the hour of danger, his message was received with an answering shout throughout the fleet.

"Now," said Nelson, "I can do no more. We must trust to the great disposer of all events, and the justice of our cause. I thank God for this great opportunity of doing my duty." Many years earlier he had written: "Our country has the first demand for our services; and private convenience or happiness must ever give way to the public good. Duty is the great business of a sea officer." And to the young officers under his command he taught that the first duty is obedience.

From the first, Horatio Nelson showed himself faithful to duty. Small and feeble in body, he was never afraid of danger to himself, never afraid of doing his duty however difficult or dangerous it might be.

As a child he wandered off one day from his grandmother's house in the country. After a long search he was found sitting by a brook which he could not cross. His grandmother wondered that hunger and fear had not driven him home. "Fear! grandmamma. I never saw fear. What is it?"

Horatio entered the Navy and went to sea at the age of twelve. At twenty he was himself in command of a ship.

Ever ready to share hardship and danger with his men, he was ready to share honour with them too, and would take any trouble for their welfare and promotion. As a commander he was honoured and loved by his own officers and crew. As an admiral he was honoured and loved throughout the Navy. At his death he was mourned by Englishmen throughout the world.

"Thine island loves thee well, thou famous man,
The greatest sailor since the world began,
Mighty seaman, tender and true . . .
. . . . .
Let his great example stand
Colossal seen of every land, . . .
Till in all lands and through all human story
The path of duty be the way to glory."

MEN FOR THE MINISTRY.

THE opening of the new session at Manchester College, Oxford, and the opening of Summerville, the new residence of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, in Victoria Park, Manchester, are both reported in our present issue. The Home Missionary College is to be congratulated on the ample fulfilment of the wishes of its old students for the celebration of the jubilee of its foundation, in securing this admirable residence—a commemoration which has been very warmly supported by friends throughout this country, and with a special ardour in the north of Ireland. The report we publish will give some idea of the very pleasant conditions under which the work of the College will now be carried on, the great advantages secured by close association with the Victoria University and its Free Faculty of Theology, and also of the enthusiasm which has been generated by this new departure.

And now a further question becomes urgent. We have in our two colleges, admirably equipped for the training of ministers, a lavish over-provision of teaching power and opportunity for training, so far as the present actual needs of the churches and the men they furnish as students for the ministry are concerned. Will the enthusiasm, which has carried this jubilee scheme through to so successful an issue, go on to produce a new quickening of religious life, an extension of the field of duty actually occupied and open to ministerial service, and a fresh supply of capable and devoted men to be trained for that service? The churches have chosen to have two colleges. Will they now produce the men, who shall be the best witnesses to their own genuine religious vitality, men deeply impressed by the greatness of the call, the urgent need for such consecrated service, and earnestly determined to give their lives to it?

Mr. CARPENTER, whose address at Oxford and speech at Manchester are both reported here, has been giving another address on "The Ministry as a Profession." It is the same appeal that he made with so much earnestness twelve years ago at the opening of Manchester College, at Oxford; now it is made in more extended form in this address, which was given first at a meeting at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, then on Monday week in Birmingham and on Thursday evening, after the opening of Summerville, at the Memorial Hall, Manchester. The Rev. DENDY AGATE, President of the District Association, was in the chair, and Principal GORDON and Mr. ERNEST STEINTHAL spoke at the close.

Both parents and ministers, Mr. CARPENTER said, ought seriously to consider the duty of putting the ministry before their young people as a profession to which they might be called. They ought not to be discouraged by any poverty of outlook from the worldly point of view. A growing number of men in the present time were not afraid of being poor, and were found willing to give themselves in social service to the public good, with little or no remuneration. For such there was a great opportunity in the church, for the ministry gives access to various forms of social service and the amplest opportunity for unselfish devotion to the highest ends, in which both men and women might find their truest happiness. The needs especially of great cities are pressed upon us all with increasing urgency, and there is a new call to women as well as men to give their lives to such ministry.

Among the joys of a minister's life must be reckoned his special opportunities of forming friendships of the most precious kind, while there is open to him a creative activity in self-expression in the highest religious work, which, as in the case of the artist and the poet, is a source of deep and abiding joy.

This must not be taken as a report of Mr. CARPENTER'S address, but merely as some indication of the lines of his appeal. And there is one other thing we should like to say. On the churches most directly is laid the responsibility of producing the men who shall be willing to devote themselves to the ministry, and shall possess those qualities of mind and heart and spirit, which may be trained for effective service. But let this be borne in mind. If the churches desire that men of high character and endowment shall be drawn to their ministry, let it be their chief care not simply to make the position tenable in a material sense, though it be on lines of rigid poverty, but let it be to a position of honour and trust, in the highest sense, that they call their minister. Let the life cherished in their midst be such as to kindle the most generous ardour, and an eagerness for self-sacrificing service in all who have part of it. Then will a true man feel that it is worth while to devote his life and all his gifts to such a work.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

CHRISTIANITY IN THE LIGHT OF HISTORICAL SCIENCE.*

BY THE REV. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A.
